Williams welcomes 497 frosh to Class of '80

Frosh housing shortage won't affect quality

The arrival of an unexpectedly large freshman class (17 over the target figure) has forced the College to set up new housing units and transfer some upper class housing to freshmen. However, according to Dean of Freshmen Lauren R. Stevens, the quality of freshman housing has not been substantially reduced.

The north entry of Currier Hall (normally housing overflow from Fitch and Perry Houses) will house an entry of freshman women (13 freshmen and two JAs). The Art Department is moving out of its offices in the basement of Fayerweather

43% of freshmen are women, yields closest ratio ever

Four hundred ninety-seven students from 44 states and nine foreign countries are arriving this Labor Day Weekend to take their places in the Class of '80, Williams' 191st.

The coincidence of the holiday and the start of Freshman Days, the traditional social and academic orientation period for freshmen, has meant the postponement of the start of classes to Thursday, September 9 and forced most College offices to remain open on Labor Day.

The 285 men arriving represent a 4 per cent drop from last year's entering class, while the 212 women represent a 13 per cent increase. The class is the most evenly matched in the short history of coeducation at Williams with 57 per cent men and 43 per cent women.

According to Director of Admissions Philip F. Smith, the College is continuing a policy of admitting men and women in proportion to the ratio of applications. Thus, 21.8 per cent of male applicants and 21.4 per cent of women applicants were accepted. However, 46 per cent of men accepted decided to attend, while 52 per cent of women accepted so indicated. Thus, the unexpected increase in women.

Regionally, the class is dominated by students from New England and the Middle Atlantic States, who make up 72 per cent of the class (a 7 per cent increase over last year).

Asked to characterize the class as a whole, Smith noted that the members of the class had "done unusually well on their achievement tests" and snapped a recent trend toward declining board scores.

The class contains 42 blacks and "about a dozen" students of oriental ancestry, said Smith.

Smith noted that the decisive factor in a student's choosing Williams over another college was a desire for a rural setting.

"The majority of students accepted here who elect not to go to Williams choose large urban universities," he said.

A guide to getting things done at Williams

by David R. Ross

When you enter your room on the first day of college and discover there's no bed, what do you do? When you find yourself registered in linear algebra after barely struggling through last year's trigonometry, what do you do? When you want to start a Chinese Pottery Club, what do you do? When you want a Singapore Sling that glows in the dark, what do you do?

While it's true that one man with faith can move mountains, finding a friend with a bulldozer is faster. To every question there is an answer; and you'll save yourself a lot of grief if you find someone who's already hassled through to it.

Don't think your complaint or suggestion isn't justified—it probably is. Don't think it will automatically be dealt with—it undoubtedly won't.

Stoic endurance won't ruffle any feathers. Neither will it get you a bed. Explosive tantrums will be equally ineffective. Hardly anyone does things out of malice here, although there is no known limit to stupidity.

Junior Advisers are usually the best starting point for complaints, queries and diatribes. While they have taken no tests to prove their knowledge of Williams ("How many steps to the top of Hopkins Hall?"), or necessarily been chosen for their incisive intellects, JA's have the decided advantage of having gone through the past's equivalent of the days ahead—"the best years of your life."

A caution: One of the advantages of a JA over the information sheets published under the College's aegis is that he give you a straight answer as in "This stinker" or "You shouldn't miss that" or "You can get it cheaper at . . ." The danger is that you might take what he says as gospel. Keep in mind that negative comments about a math course reflect more his lack of ability in the subject than any evil in the course.

A simple cure to such over dependence is getting to know as many people as possible. Upperclassmen are easier to get to know than in the past, what with freshman housing extending well away from the Freshman Quad, and are usually quite friendly—maybe too friendly.

Academically, the college has assigned you a faculty adviser to tell you everything you never want to know about the Williams curriculum. In theory, he teaches courses in an area that interests you. He can become a valuable ally at Williams and even more valuable when you need references for grad school and job applications. Certainly he is your best hope in getting officialdom to recognize your desires.

On the other hand, he might teach a completely different subject and know little of the courses you want to take. Don't let him force you into any decisions you don't want to make. There is nothing to restrict you to the wisdom of this one adviser.

Usually the best source of information on a course is the professor teaching it. See him. Don't be scared away by the course description. An amazing revelation occurs when you read that description after you've finished the course.

Many professors hesitate to take the initiative in developing relations with students. They sit in their offices and wonder why no one visits them other than around exams. The reason they do so is a reluctance to intrude.

You have to do the intruding. The results are usually rewarding. For one, a professor can handle your questions much more effectively before the exam time crunch. Beyond supplying recommendations later on,

The deans: who's what in Hopkins Hall

Williams is almost unique in the fact that the individuals holding key posts in the administration are worth knowing more for their personal gifts than for the official power they wield. All have contact with students outside of their Hopkins Hall offices, as teachers, coaches and members of student-faculty committees.

Freshmen will meet President John W. Chandler during receptions at his house this week. The President oversees both the academic and the financial aspects of the College, often meeting with alumni groups in efforts to raise money to support the College. A former pitcher on the faculty softball team, Chandler is an avid sports fan who can be seen at many home sports events.

Peter Berek, Dean of the College, is responsible for the day to day operation of the school. For an Amherst lad (Class of '61), Berek shows unusual perception, sensitivity and subtlety. Berek is a flexible administrator, but touches of the English professor come through in his articulate if turgid letters. (Hang on to them; they may be collector's items some day.)

Assistant Dean Eileen Julien is the administrative liaison with the College Council and Finance Committee and has a special interest in minority affairs. Julien was reappointed to her position following a search by a student-faculty committee for a person to fill the "black deans's spot."

Lauren R. Stevens, Dean of Freshmen, is the person with whom freshmen deal most. Hardly the disciplinarian, Stevens is a compassionate administrator whose goals are the elimination of hassles. Stevens is beginning his seventh year as Dean of Freshmen.

Associate Dean Nancy J. McIntire's interests are exchange and transfer students and women's affairs. A graduate of the University of New Hampshire and a member of Phi Beta Kappa, she came to Williams in 1970.

Cris T. Roosenraad, Associate Dean, handles relations with the residential houses as well as disciplinary problems. Admired by many for his frankness, Roosenraad is perhaps more radical than most of the student body. There is no more tireless worker in the Administration. Roosenraad joined the faculty in 1969.

Henry N. Flynt, Associate Dean and Director of Financial Aid, coached freshman soccer for twenty years at Williams leading his teams to seven Little Three titles. A 1947 Williams graduate, he has been extremely active in community affairs. Flynt has the thankless responsibility of making decisions on financial aid.

Dean of the Faculty Neil R. Grabois represents faculty viewpoints in administrative circles. Considered by many to be one of the three or four most influential administrators at Williams, Grabois has served as Dean of the College and will become Provost this winter.

Freshman Bigots

The available evidence seems to indicate that people are naturally bigots—naturally discriminatory and prejudiced in that they prejudge and discriminate among people, objects and courses of behavior. Prejudgment allows us to limit the otherwise infinite number of possible responses to a given situation and cuts the otherwise ridiculous amount of time that could be devoted to even the most simple decisions.

However, prejudiced behavior has its costs. Beyond the more often publicized costs to the person or object discriminated against, there is the cost to the discriminator of missing enjoyable, rich experiences.

For the most part, we try to strike a balance between seeking new, self-expanding experiences and avoiding unpleasant ones; between befriending others and being hurt by them. By the time we enter college, our personal balances of prejudice are probably fairly well established. This is unfortunate, since in college (and particularly at the start of a new year) the chances of being hurt by open, seeking behavior are substantially reduced and the number of new, potentially enjoyable experiences is uncountable.

There will be plenty of time in the future for falling into little boxes, for becoming stereotypes. Later, the pressures will grow to do something "useful," to play a role, to be practical. Now, those pressures are removed. (Williams is a lousy place to be practical, to "learn a skill.") Experimentation, trying-out newly grown wings is the order of the day.

Today, men and women bring their gifts to a community that can offer equally rich gifts in return. To one willing to sample such gifts, Williams is an awesome, wonderful world.

In experiencing Williams to the full, let us pause to pity those who receive only a distorted view of this world, who are unable to accept the gifts offered them—let us pity the freshman bigots.

In the Beginning

To readers new to Williams and The Williams Record, welcome! We are the campus newspaper of Williams College, publishing on Tuesdays and Fridays throughout the academic year. This introductory issue seeks to hint at the variety that is Williams. We hope its somewhat opinionated contents will prove informative and occasionally useful.

Freshmen will quickly note that this editorial is yet another pompous greeting. Nevertheless, our wish for good luck and a productive four years is sincere.

Freshmen parents will probably find more time to read this issue than their offspring, who are certainly finding more than enough to keep them busy. We hope we can count parents among our readers in the future. The Record often becomes the only source of news from the campus when letters falter.

Parents and freshmen (not to mention even more confused College officials) are already caught in the madness of Freshman Days—that time warp in which Williams suddenly evolves from a map and catalog reference into a world that never ceases to touch those who have once entered it. A confusion of activities, faces, annoyances and too little sleep overwhelm everyone until individuals suddenly find themselves cast in the role of college students.

It gets quieter, but probably no saner.

The Record returns triumphantly to another year of journalistic prostitution! The next issue will appear Thursday, Sept. 9. Deadline for this issue only will be Tuesday at 2:00 p.m. Starting with the issue of September 14, the Record will commence regular publication on its semi-weekly schedule. Issues will appear at all major dining halls before dinner on Tuesdays and Fridays. Extra copies will be available by the new Baxter Hall mailroom. Deadlines will be Sunday and Wednesday at 2:00 p.m. respectively. Comments and unsolicited work are welcome, but editing rights for length are reserved.

Shopping in Billsville

It's not Park Avenue

by Sue Galli

Whether a Williams freshman is used to shopping along the sidewalks of New York or browsing through suburban malls, one thing that quickly becomes a part of the college experience is discovering the delights of a Williamstown shopping spree. Or, more accurately for students without regular access to cars, the delights of shopping along Spring Street.

For it is on Spring Street—where town and College seem to mingle most obviously—that the most accessible stores and services are located.

Unfortunately, after examining the town's commercial offerings, many students feel they are being "ripped-off." Often accustomed to a much wider selection of goods and variety of establishments, they claim that store owners charge overly-high prices for goods simply because they are in a monopoly situation.

Last fall, the Record did a series of comparison surveys of Spring Street stores with stores outside the immediate college area. The finding was generally that, while prices may be a bit higher than usual at some of the student-frequented establishments, it seems to be more a function of the size and type of stores than an effort by Williamstown merchants to capitalize on the student trade.

According to the survey, it is profitable for students to buy health items and school supplies at supermarkets or discount stores before coming to school.

Health items at Hart's Pharmacists on Spring Street, for example, may sell for as much as 50 per cent over supermarket prices but are comparable in cost to those at a North Adams drugstore.

Edward N. Conroy, a part owner and pharmacist at Hart's, said that the greater volume of business done at larger stores makes it possible for them to have lower mark-ups on goods than at small pharmacies.

Also, he explained, under Massachusetts law a pharmacist must be present at all times when a drugstore is open. According to Conroy, paying this professional, along with providing delivery service, allowing charges, and maintaining an adequate staff to provide good service, raises the overhead of a small business and forces prices up.

A similar situation exists concerning school supplies. While prices at Spring Street's McClelland Press may seem high when compared to those at Zayre's, they are not any higher than at Lamb's Stationery Store in North Adams.

Again, high overhead costs and an inability to buy in large quantities were cited as reasons.

"We might buy a couple of dozen of some item," explained employee Marion Jammalo, "while Zayre's will buy a couple of hundred dozen of this item."

Tom Herwitz purchasing cheese from Ken O'Neill, owner of Ken's Market. Prices at Ken's Market are comparable to, and in some cases cheaper than, those in area supermarkets. (photo by Read)

However, while a student may save $.06 on a Bic pen by shopping at Zayre's, he will be unable to find a 10-octave music notebook at the discount store. Because there is little public demand for this item, Zayre's does not carry it while McClelland Press stocks the item for the small group who uses it.

As far as food prices go, those surveyed at Ken's Market were comparable to those at Grand Union and Price Chopper, both located east of Williamstown on Route 2. The owner of the market said he can keep prices at a competitive level because of smaller amounts of money spent on rent, electricity, and workers.

He admitted, however, that if his prices were a few pennies higher than elsewhere, it was probably because of personalized service, charges, and buying fewer items on the wholesale level.

A comparison of liquor prices showed that, while wine prices vary somewhat from store to store, those of beer and hard liquor are pretty much standardized.

Ray Smith, owner of King's Liquor Store on Spring Street, said that prices are based on a "Suggested Minimum Consumer Resale Price List" published bimonthly by the State of Massachusetts. This publication gives the current minimum price that a store owner must charge.

According to Smith, most liquor stores have their prices near this baseline. He admitted that King's has an advantage over other nearby liquor stores because of its Spring Street location. In general, King's prices are somewhat higher than the other stores'.

A more significant difference lies between Massachusetts and Vermont liquor prices. In Vermont, liquor stores are state-owned and prices are standardized. Under this system, Vermont liquor prices are significantly lower than those in Massachusetts.

It appears, then, that students are paying high prices for liquor more because of Massachusetts guidelines than because they live in a college town.

Tom Herwitz considers purchasing a half gallon of vodka at King's Liquors. He could probably buy it cheaper in Vermont because Massachusetts has minimum liquor prices. (photo by Read)

It's going to be quite a week

"They're fun."

"They're boring."

"You make many lasting friends."

"You forget everyone you're introduced to."

If one thing is certain about a student's first few days at Williams, it is probably that no two people remember them in the same way. Freshman Days 1976, scheduled to begin Monday, will offer the class of 1980 a chance to form its own memories.

On Monday, freshmen are scheduled to arrive and the Junior Advisers will probably sponsor informal entry get-togethers before the formal opening dinner at the hockey rink. Later that night, art professor Whitney Stoddard will give his yearly lecture—"A Sense of Where You Are"—at the Adams Memorial Theater. Because of limited space, only freshmen will be able to attend.

Instead of the traditional first night "beer blast" in the Freshman Quad, however, JA's have arranged a number of smaller parties, each centering around a few entries but open to all freshmen.

Tuesday is largely an organizational day for the class of 1980. Placement tests will be held in the morning, followed by financial aid meetings, a meeting of the pre-professional panel, and an open house at the home of President and Mrs. Chandler for residents of Sage, Williams, and Lehman.

In addition, various departments and college services will be hosting open houses throughout the day, and tours will be available.

Tuesday night, there will be a Casino and Dance in the Greylock Dining Hall.

Meetings with faculty advisors are scheduled for Wednesday morning, the Williams Outing Club Freshman-Faculty Picnic for Wednesday noon, and the President's open house late that afternoon for residents of Currier, East, Fayerweather, and Morgan.

Representatives of student organizations will describe their organizations and invite freshmen to join them during Purple Key Night in Chapin Hall. This will round out Wednesday's activities and complete the Freshman Days calendar.

The arts in Williamstown

Culture comes to the country

by Tom Herwitz

A long time ago, Williams College decided that it would not let its geographical isolation from a cultural center thwart its desire for cultural enrichment. Since that time, the arts have become more and more prominent and substantial in Williamstown.

World renowned is the Clark Art Institute—just a short walk out South Street. The scope of the museums holding is great, though the Clark's specialty is its collection of French impressionist paintings. In fact, the centermost room in the old building is like a giant bon-bon box full of Renoir's. A side hallway is covered with Toulouse-Lautrec, Monet, Sisley, Pissaro, and Degas. There are other rooms with the French Salon artists, the old Masters, the Americans and Gallerys for the many visiting exhibitions which the Clark brings in.

But the Clark is not only a fine museum because of its superb collection—it is also a living museum always bustling with activity. The Clark sponsors throughout the year (and mostly free to students) a number of lectures, performing groups, and films. Music from Marlboro will be at the Clark again this year to offer some of the finest Chamber music in the country. The Clark will also sponsor (among other things this fall) a weekly film series of Alistair Cooke's America.

The strength of Williams' own Lawrence Museum lies not in the excellence of individual pieces of European painting but in its eclecticism. In the museum there are one or two pieces to illustrate a wide range of period or medium. To illustrate a trend in art it is not necessary to use the best but the representative. Lawrence has pieces from the Ibo tribe of Nigeria to Winslow Homer watercolors; from a patchwork silk priest robe of the Shinshu sect to Claus Oldenburg soft sculpture. Many of these are in hidden nooks, often a search is necessary. The museum along with the Art department also sponsors lectures, films, and visiting exhibitions. During October a large Jim Dine exhibition will be put up to coincide with Dine's month as visiting artist in residence. Dine was a front runner in the emergence of conceptual art. The Student Art Gallery in Dodd House is a small area where student artwork can usually be found on display.

The performing arts at Williams offer the opportunity to be both audience and participant. The Theater department produces several mainstage productions each year at the Adams Memorial Theater (AMT). With the Theater major now a reality, the department's production wing is in full swing. Four main productions will be staged this year directed by members of the department—Hedda Gabler, School for Scandal, Durrenmatt's The Physicist, and Guys and Dolls. In addition about a dozen student productions are staged in the Studio Theater of the AMT. At least one special event is already being planned—a colloquium with playwright Jean-Claude van Itallie. And, of course, there is the Freshman Revue to start off the year.

One of the finest concert series at the college is sponsored each year by the Williams Dance Society. Each year renowned dance troupes spend two or three days in residence at Williams. They give master classes, lecture-demonstrations, open rehearsals, and full performances allowing the dance enthusiast to become totally absorbed in the individual company's theories, techniques, and repertoire. These residencies are also a perfect way to introduce the glory of dance to the newcomer.

This year the Society will bring the Cliff Kevter Dance Company in September, the Margalit Dance-Theater Company in March and the Paul Taylor Dance Company in May.

Music is another active area here. The Berkshire Symphony (based at Williams) performs several times a year as does the Music in the Round series of chamber music in Thompson Chapel. The Choral Society and student organized performances take place fairly regularly throughout the year. Outside performers are also brought in through the auspices of the Thompson Concert Series. Examples in September and October are a concert by the Julliard String Quartet and a performance of Gilbert and Sullivans H.M.S. Pinafore by the Manhattan Saroyards.

Popular music can be heard almost as often with a number of major concerts and a Jazz series during Winter Study. Last year saw Duke and the Drivers, James Montgomery Band, Tower of Power, the Poussette-Dart Band, and Livingston Taylor. Jazz included Chuck Mangione, Buddy Rich, and Dizzy Gillespie. Folk and blues singers can be seen almost every weekend in the Rathskellar at the Williams Coffee House and student performers take over at the Log, the British Maid, the Williams Inn and other local nightspots.

Movies are varied and abundant in the area with the Williams Film Society showing popular second runs every Friday in Bronfman (such as The Last Picture Show, The Candidate, Horsefeathers, Patton and Sleeper. There is a classic film festival on Saturday nights sponsored by the Williams Film Group with films of the great masters Truffaut, Bergman, Fellini, Antonioni, Da Sica and others. The Nickelodeon is an arts-repertory theater on Spring Street with three different classic movies a week (monthly listings available at the theater) and popular films are always available in North Adams and Pittsfield. Movies have become a big activity for many houses and organizations on campus so many times there is a film every night of the week.

Big Mac

And if the urge comes to hit the true urbs culturae—New York City, or the Cambridge-Boston area it is not too difficult. Either one is about the same distance—three hours—and either holds a tremendous amount in store for those not familiar with the cities.

But never mind New York and Boston. You'll find that as the year starts rolling along, and the arts in Williamstown start moving into high gear, that the options right here at your doorstep are out of this world.

FM ear, TV eye

90.3 WAMC, Albany—Outstanding National Public Radio affiliate, superb classical music most of the day. From Albany Medical College, the station broadcasts many of the college lectures.

91.9 WCFM, Williamstown—Williams' own station broadcasting a full range of music, news, sports, and special programs from 7 a.m. to 2 a.m. Non-commercial public broadcasting.

95.9 WGRG, Pittsfield—Progressive rock with a touch of the underground.

100.1 WMNB, North Adams—The FM counterpart of the AM WMNB (top forty) at 1230 plays dentist office music during the day, classical at night.

107.5, WAAF, Worcester—Rock with a popular leaning.

TV EYE

ON YOUR DIAL 2, WGBY (57)—PBS, Springfield. Mostly regular Public Broadcasting fare, often on delayed basis.

ON YOUR DIAL 3, WFSB—CBS, Hartford. Network station with some local flavor.

ON YOUR DIAL 4, WBZ-NBC, Boston. Middle of the road Group W station.

ON YOUR DIAL 5, WCVB—ABC, Boston. This is the big one insomniacs 5 all night.

ON YOUR DIAL 6, WRGB—NBC, Schenectady

ON YOUR DIAL 8, WSBK (38)—IND., Boston. Local type station. Old movies and Sox and Bruins coverage. Watch out for "Miracle Slicer" ads.

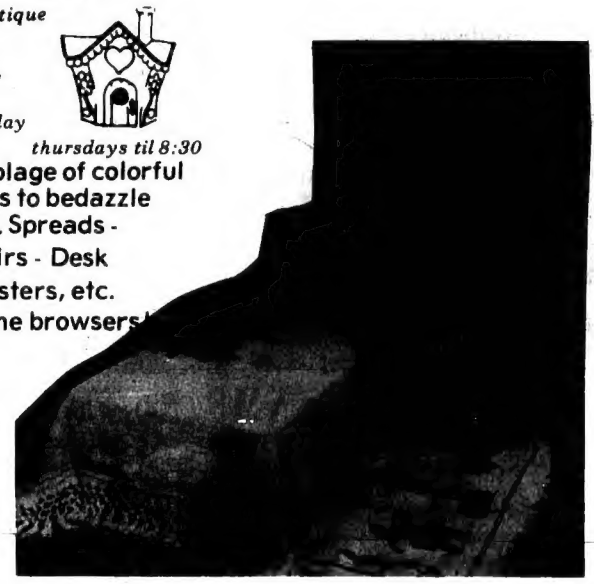
ON YOUR DIAL 9, WHYN (40)—ABC, Springfield. When carrying ABC, it's normal. Otherwise, heavy on Gunsmoke, Room 222, and Mike making your day even if you can't.

ON YOUR DIAL 10, WTEN—CBS, Albany. Newscaster Dick Woods couldn't hack it in Providence, R.I.

ON YOUR DIAL 11, WPIX—IND., New York. Owned by the New York Daily News. Carries Yankee games.

ON YOUR DIAL 12, WWLP—Greenfield. What can you expect from Greenfield.

Artsbriefs Artsbriefs



Joint auditions will be held for this year's first two Theater Department mainstage productions on September 8, 9, and 10 at the AMT. Sign-ups for audition times, and scripts for the two plays—Hedda Gabler directed by Jean-Bernard Bucky and School for Scandal directed by Gregory Boyd—are available at the theater.

The Freshman Council will show "The Graduate" in Bronfman Auditorium at 1:30 p.m. on Tuesday the 7th. Discussion groups will follow

Yes, once again it's time for another Freshman Revue.

Auditions are opened to all freshmen, talented or not—actors, dancers, singers, "techies", and anyone else with a talent not banned under Massachusetts law.

When you get tired of Baxter Hall food . . .

If Williams holds true to tradition, you will soon be or just have been audience to Whitney Stoddard's legendary lecture "A Sense of Where You Are" in which he tells a little bit about the Williamstown area. Unfortunately, he doesn't tell you anything practical, like where the good places to eat are.

Well the good places to eat, if you're game to knowing, are in Paris, New York and, more locally, Boston. These places being somewhat out of walking distance and more than a healthy drive away (particularly Paris), Williams students are forced to remain satisfied with the lesser local fare.

Any assessment of the local restaurants must be made with the vital "sense of where you are" in mind. You are in Williamstown, Mass., a small, backwoods town of pop. 5000. You are in the sticks, the boondocks. That is where you are. And as a result, you are unlikely to find very much of what in more metropolitan areas carries the label of "true class."

What you find instead are smaller, quieter places which have good though not exotic food, friendly service and very agreeable prices. You won't, in short, find anything as ritzy as Paris' Tour D'Argent here, but neither must you spend a tour d'argent (tower of money) to find a worthwhile diversion from the campus dining halls.

High Budget Approach

MILL ON THE FLOSS—8 miles south of Williamstown on Route 7. Billed as an Old New England Inn with a French accent, the Mill has excellent food and service. One of the best restaurants in the area. The place to go when Mom and Dad are in town.

THE RAIN BARREL—In Bennington, it provides excellent dining with a Continental flair. Dress is casual and the atmosphere not particularly attractive, but the food and service more than compensate for this. Well worth the trip.

THE SPRINGS—Ten minutes south of Route 7. It has the best reputation of local eateries, but in the view of many its cuisine is definitely inferior to many of the other places listed here. Recently reopened after a fire closed it. Specialty—Italian cooking, but it is not an Italian restaurant.

THE 1896 HOUSE—Just south on Route 7. Recently reopened after former owner went bankrupt. We have not visited it since reopening.

THE COUNTRY RESTAURANT—Perhaps its biggest plus is its location, across from the College on North Street. The food and atmosphere are good and the prices more reasonable than some of the other restaurants in the area.

THE BRITISH MAID—On Route 2 just east of the College, it's a favorite for Williams people. It's a combination bar, restaurant and night club establishment. The Maid does wonders with dishes containing fruit. Open for breakfast.

THE WILLIAMS INN—The food and service do not match up to the local competition. Drinks are expensive in the bar, but the sound of the music played in the bar may be more damaging than the dent drinks put in one wallet. We prefer the Maid.

GOURMET EAST—Just east of the College on Route 2. Opened this summer. College staff members who ate there report back favorably; prices are high but not unreasonable; the food is good. The only Chinese restaurant in the area.

LE JARDIN—For elegant dining not many local restaurants can surpass Le Jardin. Located about 15 minutes south of Williams on Rt. 7, this lovely restaurant commands a lofty view of the surrounding countryside while providing delicious food, and higher prices accordingly. A Sunday brunch is the specialty.

THE BLACKFRIAR'S TAVERN—For enterprising diners willing to make the trek past Bennington, Vermont, this little restaurant located in an old New England house is a great spot. It's ideal for a kidnapping party, because the person will never know where he is being taken, and the home-cooked food is moderately priced.

THE PUBLICK HOUSE—In North Bennington, call for directions. The best steak and salad place in the area. Good steaks and fresh bread.

LE BRASSERIE—In Bennington. A classy British Maid, better food and more expensive. A French flavor. Worth the trip.

MEDIUM BUDGET APPROACH

THE CAPTAIN'S TABLE—Just south of the College on Route 7. Seafood 180 miles from the sea; the food is carefully defrosted. Not our favorite.

COZY CORNERS RESTAURANT—North of the College on Route 7. Good for beer, spaghetti and reasonably priced pizza. Not a place to take a date or Mom and Dad, but an interesting escape from Baxter.

DANTE'S INFERNO—Cafeteria style steak and salad bar. Reasonably cheap. Informal. East of the College on Route 2.

FOUR ACRES—Good food. Not the place to go for Parents' Weekend, but on most other occasions, it is worthy of a visit.

HOWARD JOHNSON'S—Despite the national reputation of Howard Johnson's, this is a restaurant that will actually be highly recommended by the local townspeople. The national reputation of course is as a place that was so bad that not even the roaches would go there for a meal, a place where if you left a tip it was only out of sympathy for the chef, who you knew had to be handicapped. The Williamstown Howard Johnson's belies all of this. One need not be a starving motorist on a lonely turnpike to have an excuse for eating there. It is clean, friendly, fast and most surprisingly, good.

STRONG STOMACH APPROACH

THE PIZZA HOUSE—On Spring Street. Overpriced, undersized Greek zas. Tasty grinders. Prices are lower than Colonial's.

COLONIAL PIZZA—Home of Constantine. Better Greek zas than the Za House, but still overpriced and greasy.

Also in the plus column for Colonial is its peculiar trademark—which is almost worth ordering a pizza to see. It is picture of a colonial soldier on a horse delivering a pizza. Unfortunately, neither Colonial or the Pizza House will deliver on horseback or otherwise.

CARROLL'S—East of the College Route 2. The usual fast service burgers served on big soggy buns.

DUNKIN' DONUTS—On Route 2 in North Adams. Now here's a way to fend off the munchies 24 hours a day.

BURGER CHEF—On Route 2, five minutes closer than McDonald's. Only for those who cannot travel the extra five minutes.

McDONALD'S—In North Adams. If you've been to one, you've been to them all.

KENTUCKY FRIED CHICKEN—They use the Colonel's recipe with a little more than the usual amount of grease. Also fried ribs. On Route 2, east of the College.

FRIENDLY'S—More expensive than the fast food joints, but much more satisfying. Good ice cream. Closes at midnight. On Route 2, east of town.

THE LOG—Has good cheap sandwiches especially if you're friendly with the cook.

THE PURPLE PUB—On Bank St. For an evening snack, their sandwich is varied.

WEST END DELI—Possibly the home of the best sandwiches in the area. On Route 2 just east of town.

PAPA CHARLIE'S A & W DRIVE IN—Within walking distance. Good burgers, sandwiches and gallons of root beer. Pape Charlie is a good Williams fan. Best burger stand around. Good for American Graffitti lovers.

Escaping can be a big challenge

by George J. Schutzer

Every year, hundreds of thousands of tourists "get away from it all" by coming to the Berkshires.

Thoreau referred to Williams when he said, "It would be no small advantage if every college were thus located at the base of a mountain."

Williams comes fairly close to Thoreau's ideal. Inevitably, though, everyone reaches a point where they have to get out of here, whether for a reassuring whiff of smog or to see how Bud tastes in Northampton.

Herewith some notations on the major transportation options.

Foot: Given that the College tends to encompass the heart of Williamstown, walking is actually not a bad option for daily transportation needs. The campus is within easy walking distance of three shopping areas—Spring St., Cole Ave. (by the railroad tracks) and the Colonial Shopping Center (about 15 minutes east on Rt. 2). However, in terms of getting to Boston, it's definitely unattractive.

Hitching: Granted that hitching is vaguely illegal in many towns and some states, many "young people" consider it the most viable way of getting from one point to another. Opponents point to the dangers: instances of rape, robbery and murder by drivers and hitchhikers alike; the fact that you know nothing about the driving ability of a random driver; and a possible run-in with the local constabulary.

Train: Occasionally of an evening, when the wind is right, you might hear a freight train rumble away to the north. So much for the rebirth of the railroad in Williamstown.

But if you like train travel and can get to Pittsfield or Albany, you may be able to catch a train. A train leaves Pittsfield each morning at 11:45 for points east arriving in Boston at 3:40 p.m. The 6:27 p.m. train from Pittsfield stops in Albany, Utica, Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo, Erie, Cleveland, Toledo, South Bend and Chicago. You're better off if you catch it in Albany because the train must back into the Albany-Rennselaer station making it a two hour ride.

For more information, Call Amtrak: 800-523-5720.

Bus: Lest you despair that public transportation has totally ignored the Purple Valley, it is always possible to leave the driving to them and take the bus. You can thank Williamstown's location—the northwesternmost town in Massachusetts, situated on two vaguely major routes (2 and 7)—for what service there is. Interstate Commerce Commission rules make it more profitable for a busline not to cross statelines. Hence, New Englander runs buses at dreadfully inconvenient hours to Boston. These buses as well as Vermont Transit's New York-Burlington line stop on Route 2 east of Currier Hall. Tickets and schedules will be available at the new sporting goods store at the corner of Routes 2 and 43.

Buses for Boston leave at 6:40 a.m. Monday-Saturday; 1:00 p.m. every day, 7:40 a.m. on Sundays and 5:00 p.m. on Fridays and Sundays. Boston is the twelfth stop on the three hour and twenty minute trip.

Two buses leave Williamstown each day for New York, one at 7:35 a.m. and one at 11:59 a.m. Each bus stops in Pittsfield where connections to Providence, Albany, Springfield, Worcester, Hartford and New Haven are available. The 7:35 bus arrives in Port Authority, New York, at 12:20. The second bus, "the slowboat to China" seems to stop in every hick town in Connecticut at least six hours after leaving Williamstown.

Plane: Most Williams students fly from Albany but there are two other options. Bradley International Airport, located between Hartford and Springfield, does not close as often because of snow. Command Airways (499-0421) has four flights each day from Pittsfield to New York.

Unless you've got your own plane, Harriman Airport, in North Adams is almost useless.

Car: By far the most convenient and quickest way of getting anywhere is by car. If you own a car, congratulations. Although the College does much to discourage it, you've made the right decision.

First, freshmen are forbidden cars for the first semester. Thereafter, you may keep your car here, but must pay high registration fees and a propensity of both the town and College to ticket you for parking anywhere but in your assigned lot—in the case of freshmen, ridiculously stuck behind the tennis courts. Most drivers still feel that the convenience of driving the car offsets the costs.

Albany Airport: A door to the rest of the world unless a snowstorm closes it. But you still have to get there in order to fly the friendly skies. The best mode of escape is pictured above: the automobile. (photo by Ziter) grind—n.—one who studies too much. A grind is one who studies during a home football game.

Making yourself understood

—v.—to study.
ace—to get an A in plu—An A plus is an A plu, but you'll never see one.
bar—opposite of plu.
gut—an easy course

Places

Log—the campus pub. From President Garfield's description of the perfect educational set up—Mark Hopkins at one end of a log and a student at the other end.
Amherst—a small liberal arts school in the Connecticut Valley formed by a runaway Williams president and some kidnapped faculty. An inferior outgrowth of Williams; the enemy.
The Skids—home of beautiful women in the neighborhood of senior citizens; Skidmore College in Saratoga.
William and Mary—where everyone back home thinks you go to college.
Spring Street—downtown Williamstown. The campus is located in surburban Williamstown.
The Nickelodeon—it's more like the two-dollarodeon now. The movie theater on Spring Street.
Billsville—where townies live. Williamstown.

People

burgers—frosh burgers, also known as freshmen. Derivation unknown.
alumni—the fine breed who give the money that keeps you here. Among our finest are Magruder, Steinbrenner and Helms of Watergate fame.
Eph—rhymes with chief. A Williams student, a member of an athletic team. From Ephraim Williams.
girls—they are called women at Williams even if their older sisters are Skidmore girls.
import—a non-Williams student who is a date for the weekend.
Wally O—the campus hero for those of us that like Adam 12 and Kojak's hair, Walter O'Brien, chief of security.
matron—the lady who cleans your room every week, except if you call her the maid, cleaning lady or vacuum engineer.
townie—a native of Williamstown. Sometimes generalized to mean any uncultured heathen who hasn't read Plato, Aristotle or heard of James MacGregor Burns.

Food

frappe or frost—what normal people call a milk shake.
milk shake—better ask for a definition before ordering.
za—a Billsville pizza tastefully seasoned with grease.
grinders—those things abnormal people call warm submarines and mixed up persons call hot heroes.
beavo—beer, cool ones, chillies, brews.

Potpourri

demo—v.—to destroy, perhaps the most popular activity of some Williams men. n.—demolition.
preppie shoes—white soled mocassins worn by preppies and those who wish they were preppies.
pus—rhymes with bus. Demonstrating various degrees of animosity; verbal abuse.
hiking boots—brown high cuts worn by Outing Club members and those who think they are Outing Club members.
short—one who decides not to get shit-faced when you decide he should.
shit-faced—drunk.
the mountains—what we greet with a song and the song we greet them with.
The Record—what most administrators try to keep their comments off of, and the newspaper that they usually get printed in anyway. Often called the ReAd by confused upperclassmen.
purple and gold—school colors. From the purple valley and golden sun.
cake—anything that isn't difficult.

friends on the faculty can often steer you into summer job and study opportunities, particularly in the sciences. On a less selfish plane, faculty members tend to be interesting people, especially when removed from the classroom.

The power of the administration (what there is of it) is centralized in the Dean's office. Here you're likely to find a quick and authoritative answer to your queries, even if it's "I don't know." The point is that if they don't know the answer, they are expected to know where to look for it.

As a freshman, you'll have the most contact with Dean Stevens. Hardly a disciplinarian (they don't survive long at Williams) he tends to expend much energy making sure personal apple carts are not upset. Although what rules exist here are highly flexible, it's easy to feel trapped in a given course load or living situation. Stevens has the power to miraculously untrap you.

Williams is a haven for individuals. Treat the whole thing as an experiment. Ask questions. If you need a favor, ask someone for it. He'll probably surprise you by doing it.

All of this assumes that you get off your butt and take the first step.

The Ten Commandments

1. Thou shalt love the truth and seek it with all thy heart, thy soul and thy might.
2. Thou shalt meet new and interesting people.
3. Thou shalt observe critically.
4. Thou shalt hail the competitors.
5. Thou shalt record for future generations.
6. Thou shalt not be intimidated.
7. Thou shalt be pithy and concise.
8. Thou shalt read the Record.
9. Thou shalt hate Lord Jeffs.
10. Thou shalt face the challenge.

An unlikely college in an unlikely place

The Hoosic River valley of the Northern Berkshires, "the middle of no where," even today seems an unlikely place for a town, let alone a "prestigious liberal arts college." It was far more unlikely in the 1700s, when access to the valley was limited to an arduous trek over the Mohawk Trail.

A survey of transportation options in the Purple Valley (see page 5) indicates that things haven't evolved all that much in 200 years. Now, only the scenic beauty of the area justifies settling here. During the early 1700s, the area was something of a frontier and, lying across the Indian Path from Lake Champlain to the Connecticut River valley, was strategic militarily. A settlement in West Hoosic (as the township was then called) also served to assert Massachusetts' claims against Dutch settlers and later New York.

The area was first surveyed in 1739 by Ephraim Williams Sr. and under the impetus of Fort Massachusetts (located where the Price Chopper on Route 2 now stands) a settlement began to grow in 1752. As far as the College is concerned, Ephraim's Sr. real claim to fame was fathering Ephraim Jr. and getting him appointed commander of the string of Western Massachusetts forts including Fort Massachusetts. Although Ephraim Jr. was apparently well-regarded militarily, he goes down in history for his defeats. In 1746, Fort Massachusetts was captured and burned while supposedly under his command. On September 8, 1755, having led his men into an ambush at Lake George, N.Y., he ended up getting himself killed for his troubles.

Shortly before, he had written a will providing funds for a "free school" to be set up in West Hoosic on condition that the name of the town be changed to Williamstown. The will was not quickly executed. In 1765, the town was officially incorporated as "Williams Town," although the boundary dispute with New York was not settled until 1787.

The General Court of Massachusetts incorporated "The Trustees of the Donation of Ephraim Williams, Esq. for Maintaining a Free School in Williamstown" on March 8, 1785 to use the $9157 that had accumulated in the estate. Yet, even this massive sum wasn't sufficient for the task and a lottery was required before construction of West College could begin in 1790. The opening of school was delayed until Oct. 20, 1791 by a failure to discover water on the land around the building. (In fact, the school had to rely on two springs at the lower end of Spring St. for its supply.) Despite local opposition, Ephraim Williams' free school became Williams College on June 22, 1793, as the ambitions of the school's trustees and first president, Ebenezer Fitch, grew to exceed those of the "founder."

The first Commencement was held (curiously enough) on Sept. 2, 1795. Of the four men receiving degrees, two became lawyers and two doctors (percentages Career Counseling has been unable to equal since.)

The free school consisted of an Academy, with a yearly tuition of 35 shillings, and an English free school. The free school did not survive the formation of the College, although the Academy continued as a prep school for a few years.

The early trustees of the college were heavily influenced by Yale and were strict Congregationalists. To them, Williamstowns' isolation was ideal for defending young minds from Unitarianism, which from its base at Harvard was having a profound effect on American higher education.

The trustees called for the following curriculum for their new college: "In the first year,—the English, Latin, Greek, and French languages. In the second,—the several languages in part, Arithmetic, Geography, Algebra, Geometry, Mensurations, Comic Sections, Rhetoric and Logic. In the third,—Trigonometry, Navigation, Surveying, Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Chemistry. In the fourth year,—Metaphysics, Ethics, History, National Law, Civil Polity and Theology."

In Dec. 1799, President Fitch wrote in his diary, "The college is in a prosperous state. The students continue to be diligent and orderly. We admitted twenty-four freshmen, and have in all eighty-one members of college."

However, this rosy picture was not long lasting. The College was perpetually in need of funds. The by and large well educated faculty was disgusted by the country bumpkins Williams tended to attract. Williamstown was viewed as a hopeless location for a college and, by the second decade of the nineteenth century, the trustees devoted most of their time to seeking a suitable location in the Connecticut River valley to move the College. In 1821, after failing to obtain permission from the state to move, Williams' second president, Zephaniah Swift Moore, with half the students and faculty marched over the Mohawk Trail to found Amherst College and spawn one of the oldest collegiate sports rivalry. That Williams had a Commencement that year is due in no small part to the stirring speeches of two seniors, Emerson Davis and Erastus C. Benedict, who urged their classmates to "uphold the honor and reputation" of the College.

Moore's successor at Williams, Edward Door Griffin, succeeded in developing an infusion of funds and an expansion of the enrollment. Although the College did not achieve financial security until the twentieth century, it was able to fall back on state aid and fortunate if occasional donations to the conservative religious (if non-sectarian) institution.

Change has come slowly to the College, yet, if at any point in the College's history a student could be catapaulted forward two generations, he would find the place barely recognizable. (It is difficult to believe that Williams was the incubator of religious fervor that brought the American missionary movement to life.)

A typical freshman room in Morgan—in 1884, that is!

Although Williams has always attracted talented educators (witness President Mark Hopkins), it wasn't until the presidency of James Phinney Baxter (1937-61) that the College's academic reputation really began to grow. Since World War II, admissions have become progressively more selective.

The vocations and avocations of alumni have varied greatly. Far fewer graduates go into teaching and the ministry than in the past. A recent study indicates that Williams has the highest ratio of graduates in executive positions to enrollment of any other undergraduate college. Yet, an increasing number of students are seeking alternative job opportunities in such areas as graphics and the arts.

As elsewhere, the 1960s were a traumatic period for Williams. They witnessed the largest building program in the College's history. The abolition of fraternities was a bitter issue on campus and among alumni. The result was the development of an almost unique residential "house" system.

Student "activism" came late and was short lived. The Afro-American Society (forerunner of the Black Student Union) took over Hopkins Hall to present a list of demands and the College joined in the Cambodia strike.

The most revolutionary change was reserved for the 1970s. In 1971, the College admitted its first freshman class containing women. The repercussions are still being felt, although a student-faculty committee concluded that the transition had been made surprisingly smoothly.

The town has changed as much as the college, although it has grown more slowly. In 1776, the population of Williamstown was 1081. Today it stands at 8247. The four graduates of 1795 compare with the 471 who received degrees last June.

By and large relations between the town and College have been good, although the College has never completely lost "aristocratic" and "egg-head" labels. At the College's founding, many townspeople were angered at losing their "free school." During the 1950s bitter debate centered on the College's supposedly "left wing" faculty and a proposal to flouridate the town's water supported by the College.

Williams is the single largest employer and landowner in the town. With its tremendous economic power, the College has been forced to bend over backwards to avoid seeming to paternalistically rape the region. Few College or town decisions are made without a discussion of the impact on the other.

While town-gown relations are always in flux, the decision of the College to halt expansion of enrollment and the present lull in construction would seem to usher in a more stable period.

Custodial staff is experienced and dedicated

by Dennis O'Shea

It does take a while for some Williams freshmen to completely disentangle themselves from the apron strings they've clung to for eighteen years. Because of this, members of the college custodial staff won't be too surprised if some of you stumble out of the rack groggily mumbling "Morning, Mom" the first time their regular vacuuming or trash-collecting rounds interrupt your peaceful post-party repose.

Nor will the six custodians and six matrons who keep freshman dorms sparkling be unwilling to take time out to cheer up a lonesome frosh newly separated from friend or lover by several hundred miles of telephone wire and a seemingly unpayable bill from Ma Bell.

Because many freshmen are inexperienced with living away from home, the job of a janitor or matron in a frosh dorm takes on added dimensions, just as a junior adviser's role differs from that of most upperclassmen.

"They are authority figures, advisers, and friends (or enemies) all rolled into one," says Charles M. Jankey, Director of Student Housing. He calls his employees "warm, approachable human beings who truly have the welfare of the students at heart or they wouldn't be there."

The staff is full of experienced observers of the College, and each has stories that put today's Williams into perspective far better than most faculty or upperclassmen ever could. And why not? The custodians average over eight and a half years experience working right where the students live (John Blake is senior with 14 straight years in Williams Hall; his wife Giselle is the rookie. She's starting her sixth year next door at Sage). The average matron has spent nearly five years in her present assignment, and several of them worked elsewhere in the College earlier.

Ask Al and Elaine over in East-Fayerweather, for instance, about the switch in their dorms from men to women and back again as the College wrestled with the onset of coeducation. Check with Lu Park in Williams Hall on the demise of the fraternity system, or with Vince Albrycht about what you could see from your front window before they stuck the new library in front of Lehman, and just who was originally housed there.

And besides all their versatility at their secondary employment, the jack-of-all-trades janitors and their vacuum wielding colleagues do one heck of a fine job dusting desks, scrubbing the showers, and, with a minimum of grumbling, mopping up after those peculiarly freshmen extracurriculars your JA's will show you in the next few evenings.

According to Jankey, the College encourages the close student-custodial staff relationships. Always concerned with not letting things get out of hand, the administration nevertheless enthusiastically endorses their employees' getting together with freshmen in social situations such as guest meals and cocktail parties.

While the housing director said that he would personally prefer an end to the tradition of entry Christmas gifts to staff members because it is unfair to those that work in educational buildings, he has made no effort to stop them.

Besides, he added, "Help and cooperation on the part of the students are every bit as important to them as gifts at Christmas."

It's sometimes a bit tough to fully appreciate the efforts of the maintenance staff, and some students have been known to get a little off balance when the crews set to work at what might seem just a bit too bright and early. Nonetheless, it's a safe bet that by the time the year is over the class of '80 will be glad it got to know them.

Campus lacks political activism

by Scott Hoot

Williams has never had a highly political reputation and probably never will. It is fair to generalize that Williams students are largely sympathetic to the causes, and yet, too content and otherwise occupied to involve themselves. Eight years ago The Underground Guide to Colleges rated the Williams SDS chapter as virtually nonexistent. From that high-point the studnet body has followed the national lead and sunk into the political doldrums.

The following list contains those political organizations that existed at the end of last year and show signs of surviving the next.

THE WILLIAMS REPUBLICAN CLUB: A remnant of the days when GOPism thrived on campus. The club contains about 20 faithfuls, and sponsored occasional speakers and films, including Rep. Peter Peyser, and a left-to-right spectrum panel on the role of government in society.

WILLIAMS AMERICANS FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION: This is a chapter of the nation wide non-partisan organization to promote liberal causes in this country. Its most important function is lobbying the Congress and state legislatures. The current national president is McGovern. At Williams the group consists mainly of the former Udall and Bayh supporters and a few liberal Republicans.

WILLIAMS ACTION COALITION: This group differs from the others in its lack of preoccupation with the electoral and legislative processes. Its aim is to introduce radical ideas to the community through dialogue, speakers, and films. Last year's events included a very successful showing of Hearts and Minds.

A miniscule chapter of the Young Americans for Freedom was started but really never got off the ground, last year.

Numerous attempts were made at the formation of a Democratic club but the prospective clientele chose to channel their efforts elsewhere. The nucleus for such a group might lie with last year's Carter group.

Talk of a Common Cause chapter was heard at the end of the year—enterprising frosh might look into this.

Freshmen take active role in housing choices

In unprecedented numbers, freshmen took an active role in choosing their living set-ups and roommate, according to Dean of Admissions Philip F. Smith.

"Close to 90 per cent of the class indicated some housing preference," he said. "The amazing thing is that so many freshmen requested non-smoking roommates," (almost three-quarters).

"Selecting freshmen room assignments is one of the most important decisions made," said Dean of Freshmen Lauren R. Stevens. "Most of the people's friends (throughout their years at Williams) are those they lived with freshman year."

Stevens noted that the College issued an expanded room application for freshmen, inviting them to indicate preferences in roommates and dormitory or rooming situation.

He added that most freshmen are surprisingly familiar with the campus before they get here. Many freshmen request specific dormitories, entries and even rooms.

According to Smith, this year more freshmen requested housing in Morgan than there were rooms available.

The revised room application form also specifically allows freshmen to request to room with members of a specific race.

"We will have a substantial number of racially mixed rooming situations this year," said Stevens.

Housing shortage

generating three more rooms, affiliated with the first floor of Fayerweather (men). Four bedrooms for men have been created in the basement of Lehman, which will be affiliated with Lehman East.

Philip F. Smith, Director of Admissions, said that the unexpected number of freshmen is the result of a miscalculation of the percentage of students who would respond favorably to acceptances.

Dean of Admissions, Frederick C. Copeland noted that this is a result of fewer early decision applications, Amherst's expansion to coeducation and the fact that Dartmouth, Radcliffe and Princeton were all increasing the number of women they were accepting.

It didn't work out that way. Stevens noted that one explanation making the rounds was that more women accepted by both Williams and Dartmouth chose Williams than in past years.

"My biggest regret," said Smith, "is that we couldn't accept anyone from the waiting list."

What are JAs?

Junior Advisers are often the first persons to greet the freshmen and sometimes the most anxious to bid them good-bye. After all, when Sage F attacks Williams E with barrels of water for the fifth consecutive day, it's the Junior Advisers (JAs) who pay Dean Stevens a visit. Of course, it was they who taught freshmen what water fights were in the first place.

Unlike advisers at most other colleges, Williams' freshman advisers are not paid or compensated by the College. Yet, in a given year almost half of the sophomore class may apply to be JAs. JAs have been carefully selected from a large applicant pool.

JAs organize Freshman Days, arrange social activities, are sources of information for frosh in the coming weeks and according to Lauren R. Stevens, Dean of Freshmen, are "explicators of the nebulous Williams way."

Eph sports: What to expect from a Little Three team

by Tim Layden

Welcome freshmen! Welcome to Williams College, home of the purple mountains (which always appear to be green), Ephmen and Ephwomen (which is what you are, like it or not), and one of the top small-college athletic programs around (which the NCAA hasn't figured out yet, so don't you try).

Finding yourself now in the midst of unpacking yourselves from a seemingly endless succession of suitcases, think back on any non-essentials you might have left behind before making the trek to Williams.

Perhaps your string of garlic bulbs, used to ward off overly demanding Philosophy professors. Or maybe your magnifying glass, which you understand will be necessary after 10,000 pages of a 15,000-page week. Or worse yet, could be you've left your three-year-old topsiders at home, and how can anyone get by with just two pair of topsiders?

Well, put all these frivolous worries aside, for you have no doubt forgotten many trifles of greater value than those mentioned on the above list.

For instance, very few freshmen enter Williams College with a raccoon coat and a Williams pennant; which are, of course, necessary for attendance at all home football games. (Not to mention a shoe horn for squeezing people into Weston Field for the Amherst or Wesleyan game.)

Another frequent absentee among the belongings of an incoming freshman is a set of earmuffs, vital for retaining one's hearing and sanity when sitting through a basketball game in Lasell gym.

Starting to get the message? Good, let's continue the checklist. How about your construction worker's hard hat to protect yourself from flying hockey pucks (and perhaps a few flying hockey fans) during home hockey contests in Chapman Rink? Didn't think so.

All right, any unsuspecting freshman could be forgiven for not realizing that Williams actually does possess an athletic program, with real live teams and full schedules, but the following items should not be missing from any footlocker, suitcase, or other travelling implement.

Sneakers, for use in playing every intramural sport on campus, other than hockey, and probably that, too, at times. Williams boasts an IM program ranging from football to ping pong, and most of the student body gets involved. Sneakers are needed for most sports. Sorry preppies, Walabees don't count.

A willingness to try and master the use of a lacrosse stick. A sport which few Williams students play before arriving on campus, lacrosse (or lax, as it is more commonly referred to) is nearly as prevalent a time-killer as baseball or football in most places.

A frisbee, or the ability to throw one. Williams draws only a small portion of its student body from California, but one wouldn't know it to see the expertise with which some ersatz beachcombers toss the frisbee around. Have no fear, it's a technique easily mastered.

Williams, contrary to the frightening descriptions rendered forth in many of the publications received by high school seniors (highly competitive atmosphere, etc.), is not merely a breeding ground for future Einsteins. Oh, of course, the academic load is there, but so are many other things, and athletics are something which cannot help but become apart of any Williams student's life.

Beginning with the fall, the Williams football program stands on its own merit, especially since the arrival of Head Coach Bob Odell five seasons ago.

In these five years the football team here has snagged five straight Little Three crowns, an unprecedented feat, and twice beaten favored Amherst squads to turn the trick.

Last year's juggernaut was ranked high among the nation's small colleges in nearly all phases of team defense, which was the key to a 7-0-1 season, marred only by an opening game 3-3 tie with Trinity.

Several members of that squad, however, have been lost to graduation, as was the case a year ago. Leading the defensive returnees will be co-captain middleguard Emmett Creahan and tackle Mike Powers. Linebacker Jim Spaulding, and defensive backs Dave Libardi and Tod Nelp close out the returning defensive starters.

Offensively, quarterback Don Wallace, who has thrown 15 touchdown passes in the past two seasons, despite being used as a third down-passing situation quarterback much of the time, will have the nod.

The rest of the backfield is also in tact, as co-captain Tom Redden will handle the fullback spot, and senior Charlie Carrier returns at halfback. Junior Scott Harrington, a flashy ballcarrier, should man the wingback position. A veteran offensive line, featuring three-year starter Tim Dunn, is nearly intact. Paul Zabroske and Lee Kitchin return to starting spots as well.

As one can readily see, the Williams football program, under Odell, is at its zenith, having posted a 34-5-1 record in five years. This year, as always, a great deal of talent returns, but does so to face a new challenge from rapidly improving Wesleyan, picked by many to win the Little Three. Arch-rival Amherst continues to try and rebuild a crumbling program.

Football is unquestionably the number one spectator sport at Williams, but if contact of the bone-crunching type isn't your bag, soccer is also a popular activity. Coach Jeff Vennell's squads have been a consistent winner over the past few years, and the youth on last year's unit augers well for the future.

Golf, Cross-country (which posted an unbeaten dual meet season last year), and Rugby, a fast-growing club sport, close out the men's activity for the fall. The Williams women's program, however, an impressive statistical force for the past two years, with an incredible won-lost percentage, also provides loads of activity in the fall.

Varsity schedules are offered in cross-country, field hockey, tennis, and swimming. Women's volleyball will open its inaugural season as a club sport.

The fall semester at Williams not only features intercollegiate activity of some sort on almost every day of the week, but also intramural games on Cole Field, victories which may soon mean more to many of you than any varsity win.

"Winter" sports start regular season play as early as Thanksgiving, so the breather between the two seasons is brief, giving Ephpersons a chance to become sports fans of the first order.

While freshmen enjoyed their last week in the sun, the football team began practicing with double sessions. Ephmen face the difficult challenge of bettering a 7-0-1 record and a Little Three title. Coach Joseph M. Dailey directs this practice. Kenny Schoetz's white teeth glow in the summer sun. The Eph's first game is September 24 against Hamilton at Weston Field. (photo by Tague)

VOL. 90, NO. 2 | WILLIAMS COLLEGE | SEPTEMBER 9, 1976

Too many frosh and returnees

Over-enrollment plagues college

by David R. Ross

College officials offer a fairly simple explanation of this fall's over-enrollment: too many freshmen were accepted, too few students withdrew from the College and too many decided to return.

More exact explanations become entangled in the fact that the enrollment picture has been changing from day to day and more recently from hour to hour. Further complicating the picture is the problem of defining who is officially enrolled. This confusion has led a few area radio stations to place the enrollment at 1978, far above the actual number of students who are enrolled in courses at Williams.

According to Dean of the College Peter Berek, the actual number of students "in residence in Williamstown and enrolling in undergraduate courses" as of Sept. 2 was 1915 (as compared with 1855 at that time last year. The 1978 figure includes students on exchange at other schools, on study abroad programs, or otherwise granted academic leaves of absence. For record keeping reasons they are officially included in enrollment figures kept by the Registrar.

Berek said that he expected that the enrollment figure would drop below 1900 as classes got under way today.

"For budgetary purposes, 1840 is the figure the Provost uses" as the nominal size of the College, Berek said. "It would be only an accident if we actually got that many students."

He added that it was more an average figure for the year. Enrollment in the first semester is usually about 20 students higher than in the spring. Last fall's enrollment of 1855 fell to 1825 by second semester. Berek noted that if a trend toward increased mid-year and mid-semester withdrawals continues, the final average enrollment figures for the year could actually fall much closer to the Provost's target figure.

Overenrollment factors

The nature of the College's enrollment problems is clearly delineated by a comparison of key enrollment indicators. In the fall of 1975 the freshman class exceeded the target figure by three students (a relatively normal year according to Director of Admissions Philip F. Smith). This year, the Class of '80 is 17 over the target figure. The total number of student withdrawals fell from 98 last fall to 74 this fall. At the same time, the number of students returning to the College after exchanges, leaves of absences and other time off rose from 46 last fall to 60 as of Sept. 2.

Associate Dean Nancy J. McIntire noted that normally exchange students from Williams and entering Williams tend to neutralize each other. Last year, Williams was a slight net importer of exchanges; this year it will be a slight net exporter, Berek indicated.

Ross Keller, the new Director of Food Services ponders what condiment to garnish his salad with. The expanded salad bar, plus more ice cream and soda are the main new features of this year's school board program. (photo by Read)

Changes in food service appear student oriented

by Carl Bettinger

The head of the new food service, Ross Keller, said he expected students to be "pleased with the larger and more varied menus the new service will offer." In addition to improved menus, Keller said he hopes to upgrade the overall quality of the College's food services, through changes in individual dining hall management.

The new menus will include at least two main entrees at each meal, one of which will be a complete vegetarian meal. Ice cream will be served twice daily and soda will now be available at both lunch and dinner. The salad bars in all dining facilities have been enlarged as well.

Major administrative changes involve the promotion of several of the College's chefs to positions of unit managers. Those promoted were Robert Rickert of Cheshire, Mass., Edith McLaughlin of Bennington, Vt., and Roy Clark of North Adams, Mass.

Managers will be appointed to supervise each of the four main units in the new dining system: Greylock, Mission Park, Baxter and Driscoll Halls, and the row houses.

Neither Keller nor Clark said they foresaw any budgetary problems with the new services administration. Both mentioned that the new administration will welcome student recipies and general suggestions. Clark said he will also welcome comparisons between the new services and food services at other colleges and universities.

According to Keller, the format for guest meals will continue unchanged, and Clark predicted that there will be more "ethnic" meals served than last year.

Keller replaced David R. Woodruff as head of the dining services on July 1. Before coming to Williams, he worked for nineteen years as Director of Community Services at Saint Lawrence University where he was directly involved in food service management.

New housing options explored by the College

The College is planning or considering the addition of three houses to the campus housing stock while the futures of Garfield House and Dewey House remain in jeopardy. All three new houses would be of the row house variety and would be located near the center of the campus.

According to Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad, renovation work on a former faculty house on Stetson Court should begin later this month. He said the College wants the work to be "permanent" so it is unlikely it will be completed in time for occupation before the close of first semester.

The other two new houses, Woodbridge House and Dropper House, located behind the Faculty House, can only join the housing pool if the College wins its appeal of a town decision. The houses failed to meet state building regulations because some of the ceilings were as much as ten inches below the minimum of 7'6".

Roosenraad indicated Woodbridge could quickly be converted to student housing if the state waves the height regulation. Director of Physical Plant Peter Welanetz said that the cost of installing safety equipment in Dropper House would not be justified by the number of students who would

Frosh given priority

Computer did schedules

by Scott Fenn

The Registrar's Office has instituted a new system for scheduling students in courses this semester. The new system utilizes a computer to schedule student courses whereas in the past the job has been done manually by Assistant Registrar Cathy Winn.

According to Registrar George Howard, the switch to the use of the computer has been planned for some time but wasn't really possible until the Xerox 530 computer was installed in Bronfman. He said that the new system was expected to save both time and money for the College.

A computer program was developed to assign courses, sections, and labs according to student preferences as expressed in pre-registration wherever possible, according to a report released by the Registrar's Office. Freshmen, who weren't asked for section preferences, were distributed evenly among the sections of multi-section courses.

According to the report, the computer program also contained guidelines governing the balancing of multi-section courses and a priority list to select which students should be bumped out of a section of a course if more students preferred that section than could be allowed. Sections of a multi-section course each had to be within 10 per cent of the average size section for that course.

The report goes on to state that the computer program scheduled students in courses with the primary objective of avoiding conflicts in a student's schedule. It adds that "all students whose schedules now show a conflict do so either because the student signed up for conflicting courses, or because the section into which the student could have fit was canceled."

After avoiding conflicts, the program's second objective was to avoid schedules which would require a student to miss lunch, that is continuous classes from 11:30 to 1:15. Next in the order of priorities, the report continued, came freshmen's and then upper-classmen's courses

Thirty-one receive faculty positions

Twenty-three men and eight women received appointments to the Williams College faculty this semester for terms ranging from one semester to three years. According to Dean of the Faculty Neil R. Grabois, the Board of Trustees made most of the decisions at meetings last semester.

Grabois also said that two faculty members denied tenure had their contracts extended because it was "mutually convenient" for the College and the professors.

Among the five visiting professors here for a semester or less is Richard B. Sewall, a 1929 Williams graduate. Sewall, who spoke at Convocation last fall, has been appointed the Margaret Bundy Scott Visiting Professor of English for the first semester. He is a professor of English at Yale University, where he received his Ph.D. in 1933 and has taught since 1934. His published works include The Life of Emily Dickinson, for which he received the National Book Award in 1974.

John C. Gardner, author of best-selling novels Nickel Mountain, The Sunlight Dialogues, The Wreckage of Agathon, and Grendel, has been appointed visiting part-time lecturer in English for the second semester. He has also published many books on Medieval and epic poetry and numberous stories, poems and radio plays. The opera that he wrote with Joseph Baber was accepted by the New York City Opera Company. Gardner won the National Endowment for the Arts Grant in 1971 and the Guggenheim Award in 1973.

Harold C. Martin, president of the American Academy in Rome and president of Union College from 1965-1974, was appointed Margaret Bundy Scott Professor of Literature for the second semester. He received his A.B. from Hartwick College in 1937, his M.A. from the University of Michigan in 1942, his Ph.D. from Harvard University in 1954, and several honorary degrees, including ones from Trinity, Union and Skidmore.

Appointed Robert Sterling Clark Visiting Professor of Art for the first semester was Creighton E. Gilbert. He received his B.A. from New York University in 1942 and his Ph.D. from New York University Institute of Fine Arts in 1955. Since 1969, he has been a professor at Queens College of the City University of New York, heading the art department from 1969,1972.

Joining the faculty for the Winter Study Period is Robert Sterling Clark Visiting Professor of Art is John M. Rosenfield. Rosenfield is a professor at Harvard University's Department of Fine Arts, where he received his Ph.D. in 1959.

Appointed to terms of two years were Thomas A. Newton, assistant professor of chemistry, and Carl I. Van Duyne, assistant professor of economics.

Newton received his B.S. in 1965 from Hobart College, his M.S. in 1968 from Bucknell University and his Ph.D. in 1973 from the University of Delaware. He has been a post-doctoral associate at RPI since 1973.

Van Duyne earned his A.B. at Princeton University in 1968 and his M.A. and Ph.D. at Stanford University in 1969 and 1976 respectively.

Four men have received one-year appointments:

Kenneth A. Jewett, appointed part-time instructor in chemistry, took his B.S.C.E. at San Jose State College in 1970 and his M.S. at Stanford University in 1973.

Spring Street Wrap-up

"They Write by Night" is pleased to inform upperclassmen of important innovations on the Spring Street scene and to introduce freshmen to the exciting business district of Williamstown.

The House of Walsh, taking off on the fantastic success of the Clip Shop, will be offering limited barber service this year. Their haircuts will "reflect the style of the clothing we sell. There will be very little layering." In reaction to this, St. Pierre's Barber Shop has installed three racks of clothing to be sold along with their hair cuts. It too will be reflective of the "St. Pierre style"; leisure suits will be their main item.

A spokesman for the Williams Newsroom announces that "students should be surprised and quite impressed at the expansion of our services."

King's Liquors is considering phasing out its sales of beer, wine, and liquor to expand its check-cashing services. "The liquor market has all but disappeared since the demise of fraternities; our heaviest customers now are the English teachers and a few under-age townies. We get a house party now and then, but that's nothing, right?"

A rumored merger is in the making between the Pizza House and Colonial Pizza. The name of the combined facility will be "The Pizza Pizza Colonial House" (translated from the Greek).

Williamstown National Bank announces that it will add eight additional "surprise holidays" to its calendar this year. "And don't think our State Road branch will be open every Friday afternoon anymore . . ." warns one teller.

Renzi's Book Store has stepped up its security measures against shoplifters. An airport-like search may be required during peak hours. Dewey's Book Store has modified its filing-shelving system—details on the changes are still vague.

Hart's Drug Store will run its popular "Welcome Back" condom sale during the first two weeks of September. This sale usually clears out their entire inventory of condoms—a slow item during the school year—making valuable shelf space for more popular items such as shampoo, nail polish, and mouthwash.

"Innovation" is the key word in describing this year's management of The Log. Mogen-David wine will be offered for the first time, and three new sandwiches are available: "the Angus," "the Bill Morris," and "the Falk." In addition, the Perkins room has been permanently converted into a "Disco Palace." Colorful Japanese lanterns will provide the atmosphere, and Michelle "Disco Lady" Cutsforth will set feet a tappin' with her special brand of "hustle" music. "This should dispel the notion that The Log is nothing but an overpriced bore," says manager Gene Falk.

The Purple Pub announces the addition of three new drinks to its bar menu. Now available are Gin and Tonics, Dewar's and Water, and Rum and Cokes. The Health Food Store promises some surprises on its shelves this year. They have added a large rack containing Kool-Pops, Slim Jims, Pringles, and New Chicken Hot-Dogs. And Betty's Coffee Shop has just opened its back room to accommodate large parties and weddings.

There has been no word from Abercrombie & Fitch, but in light of their financial woes we can only assume that their projected Williamstown branch store has been scratched. And until the Stetson Court hopping Mall is completed, that's the round-up for this fall. Happy Shopping!

TONY SPAETH

Better Food

Ross Keller's biggest challenge as Director of Food Services will not be to solve the problems which make food services at Williams less than they should be. He is a multi-talented man who in his two months here has developed a solid understanding of the College community. He has the support of those above him and those below him in his efforts to improve food services.

His biggest challenge will be to isolate the problems which need to be solved. He is going to need more input from students than his predecessor got. To get that input, he is going to have to take the initiative. One need be at Williams only a month to realize that student complaints rarely leave dinner table discussions.

Mr. Keller will face last year's problems first, low quality Sunday suppers, crowded Baxter lines and lack of menu variation. But when these are solved, students will likely not find eating at Williams drastically better since the difference between a good meal and a bad meal is often something minor: onions in the tuna fish salad, lemon-aid two watery or the server's hair in the food.

The new food service director must find a way to obtain these minor criticisms. Keller has taken a forward step in at least one area by placing former Mission Park chef Roy Clark in charge of handling input from row houses and similarly decentralizing authority in the major dining halls. A suggestion box, which worked effectively at the Fort last year, may be another device to draw minor criticisms.

We can (and do) wish Mr. Keller luck in his efforts, but he is going to need more than that. He must hear from the students who don't like eggs in their potato salad, from the students who want fruit at breakfast and from the students who dislike the disposition of their dining hall boss.

The Gamble

Monday at noon the College's gamble faces its first major test; the first rainy weekday noon, it faces its second. If the lines at Baxter are short, if the seating is adequate, and if meal attendance at Tyler, Driscoll and the Fort is adequate, the gamble has paid dividends—Central Mail Service is a success.

But if the lines are long and six persons eat at the Fort and 15 at Tyler, the College has got what it asked for in its decide now, consult later decision—problems.

College officials have steadily maintained, and rightfully so, that the College should have a central mail service. The reduction in costs and increase in reliability are long overdue. But in discussions with the Record last year, they indicated that problems with Baxter Hall, seating and line problems in the dining hall and space problems for freshman activities, should be solved before a decision was made to place central mail service in Baxter Hall. In late May, the administration reversed this seemingly sound position.

The losers in the process will be the freshman class, which will suffer until the problems related to over use of Baxter Hall are solved. The class has lost half of its lounge space and probably the right to a quick lunch. Time will tell the extent of that loss.

Applause

Long lines have become a traditional part of the enrollment days, but this year the problem eased. Only students who insisted on registering Tuesday morning waited on lines, and those lines moved more quickly than lines did in the past. Baxter Hall served lunch to almost 750 persons on Tuesday, yet lines at Greylock dining hall and at the north end of Baxter were short, when existent.

While College officials quakingly prepare for a deluge of complaints concerning the new mailing system and housing hassles and while students sharpen their pencils to deliver those complaints, we pause to applaud Registrar George Howard, Director of Food Services Ross Keller for reacting to past difficulties and working to streamline those hassle-full registration days.

"I know my medical school acceptance is here, but I can't get to my new mailbox!"

NEWS BRIEFS

COURSE CHANGES

The Registrar's Office has instituted a new course change procedure effective this semester. Under the new procedure students must complete a course change card for any changes made to the class schedule they received during registration.

According to Registrar George Howard, the major reason for the procedural change was to give instructors more information as to who is actually enrolled in the courses during the first few weeks of classes. He also admitted that the new system would be somewhat more inconvenient for students wishing to change courses than was the old procedure involving course cards.

Course change cards are available in the Registrar's Office and require the signatures of both the instructor whose course is being dropped and the instructor whose course is added. Course changes will be allowed until 4:00 p.m. Sept. 17 and students are responsible for returning completed course change cards to the Registrar's Office by that time.

Howard stated that he did not anticipate that students would have any problems in obtaining a signature from an instructor whose course was being dropped. He noted that students were not obligated to explain why they wanted to get out of a course and said that many instructors would probably have department secretaries handle the procedure.

The Calendar and Schedule Committee is expected to study the new course change procedure and consider improvements for the Spring semester.

RED PHONES

Public access telephones were installed in all upperclass housing facilities and in each freshman dorm during the summer. The red toll denial phones accommodate all calls within Williamstown, North Adams and Pownal, Vt. and are intended for use by students, for emergency communications only, custodians and servicemen.

The phones have been installed in June for a number of years to service summer conferees while the Centrex system is not operating. In the past however, they have been removed in the fall. According to Ann Marlowe, head of the post office staff, the college found that "the phones could be added on a permanent basis at very little cost."

Additional student phones were also installed in Mission Park. To permit maximum occupancy of the building, every room now has telephone service.

FURNITURE SCARCITY

Despite the unusually high enrollment and a College decision to replace or renovate furniture in East College and Fayerweather and Currier Halls, most rooms have their full complement of furniture, according to Charles M. Jankey, Director of Student Housing.

"Desks and bureaus are the only items that are really tight," he said, adding that the College was forced to use bureaus in Seeley House that are 50 years old. "We hope to replace those shortly," he said. Jankey added that the major challenge was in locating and ensuring a correct distribution of furniture.

"Paul Sheils '76 did yeomen-duty" checking to make sure each room had its complete set of furniture, he said. "It can be a shock to get to your room and find something missing."

be housed there.

Roosenraad described the three houses as "the kind of space students seem to desire."

The zoning variance which allows the College to use Dewey House for student housing will expire at the end of the '77-78 school year. Roosenraad said the College must decide whether to reapply for a variance and improve Dewey House (at some cost) or whether to remove it from the student housing stock. The present variance only allows Dewey to house women. The house, which is located on the corner of Route 2 and Southworth Street, holds 15 students.

The Record's easy 'how-to' guide for roadtripping

Four years ago, Williams left the ranks of all-male colleges. Since that time, most observers would agree that it is coming closer and closer to true coeducation, where the interests and sensibilities of both sexes receive equal emphasis.

Equally apparent, however, is the block of artificiality which still seems to cover most social intercourses. Relationships between the sexes remain stilted and unnatural for large numbers of students.

The result has been that many men and women have looked off campus for agreeable companionship and a "good time". The men fall back on a centuries old tradition of roadtripping to the seven sisters and beyond. Women on the other hand, have had to rely on an independence and gumption which has non-plussed many a beer-bellied Ephman.

The quest for the perfect roadtrip on the part of both sexes has produced a wide spectrum of reactions to a relatively small number of schools. As a rule, generalizations are almost always unfair and certainly made inaccurate by the passage of time. They do, however, offer a point of departure and are a lot of fun to make—especially over a few brews.

Skidmore: Chances are your initial venture away from the cozy confines of the Purple Valley will be in the direction of Skidmore College, located just down the road from the racetrack in Saratoga Springs, N.Y., about an hour's ride northwest of Williamstown.

In general, Skids women are more apt to put their books aside in favor of partying than their counterparts from Smith and Mt. Holyoke. Consequently, mixers, whether on campus or at D'Andrea's, can be a lot of fun and provide ample amounts of both females and beer.

One mixer in particular that shouldn't be missed is the mixer on the Green, ostensibly billed as an introduction to the social mores of the college for Skids frosh.

Skidmore is most renowned, however, for the incredible amount of bars which surround the campus and highlight downtown Saratoga Springs. Thus, very little time is spent partying on-campus and roadtrip agendas always include at least a token stop at several of these establishments.

Perhaps the most famous is D'Andrea's, usually referred to as D'A's. Featuring mixers, fooseball contests, and a number of specials on drinks and food, it's a good spot to visit at some point during your stay, since you're bound to run into some people you know.

Fast becoming the most popular spot in town is the Tin and Lint, which mixes the quaint furnishings of a coffee house with the atmosphere of your favorite neighborhood tavern.

If you're into the disco scene, then The Rafters is the place to go. Replete with strobe lights of every shape and form and the best dance tunes around, it exudes an atmosphere totally different than any other in town.

A bar that used to be a favorite of Williams men is The Hub. It's about as wide as a bowling alley, though, and forces everyone to learn the bump while holding drinks in each hand and not spilling a drop.

A final word should be given to the Golden Grille, an all-black bar that opens its doors to Caucasians on Thursday nights. This establishment has become quite popular of late, owing both to its unique atmosphere and to the fact that Thursday nights in Saratoga Springs are quarter beer nights at most bars in town.

Consequently, many Williams men are heading to the Skids on Thursdays after getting primed at guest meals, which, by chance, also fall on Thursdays.

Smith: Smith must be considered the male roadtrip target of the Northeast. In fact, you really ought to hit a Smith "all college" mixer just to find out what's happening at other colleges. The girls tend to disappear, but it can be fun seeing how many colleges are represented.

Less of the meat-market atmosphere exists at the smaller house parties, although even these become inundated on two or three mixer weekends. Baxter bulletin boards are regularly covered by mimeographed posters announcing Smith house parties.

Once you've made contact with the girl of your dreams, you'll have little trouble finding things to do. Smith's administration has organized a surprising range of activities over weekends.

A brief glance at their guide to events reveals folk music, cabarets, ensemble concerts and special art exhibits. If you're there during the day you ought to take a look at their Horticultural Gardens, among the most beautiful in New England.

Northampton itself tends to roll over at night.

By all means, however, stop in at Sheehan's bar. Woodwork fixtures, and beer stains appear to date back to the 20's, while the beer is plentiful and cheap.

Mt. Holyoke: Located in scenic South Hadley, Mount Holyoke is rapidly making a run at Smith and Skidmore for the top spot in roadtrip rankings. Tired of losing male attention to Smithies, Holyoke gals have put together an impressive series of big weekends, featuring four or five house parties for the price of one and culminating in last spring's superb Les McCann concert.

In general, the consensus seems to be that of the women's colleges, MH is closest to Williams in atmosphere and that you are likely to find more in common with a girl there (besides your native love of beer and the Grateful Dead) than at other colleges.

South Hadley, unfortunately, is the Philadelphia of New England. It's a great place for incisive term papers on urban blight in rural Massachusetts. A night on the town, on the other hand, has ended as soon as it began. Bring your date to Williamstown.

Vassar: In large measure, you may thank Mathew Vassar's experiment on the Hudson for Williams being coed today. Our omniscent trustees tried an experimental exchange program with Vassar in 1969 which led to our present condition.

Vassar mixers can be a lot of fun; their major drawback being the time involved in getting there. Vassar girls still tend to be smart, literate, and a lot of fun to be with. They enjoy getting away from work.

Determination, patience, and an opposable thumb are all one needs to go on a roadtrip. Ephmen are rumored to have all three; some even have their own cars. (photo by Read)

On the other hand, all reports on Vassar males seem to be negative. Lacking in intellectual talent, they rely on rudeness and Brut to woo the female animal.

Mount Greylock High School: Mixers here—quaintly referred to as dances—are "Happy Days" revisited. However, several Williams women have indicated that they can find a better time here than with any Williams men they've run into.

Amherst: As you will quickly find out, we have a very low opinion of this bastard offspring of ours. (It was founded by Williams second president, Zephamiah Swift Moore). Smith and Mt. Holyoke report that Amherst boys tend to be raucous, nude, obnoxious and overly sure of themselves—in short, not worth the 1½ hour drive for Williams women.

Of the few women who are coming to Amherst's first attempt at coeducation, we reserve judgment while wishing them good luck.

In addition to their entertaining football efforts, Amherst does offer a casino at the end of February which may be worth a shot. A lot of people seem to enjoy making fools of themselves in tuxedoes while having a really good time.

Dartmouth: Nestled away in the beautiful hills of Hanover, N.H. (and you thought we were going to say Williamstown), Dartmouth resembles Williams in many ways, only bigger. This applies to its physical plant, its athletic stress, and its male population. The L. L. Bean look predominates throughout the campus and Dartmouth men in general appear to be less intellectually oriented and more rowdy than their Williams counterparts.

Roadtrips to Hanover, although lengthy, are usually well worth the ride, and their Winter Carnival in February is a must. As far as girls go, there's a nursing school on campus (not affiliated with the college, though) whose students are on par with Green Mountains but who'll always tell visitors that they attend Dartmouth College.

Union: Why, you might ask, would anyone want to roadtrip to Union in the first place?

Possessing little of the beauty and virtually none of the charm inherent in most colleges, Union has nevertheless become one of the best roadtrips Ephs sports fans can undertake.

This is due to the fact that Union now considers the Williams game in any sport (especially football and basketball) to be the biggest game on their schedule.

Furthermore, Union men are renowned for their pus towards anyone from Williams and always bring a large, extremely vocal contingent with them to a Williams game.

Green Mountain College: Located in Poultney, Vermont, Green Mountain College has long been the favorite of Dartmouth men who prefer their girls to look and act like Carol Wayne. As a result, the school has become affectionately known as "The Groin" from Hanover to Hartford. Need any more be said?

North Adams State: Supposedly there are girls in North Adams, but we haven't seen any. As for guys, well, what school do you think Spring Street's Friday night hotrodders attend?

If, however, you're talked into visiting one of their mixers some dull Saturday night, rest assured that there's usually more beer than can be drunk.

Russell Sage College: or "The Cage" as those more intimate with its pleasures call it, is living proof to the adage that getting there is half the fun.

Located in Troy, N.Y., RS has kept its nineteenth-century image while the rest of the town continued to degenerate. This reporter upon arrival was first asked to relinquish I.D. and then requested to wait for the hostess of the party responsible for the journey to come and escort him through the halls. If you can look past the strict parietals, the roads over Petersburg Pass should provide more challenge than the women.

Convocation theme

Liberty and Equality

The fall convocation "Liberty and Equality: Perspectives and Prospects," formally opens the academic year at 11 a.m. Staurday in Chapin Hall. Edmund S. Morgan, Sterling Professor of History at Yale University and author of several books on colonial history, will deliver the convocation address, "Government by the People?" He is among six persons receiving honorary degrees at the ceremony.

All of the honorary degree recipients except for Morgan will join Nathaniel M. Lawrence, Massachusetts Professor of Philosophy, in a panel discussion entitled "Liberty and Equality: The next 100 years," Friday at 8:30 p.m. in Jesup Hall.

At convocation, President John W. Chandler will present honorary Doctor of Letters degrees to Professor Morgan and to Max Lerner, moderator of Friday night's panel; and honorary Doctor of Law degrees to Clarence Clyde Ferguson, Jr., Dorothy Fosdick, John Hilton Knowles, and Norman Redlich.

The convocation procession of faculty and seniors in cap and gown will begin at 10:30 Saturday morning. Both the convocation and the panel discussion are open to the public without charge, and no tickets are needed.

Morgan is the author of ten books, including The Puritan Dilemma; his most recent work, The Challenge of the American Revolution, is to be published in October. He has studied at Harvard and at the University of London, and served as chairman of the Brown University History Department before going to Yale in 1955. In 1971 the Yale chapter of Phi Beta Kappa awarded him the William Clyde DeVane Medal for outstanding teaching and scholarship, and the next year he received the Douglass Adair Memorial Award for scholarship in early American history. He was president of the Organization of American Historians in 1971-1972.

Max Lerner, who taught political science at Williams from 1938 to 1943, is an author, professor, syndicated columnist and lecturer. He is a Distinguished Professor of Human Behavior at the Graduate School of Human Behavior at San Diego, and a teacher at the New School in New York City. His newspaper column is printed throughout the United States and around the world. The author of several books, he is currently working on a study of American civilization in the '60's and '70's, to be called Third Century America. He studied law at Yale University and received his Ph.D. from Brookings Graduate School of Economics and Government.

Ferguson, Visiting Professor of Law at Harvard Law School, was the United States Representative on the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations from 1973 to 1975. He served as Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs, as United States Ambassador to Uganda, and as General Counsel to the United States Commission of Civil Rights. Formerly the Distinguished Professor of Law at Rutgers University Law School and Dean of Howard Law School, he took his A.B. at Ohio State University, LL.B. at Harvard Law School, and holds an LL.D. from Rutgers University.

Fosdick is the Professional Staff Director of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations. She has been the staff director of Senator Henry Jackson's Senate subcommittees on national security operations, a contributor to the New York Times, an editorial consultant to NBC, and has authored two books. She served in the Department of State from 1942 to 1953, and was a member of the first three General Assemblies of the United Nations. She earned her A.B. degree from Smith College, where she taught for four years, and her Ph.D. from Columbia University.

Knowles, president of the Rockefeller Foundation, is considered one of the country's outstanding clinician-administrators. Dr. Knowles' career has been closely identified with Massachusetts General Hospital, where he serves as General Director, and Harvard Medical School, where he is Professor of Medicine. A proponent of all-inclusive health care at the community level, he is the author of numerous articles and four books, one considered a classic in his medical specialty. He received his A.B. from Harvard College, and his M.D. from Washington University School of Medicine, holds 16 honorary degrees and has won 16 awards, including the Markle Scholar Award for contributions to medical education in 1969.

Redlich, a 1947 magna cum laude graduate of Williams, is dean of New York University School of Law. He has served as the city's Corporation Counsel under Mayor John V. Lindsay and as an assistant counsel to the President's Commission on the Assassination of President Kennedy. He received his LL.B. from Yale Law School and LL.M. from N.Y.U. School of Law, and is the author of several books and articles.

Repairs, renovation keep B&G busy

by Chip Buckner

When Hurricane Belle ripped through New England last August, those cool headed workers at B & G thought of it as just another ho-hum windstorm making life a little more interesting in the Berkshires.

For Cole Field, situated on a flood plain, flooding is not unusual. The six feet of water that swamped the lowlands was, however, a little more than expected. The major problem, according to Peter Welanetz, Director of Buildings and Grounds, was that the rising waters deposited trash on the field. A combination of factors, unusually slow rising waters and sieve-like fences reduced the trouble on Weston & Cole, causing Welanetz to proclaim "the fields are ready."

Predictably, not all the problems were outdoors. The custodial staff worked overtime to suction out the swamped Mission Park basement. In other residential houses, basement storerooms were opened and students' belongings moved off the floor to safe positions above the water. Welanetz, obviously pleased, congratulated his staff on their "excellent job."

In addition to flood work, groups of students, custodians and outside contracters have made improvements all over the campus. Most evident to returning students is the new $13,000 mailroom, but equally dramatic changes are occurring in the basement of Chapin, where by the end of October the $400,000 Phase I of the Chapin renovation will have been completed. Twenty-five new practice rooms are under construction to replace previously unused storage space. (Phases II & III, including external physical additions and major internal improvement, will proceed as soon as funds are available.)

Artists will note that the studios in Adams House are no longer there. The new facilities, which the college kept well within its $9500 budget, are located by the Drummond Factory of Spring Street. Minor alterations continue at Goodrich Hall where the lighting is now under repair.

Three-quarters of a million dollars have been spent on the renovation of the 1957 addition of Stetson Hall. The new faculty offices are described as "something you really should go take a look at." Work will proceed throughout the year as the college finds money with which to do so.

Mather House is bigger. The cramped Admissions Department has expanded into the extension of their building. Designed to be inconspicuous, the two new rooms fit right into the space beside the parking lot.

After mop-up operations from Belle were completed, B & G got down to routine summer repairs. The Log has been repainted. Row Houses have been painted inside and out, roofs and masonry have been repaired. Fire safety improvements, like the Red Phones, and general maintenance have taken place all over. All in all, giving an old friend, a fresh look for the fall.

Diehl named to replace Spurrier as News Director

Andrea L. Diehl '75 was recently appointed College News Director, replacing Robert D. Spurrier '70, who resigned in April to pursue a career in newspaper and magazine journalism. The College also hired Ray Boyer as a broadcast consultant, assisting the school in disseminating Williams news via radio and TV stations.

Diehl began work July 20. She was previously employed by the New Paper in Philadelphia, serving as a senior editor and feature writer. She had sole responsibility for the center entertainment section, including the articles, listings and layout. Diehl also worked as a reporter for the Philadelphia Inquirer for one summer and for the Express in Easton, Pa., for two summers. In 1971 she was valedictorian of her class at Easton Area High School.

In 1975 Diehl graduated summa cum laude from Williams with a double major in the history of ideas and art history. Elected to Phi Beta Kappa in her junior year, she was a student representative on the honorary degrees committee.

Boyer recently left his position as News Director of Pittsfield radio station WBEC to set up his own business. In his capacity as consultant, Boyer will help Williams expand its public information program beyond the traditional emphasis on print media. He will work closely with Andrea L. Diehl.

College plans no drop in students on transfer-exchange

College officials expect little change in transfer and exchange student policies despite an overenrollment of nearly 60 students this fall.

Dean of the College Peter Berek stressed that the admission of transfer and exchange students was not seen merely as a way of filling beds vacated by students in any given semester. Rather, the programs are sponsored because of the special talents and perspectives these students bring to the campus, he said.

Berek added that a major decrease in transfer student acceptances is not being seriously considered. Nor is there any desire to reduce the exchange program. He did indicate, however, that a slight surplus in the net number of students leaving campus on exchange would be the "most painless way" of easing a tight housing situation as the "bump" in the enrollment works its way through.

Associate Dean Nancy J. McIntire noted that Williams is not contracturally obligated to maintain specific levels of transfer and exchange students.

"There was nothing about exact numbers in the agreement signed by the 12 presidents (inaugurating the Twelve College Exchange)," she said. However, it was generally expected that each college would accept students in proportion to the number their students participating in the exchange, McIntire explained.

1900 students swell College

by George Schutzer

"We are clearly not a college of 1830 this fall; that cannot be denied," said Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad in describing the College's overenrollment, which has led to the use of Seeley House and a few Mission Park living rooms for student housing.

Just under 1900 students were expected to attend classes today, as Williams begins its 183rd year with one of the tightest housing situations in its history.

Normally, the College opens with about 1860 students, but after some juggling, college officials were able to generate housing for all students.

The housing problem was not as difficult as it was perceived to be in the middle of the summer because of 16 "last minute" no returns, Roosenraad said.

The College solved the bulk of the problem by allowing 143 students to live off-campus and assigning nine to live in Seeley House. In addition, as many as five students will be living in Mission Park living rooms and seven bed spaces were added in both the basements of Lehman and Fayerweather.

Roosenraad said "too many people will be off-campus" but the College was able to do it this year because many of the 38 faculty members on leave rented their houses to students. Normally, the College is concerned with flooding the town housing market.

Although the situation changes from hour to hour, conversations with College officials and house officers indicated there are only about four empty bed spaces on campus not counting additional Mission Park Living rooms. Roosenraad said this leaves the College with little flexibility to handle personal conflicts, but Charles M. Jankey, Director of Student Housing, urged students with problems to see either him or Roosenraad as soon as possible.

Both Roosenraad and Jankey predicted that more bed spaces would open up within the next week, which would give them more flexibility in making changes.

Because the freshman class was oversized, the College created an additional freshman entry in Currier Hall and moved the Perry House affiliates originally assigned to Currier to Mission Park and Seeley House. Seeley House was renovated at a cost of $12,500 this summer.

Freshmen will also be living in the new basement room of Fayerweather and Lehman Halls.

According to both Roosenraad and Dean of the College Peter Berek, the Currier entry will be returned to the upperclass housing pool next September. The extra rooms in Lehman and Fayerweather will be used to improve the housing situation for freshmen next year.

Both Roosenraad and Berek indicated that one factor which complicates the housing problem each fall is the College's difficulties in determining who will be returning.

"We really do need better information," Berek said. Roosenraad suggested putting "teeth behind the $200 deposit" required of all students by July 1. Berek suggested a better follow-up on students who do not send the deposit and announced the College intended to mail term bills earlier next year. Term bills were not mailed until mid-August of this summer.

Some students who did not send in deposits lost their rooms this year according to Berek.

Berek said the College has limited control of students who decide to return after a year or two away from the College. When students withdraw, they are informed that they may be readmitted subject to space availability, but neither Roosenraad nor Berek considered not granting readmission as a viable option.

Students who have withdrawn and want to return are supposed to notify the Dean late in the spring, but many do not do so until the summer, Berek indicated.

Dance Society hosts companies

On May 15, 1976, the National Council on the Arts honored Martha Graham in her dance company's 50th anniversary year. Among other things she said,

"Everyone has within him everything, all that memory that surges through you, and that is the hidden language, the wonderful, hidden language of the body and of the dancer. And the dancer transcends speech. He gives you, sometimes, yourself . . ."

Because of their belief in those words, the Williams College Dance Society Concert Series has, over the past four years, brought many superb choreographers and dancers to Williamstown.

The fifth Dance Concert Series, 1976-77 which will begin with the residency September 16-18 of the Cliff Keuter Dance Company. Formed by Mr. Keuter in 1969, this company has been enthusiastically praised for the excellence of its dancing and the provocative nature of Keuter's choreography. He combines striking strength, tenderness and puckish humor in a unique way. Although his movement shows awareness of balletic line, it is motivated from an elastic torso and his underlying sense of drama results in highly inventive spatial design and fascinating encounters among the dancers.

The Series will continue with the residency of The Margolit Dance Theatre Company March 10-12, 1977. Margalit Oved, the founder and choreographer of this Los Angeles based company was born in what was Aden and moved to Israel with the Yemenite Jews who immigrated there in 1948 with their centuries-old traditions intact. The series will conclude with the Paul Taylor Dance Company May 13-15. This is a joint project of the Mass. Council on the Arts and Humanities, and the Nat'l. Endowment for the Arts, administrated by the Mass. Arts and Humanities Foundation, Inc.

Cliff Keuter and Karla Wolfangle of the Cliff Keuter Dance Company performing "Twice". The spirited company will be in residence at Williams next week.

Music in Round opens Friday

MUSIC IN THE ROUND, the chamber music concert series founded and directed by Julius Hegyi and sponsored by the Williams College Department of Music, will open its twenty-fifth anniversary season with a concert on Friday, September 10, at 8:30 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel.

The Williams Trio (Mr. Hegyi, violin; Douglas Moore, violoncello; Stephen Dankner, piano) will play a Trio by Anton Arensky. Mr. Moore and Mr. Hegyi will play a Duo by Matyas Selber, and they will be joined by Susan St. Amour, viola, in a Trio by Lennox Berkeley. Schumann's Quintet will be the second half of the program, with Charlotte Hegyi at the piano and Janet Rowe, violin, joining the other string players.

Marking the birthday of the series will be two first-ever features, a "pops" concert in addition to the regular five evenings, and a premiere performance of a specially commission work by American composer Robert Starer. The pops concert will be on October 1, while the Starer quartet will be performed at the final concert on May 13. Dates of the other concerts are November 12, January 14, and March 4. Single and season tickets will be on sale at the door or may be ordered by mail through the Music Department at Williams College. All members of the Williams College community with identification cards will be admitted free of charge, and children are admitted at half the regular ticket price.

Frosh increase

The unusually large freshman class is the result of a decision to increase the number of acceptances by about two per cent, said Smith. Dean of Admissions Frederick C. Copeland cited the rise in the number of multiple applications per applicant from 3.5 to 4.5, Amherst's second year of coeducation and the decision of several Ivy League schools to expand their enrollment of women as reasons for the move.

However, "Williams was more competitive with the Ivies" among women acceptees than had been expected, Smith said. While Williams accepted essentially the same percentage of male and female applicants, 52 per cent of women accepted elected to attend as opposed to 46 per cent of men.

The smaller number of withdrawals, increased number of returnees continues a slight trend in that direction over the past few years, noted Berek. However, the magnitude of the shift this year was completely unexpected, he indicated.

College centralizes mail

Sally Coney & Andy O'Donnell

Although several potentially troublesome areas have yet to be resolved, the administration remains optimistic that the new centralized mail system in Baxter Hall will prove beneficial.

Non-receipt has always been a chronic problem, according to Business Manager Shane Riorden. "One of the strongest assets of centralization is the more dependable system for redirection of off-campus mail and mail belonging to students spending time away from Williams," Riorden said.

"Contact among students, faculty, and the administration should be greatly facilitated as a result of centralization," Dean Peter Berek said. The new system will permit intra-campus correspondence without the use of U.S. mail and will also create a central point where posted announcements will be visible to all students.

One of this service's main advantages is financial; because college mail no longer has to go through the U.S. Post Office before reaching student mailboxes Riorden estimates that the college will save about $4,000 per year. The cost of building the new mail room in Baxter was approximately $10,000 Berek said, with most of the money spent on new mail boxes.

"Let me emphasize that this was not principally a financial move," cautioned Berek. "It was to improve the mail service."

The administration considered random house improvements as only a temporary solution to a chronic problem. "We wanted to provide more reliable service on U.S. mail and more convenience and cheaper service on campus mail," Berek said. "The best way to accomplish these goals was by means of a centralized system."

The final verdict on the new system won't be delivered for several weeks, however, pending the resolution of several potentially troublesome repercussions of the Baxter centralization. These include:

Tube room: For the moment, the Rathskellar will serve as the freshman tube room, but "that may not remain satisfactory" Berek said, noting that the Rathskellar is used frequently on weekend nights as a coffee house.

Food lines: Increases in the Baxter food lines and in the snack bar's business are being "closely monitored" Berek said. "We hope students will continue to eat where they usually eat, although Mr. Keller (Director of Food Services) has told me that Baxter can handle the expected increase."

Row House meals: Attendance at row house meals, particularly by students affiliated with Fort Hoosac and Tyler, may be reduced now that students no longer receive their mail at the main house.

Berek said that while he was aware of this possibility, he doubted that the placement of mail in a row house was the governing factor for attendance at meals. "I hope the Food Services' improvements will help to keep students at Tyler and the Fort," he added.

THE MAGICIAN

September 1-2 Wednesday-Thursday 7:00 PM & 9:00 PM

Ingmar Bergman conducts a dark, Rabelaisian excursion into the supernatural, a strange and powerful journey through the shadowy forests of the intellect that divide the lands of truth and illusion. Max von Sydow stars as Dr. Volger, magician, hypnotist and earthly incarnation of those mysterious forces best left undisturbed by reason's light. Pressed into a command performance at the home of a cruely skeptical provincial medical officer, Volger and his ragged troupe seek revenge upon their host in a chilly tale that stands as Bergman's definitive statement on the practical limits of Reason in dealings undertaken near the dark outer limits of the human soul. Co-starring Ingrid Thulin as the wife, Gunner Bjornstrand as the doubter. Subtitles. Highly Recommended. (1959)

ROBIN AND MARION

September 3-4 Friday-Saturday 7:00 PM & 9:00 PM

Richard Lester (The Three and Four Musketeers) whisks us back to Sherwood Forest for a fond glimpse of romance rekindled between an older, mellower and far wiser Robin and Marion. Sean Connery plays the famous outlaw just returned from twenty long years in the Holy Land with King Richard. Audrey Hepburn (who last appeared on screen in 1967 in Wait Until Dark) plays a Marion who tried to take her life when Robin first left her, failed, and now lives on as the respectable Mother Janet. A pleasant and interesting movie scripted by James Goodman, who also brought us The Lion in Winter. Co-starring Robert Shaw, Richard Harris and Denholm Elliot. (1976)

THE KING OF HEARTS

September 5-6-7 Sunday-Monday-Tuesday 7:00 PM & 9:00 PM

As we go to press, it seems that this may be The King of Hearts' last appearance at The Nickelodeon for some considerable time. Next month the distribution rights to this charming film fall into a legal limbo from which they will no doubt someday emerge—but we know not when. Therefore, if you're one of the thousands who've somehow missed The King of Hearts—or one of the tens of thousands who've seen it once and would like to see it again—please make a special point to see it this time around.

The King of Hearts is one of those gorgeous, lyrical movies that everyone remembers for its message and/or its final scene . . . both of which ask: who are the real crazies in this world? Starring Alan Bates, the lovely Genevieve Bujold and a supporting Alice-in-Wonderland cast of the most delightful asylum inmates you ever saw. Philippe De Broca directs. (1967)

MEAN STREETS

September 8-9 Wednesday-Thursday 7:00 PM & 9:00 PM

Martin Scorsese [Taxi Driver, Alice Doesn't Live Here Anymore . . .]directs a vibrant, powerful and intensely personal account of the life and times of a young Italian-American hood named Charlie, a lad who should by rights have risen through the hierarchy of his uncle's New York syndicate as surely and as quietly as gas ascends from the bottom of a marsh . . . save for one fatal flaw. He cares. For a suicidally irresponsible buddy who never pays his debts . . . for Amy Robinson, an unsuitable epileptic girl. Starring Robert De Niro and Harvey Keitel. One of the New York Times 10 Best Films of 1973. Rated R and Highly Recommended.

THE 400 BLOWS

September 10-11 Friday-Saturday 7:00 PM & 9:00 PM

In 1959, at the age of 27, Francois Truffaut lunched his first feature film, The 400 Blows . . . and with it captured the cinematic equivalent of the Triple Crown at Churchill Downs: he established himself as France's pre-eminent director for at least the next two decades, introduced a young man, Jean-Pierre Leaud, who has since grown into one of the subtlest and most versatile actors in European cinema and, last though by no means least, launched the fabled French New Wave, an industry-wide infusion of fresh directorial talent that arrived, cavalry-style, just as the medium's financial, social and artistic future seemed bleakest. The 400 Blows is Truffaut's autobiographical account of his own childhood, a brief and bitter brush with minor crime, incarceration and, ultimately, a rush to freedom in a hostile world . . . yet a world in which, at a certain age, all things are suddenly and terrifyingly possible. Co-starring Claire Maurier and Albert Remy, The 400 Blows remains one of the truest, one of the finest childhood documents ever filmed . . . emotionally important, historically significant and by all means Highly Recommended. One of the New York Times 10 Best Films of 1959 and the New York Film Critics Best Foreign Film of the Year.

THE MAN WHO FELL TO EARTH

September 12-13-14 Sunday-Monday-Tuesday 7:00 PM & 9:15 PM

Nicholas Roeg directs an eerie and intelligent interplanetary tale that embroiders upon the theme of innocence, disorientation and the moral fall from grace that so often defines the fate of strangers in strange lands—a central theme in his earlier Walkabout, Performance and Don't Look Now. David Bowie plays the stranger among us, a spectral alien of mysterious and powerful means who's journeyed from a parched and distant planet to the verdant earth in search of water . . . and the means to transport it to his native world. With Candy Clark, Rip Torn and Buck Henry. A fascinating and disturbing film that rates a Highly Recommended despite its flaws. (1976)

THE SORROW AND THE PITY

September 15-16 Wednesday-Thursday NOTE: 7:00 PM ONLY

An immensely powerful and utterly absorbing documentary analysis of the strengths and weaknesses of the human soul in the face of war, imprisonment and death. Director Marcel Ophuls examines the town of Clermont-Ferrand, an industrial city of 120,000 persons some 240 miles south of Paris, as it was during the German occupation of France during World War II. Largely the film consists of interviews with men and women who survived that occupation . . . through resistance, through compliance or, as in most cases, through an expedient mixture of the two. They remember isolated acts of heroism with great pride. With shame they recall their general collective indifference to the Resistance and to the plight of the Jews. Though The Sorrow and the Pity deals intimately with war, it is not about war . . . its subject is man's infinite capacity to adjust to his own past, to come to terms with his own weaknesses, to look forever hopefully into the future. The Sorrow and the Pity won an Academy Award for the Best Documentary of 1973. It is HIGHLY RECOMMENDED.

An Evening with Alfred Hitchcock
FAMILY PLOT & PSYCHO

September 17-18 Friday-Saturday NOTE: 7:30 PM ONLY

This evening's Grand Tour with the Master begins with a scream and ends with a giggle. Psycho (1960) stars Anthony Perkins, Vera Miles, Janet Leigh, John Gavin and Martin Balsam in a genuinely frightening tale of multiple murder at the Bates Motel. Family Plot, on the other hand, finds Hitchcock at his crisp and sardonic best with Ernest Lehman's adaptation of Victor Canning's "The Rainbird Pattern." The humor is gentle, the suspense playful yet real as the Big One weaves a sly and delightfully entertaining account of the tangled paths of a greedy medium, her affable cabbie boyfriend and a glamorous young couple who specialize in kidnap, extortion and pretty diamonds. With Karen Black, Bruce Dern, Barbara Harris and William Devane. Recommended. (1976)

ONE FLEW OVER THE CUCKOO'S NEST

September 19-20-21 Sunday-Monday-Tuesday 7:00 PM & 9:15 PM

Milos Forman directs Jack Nicholson and Louise Fletcher in Ken Kesey's bright and energetic tale of hijinks in the Laughing Academy. Winner of 6 Academy Awards. A fine and important film. (1975)

THE SHOP ON MAIN STREET

September 22-23 Wednesday-Thursday 7:00 PM & 9:15 PM

The Italian school of neo-realism that flourished in the late 1940's and early 1950's [The Bicycle Thief, Paisan, General Della Rovera . . .]obviously influenced—and may in fact have sparked—the Middle European renaissance of the later 1950's and early 1960's that brought forth classics as honest and perceptive as their Italian predecessors yet somehow more capable of laughter and humanity . . . gentler and more forgiving. Among these I include Ashes and Diamonds, Kanal, Fireman's Ball, Loves of a Blond and, of course, Jan Kadar's Shop on Main Street, a wartime tale about a basically decent man, a carpenter, who one day is appointed "Aryan Comptroller" of a run-down button factory owned by an ancient Jewish Widow. Slowly he's drawn into an odd and tender relationship with the old woman, a relationship which presents a dilemma all the more terrible for its inevitably when the day arrives for the deportation of the Jewish community. Starring Ida Kaminska and Josef Kroner. Subtitles. Highly Recommended. (1966)

8 1/2 & THE CLOWNS

September 24-25 Friday-Saturday NOTE: 7:30 PM ONLY

The Clowns: Fellini's charming and nostalgic tribute to the world of the circus . . . and the world as circus. Childhood, laughter and the carnival of life are recalled in reverence, sorrow, joy and at last in the manner of cinema verite as Fellini and his production staff do a clown act of their own for our approval. An absolutely delightful glimpse of the master as small boy and amateur comic. Subtitles. Recommended. (1971)

8 1/2: Often rated Fellini's Master Work, 8 1/2 is the film into which he poured it all in grand style: dreams of glory past and future, whimsical parades, dwarfs and bits of the earthy and the bizarre. Yet the characters remain real and human and the result is a wonderful mixture of the Old Fellini and the New. Starring Marcello Mastroianni (as the Fellini figure), Anouk Aimee and Claudia Cardinale. Subtitles. Highly Recommended. (1963)

Astaire and Rogers in SHALL WE DANCE & SWINGTIME

September 26-27-28 Sunday-Monday-Tuesday NOTE: 7:00 PM ONLY

The Nickelodeon presents two of the very finest examples of the deliciously frothy formula films that made Hollywood of the 1930's the entertainment capital of the world. Watching the young and beautiful team of Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers glide through their functional scripts and divinely inspired song and dance routines is as exhilarating an evening's entertainment as we'll ever offer. Their songs include Jerome Kern's "Pick Yourself Up," "A Fine Romance," and the Gershwins' "They All Laughed," "They Can't Take That Away From Me" and "Let's Call the Whole Thing Off." Unblushingly Recommended . . . just for the fun of it.

SUNDAY BLOODY SUNDAY

September 29-30 Wednesday-Thursday 7:00 PM & 9:00 PM

A dignified and remarkably modulated study of human emotional hunger. A young woman and a successful British doctor compete for the love of the same young man. An unusual film, perhaps even a classic. With Glenda Jackson, Peter Finch and Murray Head. Directed by John Schlesinger [Billy Liar, Far From the Madding Crowd]. One of the New York Times 10 Best Films of 1971. Rated R.

Future classes to be smaller

Future freshman classes will be considerably smaller than the Class of '80 and slightly smaller than the target figure currently used by the Admissions office, Peter Berek, Dean of the College indicated.

Although this year's enrollment is unusually high, Berek said, a miscalculation of the student body's attrition rate has resulted in enrollment increasing slightly.

Following the decision to expand the student body from 1275 to 1800, College officials consulted with other colleges to develop an estimate of how many students could be expected to withdraw each year. This estimate helped in determining the size of the freshman class and the transfer and exchange programs.

According to Director of Admissions Philip F. Smith, the target figure for the Class of '80 was 480. He described the arrival of 17 students more than targeted as a fluke. Since the admission of women began in 1971, freshman classes have been within a few students of the target figure.

"We guessed a little high at what the attrition rate would be and we have tended to grow," Berek said. As a result, "each class in the college is bigger than we thought it would be."

No drastic action is planned to reduce the size of the College, although Berek declared, "We will not grow further."

He stressed that no decisions have been made, but speculated that freshman classes would eventually be reduced to 475 or slightly lower.

Dean of Freshmen Lauren Stevens said that the additional freshman housing in the basements of Fayerweather and Lehman Halls was intended to "relieve unbearable living situations," rather than to facilitate future expansion.

Eight receive professorships

Eight Williams College professors have been appointed to named professorships by the Board of Trustees, President John W. Chandler announced recently. Two of the eight chairs are newly-endowed.

John A. MacFadyen, Jr., professor and chairman of the geology department, has been named the first Edna McConnell Clark Professor of Geology, relinquishing the Edward Brust Professorship of Geology and Mineralogy which he has held since 1974. The new chair, established in 1970 by the Edna McConnell Clark Foundation of New York City, is preferably to be held by a member of the faculty in the field of earth sciences—geology, geo-chemistry, geo-physics, oceanography and meteorology—although it may be used in the areas of natural resources, conservation or related fields as the trustees see fit.

J. Hodge Markgraf, professor and chairman of the chemistry department is the first holder of the Charles L. MacMillan Professorship of Chemistry, a chair established in 1970 with a gift under the will of Norman S. MacMillan '24 of New York City as a memorial to his father, Charles L. MacMillan. The professorship is to be in natural sciences or in such other field as the President and trustees of the college deem advisable.

Six professors were named to existing chairs.

Whitney S. Stoddard, a member of the art department since 1938 and chairman of the department since 1969, has been appointed the Amos Lawrence Professor of Art. He succeeds S. Lane Faison, who retired in June after holding the chair for 30 years. Stoddard has relinquished the Massachusetts Professorship of Art, which he had held since 1974.

Nathaniel M. Lawrence, professor and chairman of the philosophy department at Williams since 1960, has been assigned the Massachusetts Professorship of Philosophy, succeeding Stoddard in the 106-year-old post.

Don C. Gifford succeeds J. Clay Hunt, who retired in June, as the John Hawley Roberts Professor of English, a chair established in 1950. Gifford has been a member of the Williams faculty since 1951.

William T. Fox, a member of the geology department since 1961, has been appointed the Edward Brust Professor of Geology and Mineralogy, succeeding Prof. MacFadyen.

Lawrence S. Graver, chairman of the English department, has been named the William R. Kenan, Jr. Professor of English, succeeding the late William B. Gates, Jr., in the professorship. There are 62 such chairs in 37 colleges and universities in the United States, established ". . . to support a scholar-teacher of distinction whose enthusiasm for learning, commitment to teaching and interest in students will make a notable contribution to the undergraduate community."

Stephen R. Lewis, Jr., a member of the economics department of Williams for ten years, has been named the Herbert H. Lehman Professor of Economics succeeding Joseph A. Kershaw who retired in June.

Computer dictates student schedules for the first time for which section preferences had been expressed in the order of senior, junior, exchange, sophomore, special and graduate. Last came upperclassmen's courses for which no preference had been specified.

According to Howard, freshmen were given high priority because an initial computer run which gave them lowest priority showed them "clustered and in the most undesirable sections." He added that there were valid reasons for a number of different priority orderings and that the whole issue of priorities would have to be decided by the Calendar and Schedule Committee and the Committee on Educational Policy for next semester.

The report issued by the Registrar's Office states that the computer program satisfied 78.2 per cent of all first choices specified. Howard said that it's hard to tell how well the computer did at satisfying first choices compared to the old method because no statistics were kept on the old system.

Stevens welcomes Class of '80

by Susan Galli

"This is a ceremony celebrating personal changes," said Dean of Freshmen Lauren R. Stevens at the freshman banquet Monday night. "It's an introduction to your new life."

Acting as master of ceremonies, Stevens, along with Williams College President John W. Chandler and Junior Advisor President Mike Crowley, addressed the class of 1980.

In his speech Stevens discussed three important changes with which freshmen must cope.

"The first is that you are now living in an environment where the main purpose is study and formal learning—the end result of which is deliberately obscure." He emphasized that a liberal arts education is not vocationally oriented and that "You are gathered here to study, as an end in itself."

He went on to describe the "almost intolerable" freedom with which freshmen must cope. "You will have to organize your own time in the absence of study halls and the like, establish your own priorities, define your own standards."

Finally, Stevens spoke about the need for students to define their relationships with adult members of the college community.

Chandler told freshmen that "If your years at Williams are successful, you will emerge with a richer appreciation of what it means to be human."

He said that a successful liberal arts education provides students with the ability to make their own judgments about what questions are important.

Crowley advised freshmen to "work to cultivate your friendships and value them highly. In the end, you will remember them as the richest part of your college experience."

Sloane assumes OCC reins

Mary Margaret Sloane, newly appointed Director of the Office of Career Counseling (OCC), said she anticipates a "very open relationship with the student body" and that she hopes students will "come in, relax and air ideas."

Sloane's appointment to OCC became effective July 1. She replaced Hope Brothers who left the College this summer to pursue personal interests.

Sloane served as Assistant Director of the Smith College Vocational Office for two years before coming to Williams. She has counseled undergraduates, graduate students and alumni, scheduled recruiters, and helped plan workshops and panels.

"The Williams Career Counseling office has some very good programs," Sloane said.

She mentioned two specific problems she intends to address in the future. Work has already begun on improving the present alumni counseling service. Each regional alumni office will have a representative with the office to create a referral system and to provide advice and information on career opportunities in particular areas.

A second area of concern is communication with students, particularly seniors. Sloane stressed the need for students to inform the office of their needs and interests so that she may act as their advocate. She said she is presently seeking a better way for seniors to register with the office.

Sloane is also planning an internship program, enabling students to experience a work environment. Field trips have also been proposed in addition to the career discovery series offered in the past.

Purple gridders, Odell have tough act to follow

by Tim Layden

An unprecedented five straight Little Three championships, an unbeaten record in the last thirteen games and a remarkable 34-5-1 mark since the arrival of Coach Bob Odell six years ago is the act which the 1976 Williams College Football team is faced with following.

Add to this the addition of Wesleyan as a legitimate power after a four-year hibernation and an improved, hungry, Middlebury squad in the second week of the schedule and it appears that the Ephraim Williams travelling road show and passing attack faces a tough road ahead, but faces it with the talent to win a sixth title and continue one of the longest unbeaten college football streaks in the nation.

A year ago, the young Williams defense was considered by many to be the one glaring weakness which could have burst Odell's victory bubble. The 1975 defense, however, not only wasn't a weakness, but outscored opposing offenses for the season.

Yet, minus such outstanding big-play performers as Scott Perry (now with the Cincinnati Bengals), Carmen Palladino, Jack Costello, Tim Mages, and Mike Gibbons, the defense again appears to be a question mark.

"Defensively, we lack experience at the positions where people like to run and throw at you," remarks Odell, speaking of the graduation-riddled posts of defensive end and cornerback.

For the past three seasons, Jack Costello and Tim Mages have manned the end spots like a pair of bookends, receiving little praise, yet giving Odell a position to forget about all season. This year, however, uncertainty marks the spot.

"We're very deep at defensive end, and every day another one of them looks like he might be the one we're looking for." Walt Boyer, the number three end last year appears to have the inside track on one spot, while sophomores Steve Rogers, Bob Kanell, and Bob Staiger battle junior Mike Masi and senior John Dombrowski for a starting nod.

The cornerback positions, vacated by Perry and Gibbons feature six solid contenders for starting berths. Juniors Charlie Sanders, Jeff Hunter, and Al Gentry appear to have the edge on sophs Greg McAlleenan, Mark Eckert, and Tony Turi.

Returnees Dave Libardi and Todd Nelp will hold down the safety spots, backed by Long Ellis. The defensive line lost Dave Kurfess to graduation, but he should be capably replaced by junior Pete Tuttle.

Co-captain Emmett Creahan, a quick-hard hitting senior who was a frequent ECAC all-star selection last year, will again man the valuable middleguard spot. Sophomore Colin Hart and junior Al Dalton will back Creahan and Tuttle.

The third defensive line position has been handled quietly and efficiently by Mike Powers for the past two seasons. Powers played with lightning-quick Harry Jackson and J.C. Chandler as a sophomore and continued his steady play last year despite largely inexperienced mates for the early games.

Senior Jim Spaulding, who stepped in last year when Creahan moved to middleguard, will start at one linebacker spot, while sophomore John Theil has looked impressive in pre-season workouts and should be alongside Spaulding. The final new face on the defense is line coach Clarence Thomas, replacing Andy Dzurinko, now an assistant at Brown, Thomas joins secondary coach Dick Farley as the defensive braintrust of the Williams attack.

The word on the Williams defense seems to be "untested", but to again call the purple unit a question mark seems to be inviting ridicule. Only the first few games will tell.

Offensively, there is a great deal less uncertainty involved. This, however, was also the case a year ago, until quarterbacks Jim Baldwin and Bill Whelan were kayoed by injuries.

The offense appears to be quite capable of putting points on the board, but is somewhat short on depth. "We're a little deficient depth-wise, but we've got good quality," says Odell.

The brightest position on the offense is quarterback, where Don Wallace returns for his third year of varsity play. Wallace, an outstanding thrower who has 16 touchdown passes in two years, has become "more serious and mature about his job," according to Odell.

Should Wallace falter, the backup spot is in the capable hands of junior Bill Whelan. Whelan suffered a shoulder separation in the first scrimmage last year and missed the entire season. The three-sport star is especially adept at running the triple option.

Sophomore Greg Collins is third in line at the QB post, and had a strong preseason before suffering a slight case of jitters in the first intra-squad scrimmage. Odell has high hopes for the hard-throwing Collins.

The fullback spot is quite secure, as co-captain Tom Redden returns for his third year as a starter, while Charlie Carrier and Scott Harrington also return at the halfback and wingback positions. Soph Mark Gerry, a varsity player as a freshman, will push the above trio.

The offensive line was one of the strongest parts of last year's juggernaut, and, according to Odell, "This year's is even better." Tackles Tim Dunn and Paul Zabroske are returning starters, as is gutty center Lew Kitchin. Sophomores Dave Maltzon and Joe Maguire are vying for spots in the line.

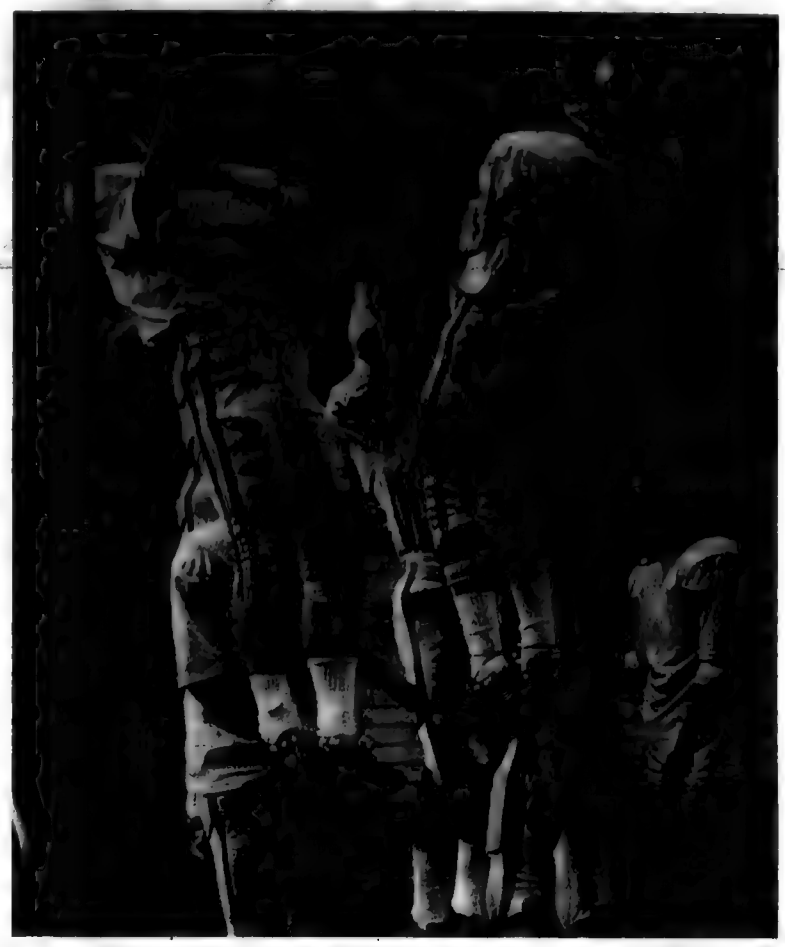
The guard holes are marked by inexperience, but a tough four-way fight for four spots has produced some strong candidates. Ken Schoetz, presently sidelined with a sprained ankle is fighting with fellow juniors Brian Fales and Steve Maier and sophomore Bruce Wilson for the two open positions, vacated by John Solar and Rich DiSalvo.

Dave Mielcarz, who Odell calls, "the finest tight end we've ever had here," will be one of Wallace's prime targets. Mielcarz, the Williams answer to the bionic man, has been hampered by injuries throughout his career, and Odell thinks that "the only problem is keeping him healthy."

One of the heartiest battles on the squad is taking place at split end, where game-breker Dave Parker has left a large set of shoes to fill.

Herb McCormick, a converted tight end with excellent hands, looks like the leading contender at present, but he is being pressed by lanky fellow junior Ben Blakney and tough sophomore Ken Hollingsworth.

Barring injuries, the nightmare of all coaches, Williams should have an efficient offensive machine. The veteran unit will get its first test Saturday afternoon in a scrimmage against powerful AIC.



Coaches Odell and Joe Dailey hope to give the offense a good workout against AIC's unusual 4-4 defensive alignment, used only by Union among Purple foes.

Overall, Odell seems confident of his club's chances, but is hesitant to seem overconfident. "This year's team could be even better than last year's and not have as good a record," says the five-year coach.

Williams will begin the long road to staying on top in Saturday's opening scrimmage in Springfield.

A team which has been on top for five years and hasn't been beaten in nearly two tends to bring about the best in opponents, which makes the prospect of facing Middlebury on the road for the second straight year seem a little imposing. Yet a slightly grinning Odell remarked, "I'd rather be where we are now than on the bottom trying to scratch my way to the top."

O.K., but now you've got to try and stay there, coach.

Early football practice comprises the hard work and effort required to get into shape. Helmets, shoulder pads, and cleats make these chin-ups that much tougher. The summer double sessions stress the conditioning which allows a team to compete over a grueling eight game schedule both to the best of its abilities and with as few injuries as possible.

Eph harriers look strong; team shows amazing depth

by Frank Carr

The 1976 cross country squad looks even stronger than last year's undefeated team. The purple harriers feel confident of matching their 12-0 record of 1975 and are hoping to improve upon their performances in post season meets. Last fall the Ephs finished 4th in the Easterns, 10th in the New Englands and 19th in the N.C.A.A. Div. III Championships.

The captain of this year's team is Ken Leinbach, who was the individual Little Three champ in '75. Joe Kolb '78 will lead the Williams attack as he did last fall before an injury forced him to miss the last half of the season. Kolb is ready this fall and should be a key factor in keeping Williams a cross-country powerhouse.

Juniors Frank Carr and Dan Sullivan came on strong at the end of the '75 season, finishing 1-2 among the Williams contingent at the New Englands. They will combine with Leinbach and Kolb to give the Eph-men a solid front pack.

The true strength of the 1976 team, however, is its depth. Coach Tony Plansky will be calling on seniors Ed Bacher, Chris Flavin, Gary James, Tim Pritchard, John Rathgeber, and Bert Saul to fill out the varsity squad.

Juniors Dave Breuer, Dave Carroll, and Larry Mitchell will be looking to crack into the varsity lineup and help the Ephs. Steve Polasky and Tom Schreck top the list of sophomore runners which also includes Clyde Dillard and Jeff McGoon.

Williams opens its season on Sept. 18 against R.P.I. and Hamilton at Troy, N.Y. This year's highlight for Williams cross-country fans, takes place on Oct. 23, when the Ephs will host the New England Small College Athletic Conference Championships. Dan Sullivan led the Williams contingent last year by placing 8th.

Coach Plansky has been through many cross country seasons since coming to Williams in the 1930's, but this upcoming season should rank as one of his most successful.

Government by the people?

Morgan addresses seniors

by Keron Walker

Yale University history professor Edmund S. Morgan addressed a large convocation audience on the question of Government by the People Saturday during ceremonies which marked the formal opening of the school year.

Morgan, author of several books on colonial history, spoke of the "will of the people" in terms of a feasible base for government. He outlined the development of popular government in this country and went on to discuss the problems involved in meeting its responsibilities.

"The will of the people is more visible in times of revolution than in the day by day process of governing," Morgan said. The expression of the popular voice has been inconsistent, according to Morgan. He blamed the absence of a united platform during colonial times for this inconsistency.

"The political party system restructured the means through which the will of the people could be expressed," Morgan stated. "It appeared to provide stability and unity for the government based on the popular voice," he added.

Morgan cautioned that the party system is not infallible. "Determine course before party," he advised. "A combination of liberty and equality is the aim of governments based on popular support."

"The will of the people in government is uncertain, imperfectly realized and vulnerable, but it should and must be pursued," he concluded.

Morgan was one of six persons receiving honorary degrees from College President John Chandler during the ceremonies. Both Morgan and Max Lerner, former Williams political science professor, syndicated columnist and author of sixteen books, were conferred the Doctor of Letters degree.

Clarence Clyde Ferguson, Jr., former Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs and Ambassador to Uganda, received the honorary distinction Doctor of Laws along with Norman Redlich, a Williams graduate and present Dean of New York University's Law School. Dorothy Fosdick, Professional Staff Director of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations and John H. Knowles, president of the Rockefeller Foundation and one of the country's foremost clinical administrators also received the Doctor of Laws degree.

In his welcoming remarks, Chandler referred to Williams and its oversized student body as "an unsuccessfully planned family." The class size will be more carefully regulated, Chandler assured, and something more dependable than the old "rhythm method" of admission will have to be found.

Car registration is key to maintaining College parking

Security began ticketing unregistered cars yesterday morning. According to Walter O'Brien, Chief of Security, car registration is running behind schedule. Only 235 students have registered their vehicles and obtained a parking place and sticker. This is half the total number expected by O'Brien.

Students must register a vehicle with the security office in Hopkins Hall for even a portion of a semester, stated O'Brien. A student must present a registration certificate, proof of insurance, and a valid operator's license in order to register.

The money obtained from fees goes into a general fund which covers the cost of maintaining the lots throughout the campus. This summer, all lines were repainted and parking signs replaced. O'Brien attributed the loss of almost all lot signs to souvenir hunters.

Juniors and seniors are given preference on parking lot assignments though O'Brien said he is unable to accommodate all requests for assignment near the individual's residence. Further, if all freshmen cannot get places in their house lot, no one does and they are assigned to the Mission Park or Agard lot.

So far this year there has been no vandalism within the parking lots. Last year there was no particular lot with more damage than any other.

Bookstores cite losses

by Carl Bettinger

Although the Williamstown Bookstore and Renzi's Bookstore mark up textbook prices 20 per cent, high operating costs result in net losses for both owners.

Joe Dewey, owner of the Williamstown Bookstore, gave the following explanation, "We receive text books at a price 20 per cent below that at which we sell them. However, our last year's operating costs were 30.2 per cent, so were we to sell only texts we would lose 10.2 per cent each year."

Ralph Renzi, owner of Renzi's Bookstore, gave a similar explanation. However, Renzi's operating cost at 21.5 per cent was far below that of his competitor. Both bookstores said that textbooks accounted by far for the majority of dollar volume each year. Renzi reports, "This month I will do one-third of my business for the entire year".

How, then, can either store continue to stay in business? The answer lies in the sale of another category of books called trade books. Trade books are purchased by each bookstore at a price 40 per cent less than the price at which they are sold to the public. The dividing line between trade books and textbooks is a very slim one, according to Dewey. Books once designated as trade books are often reclassified as texts if the publisher realizes that a greater profit can be made by such reclassification.

Theoretically, by continuing to supply all texts asked of them, the bookstores will attract enough customers that they can make up the loss caused by texts book sales with the profit from trade book sales. This has not been the case with Renzi's, however. "I have made a profit only one year out of the last eight," Renzi said. He added that he intends to sell his bookstore between now and January. Renzi said it would be replaced by another bookstore but refused to name the future owner. Dewey said he plans to continue business for at least another 10 years.

Neither of the Williamstown bookstores exerts any control over the prices of their books. Both said they believe they would lose a great deal of business to the other should they break with tradition and change their prices. According to both, there are two solutions to the problem: an increase in the age-old 20 per cent discount available on text books and a well-run used book service with full cooperation of the faculty.

"I tried to set up a used book service last year but did not get enough cooperation from the faculty," said Renzi. The faculty haggle too much and many times use the same damn books they used last semester." Dewey said he once dealt in used books but was forced to stop because "too many books were used once and then dropped". "This summer I threw out $3000 worth of unsold second-hand books. Some went all the way back to 1957."

Both Dewey and Renzi said they believe that small independent college bookstores are on the wane. According to Dewey, there are only a handful left anywhere. Renzi added that chain store type operations are moving onto many campuses. "North Adams State has one. They under order tremendously and when they run out they just tell the students to share. And it works". Renzi and Dewey both believe that Williams has been quite lucky so far not having to put up any money for text book sales.

Dewey insisted that a student run text book store at a college the size of Williams would lose between $5000 and $15,000 each year. Renzi believes that to just break even the store would have to sell many additional items for which there was a higher mark up. Both bookstore owners doubt a market would exist for such a store at Williams.

Piltch promises better CC communication

by Larry Sanders

College Council President Steve Piltch has promised to repair a communications breakdown between the council and students and to improve the budgeting of student activities tax revenues.

Piltch and Vice-President Randy Sturges will conduct the council's first meeting of the semester at 9 p.m. tomorrow in room 3 Griffin Hall. Discussion topics include the formation of a Food Services Committee and the composition of four other committees.

"The SAT fund allocation is the council's most important responsibility", according to Piltch, who has set an October 22 deadline for completing the funding process. He noted that "This would be the earliest completion date in at least the last four years." Clubs funded by the SAT must submit their budgets to the Finance Committee by September 24. If these target dates can be met the Council may avoid the marathon sessions past councils have weathered. According to Piltch, "This schedule will enable us to limit our considerations to six or seven groups meeting. "We want to insure a more fair system".

The funding of Club sports, crew and rugby in particular, produced much controversy last year. Last spring Piltch pledged that he would institute a reform system whereby the club teams would work closely with council treasurer Clarence Otis to stabilize their annual requests.

Piltch and Randy Sturges have made two specific pledges in an effort to improve the council's communication with its constituency. The minutes from each meeting will be posted in all major dining halls and agendas will be published preceding each meeting.

Sturges pointed out, "The real responsibility for better communication lies with the house reps. If they attended each meeting, reported back to their houses and sounded out opinions, then our problem would be solved". Piltch promised that attendance records would be posted and that he would personally alert each house if their representative was shirking responsibilities.

Piltch and Sturges encouraged freshmen to attend council meetings and to express their ideas to their freshman representatives. Sturges admitted "It's difficult for the freshmen to play a role during the first semester". Most committee positions have already been filled and only two of the open committees—food services and the Committee on Freshman Days—will have openings for the class of 1980.

Both officers will have an active role on the by-laws committee, which will examine the council's constitution. Piltch conceded that "The constitution is outdated and has to be revised by election time next spring." He said this presented a problem at the last election because no one was really sure how to conduct the balloting for several key committees.

Discussing the student government at Williams, Piltch concluded that "The Council should be a liaison between the students and the administration as well as among the students themselves". He also asserted that the Council has "A lot more power than people realize."

Annoyance

The opening of classes this fall involved a period of almost unprecedented challenge for College officials. The transition of the News Office, Office of Career Counseling and Food Services to new directors, the advent of centralized mail and the unexpectedly high enrollment (and resulting strains on housing and course registration) combine to produce constant headaches for administrators from the president on down.

For the most part, College officials have reacted as well to the pressures on them. Although most students can speak eloquently of "administration incompetence" over the past few days, a little imagination reveals how much worse things could have been. Every student had a room waiting for him; registration lines were shorter and moved faster than in previous years; no major meal food shortages occurred in dining halls despite high demand in Baxter and Greylock; surprisingly few delays have occurred in processing mail in the new mailroom.

However, a number of problems have arisen—some major, some minor, but all attributable to communication failures.

Rooming situations and roommates can create explosively emotional problems. In making the rooming shifts and handling suddenly empty rooms, Director of Student Housing Charles M. Jankey made an effort to consult with house presidents and, wherever possible, the individuals involved in shifts. Even so, many students arrived to find themselves in new rooms or with new roommates with little or no explanation.

As the new mailroom has gone into full operation there has been confusion over the hours students can get at their boxes. According to Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad, the area surrounding the mailboxes was to be open at least for the same hours the snack bar is open. Yet, on Sunday students eager to pick up Saturday mail or post announcements had no problem getting grilled honey buns in the snack bar, but found the mailroom area locked.

At the last minute, Purple Key Night activities were transferred from Chapin Hall to the less than adequate hockey rink because electricity had not yet been reconnected to the former building. Chapin had been scheduled for Purple Key Night for that night since last May.

The College ran out of academic robes for seniors at Saturday's Convocation. True, a larger percentage of seniors showed up for the event than in the past. Yet, given the expectations raised by Richard B. Sewall's speech last year and the College's ever-enrollment this year, more robes should have been ordered. It seems somewhat hypocritical, if perhaps economical, not to order enough robes for every member of the senior class when attendance is "required."

Clearly, such examples are not major. However, their frequency is especially annoying given that they were largely avoidable. Despite the over-enrollment, Williams is sufficiently small that there should be no right-hand-not-knowing-what-the-left-hand-is-doing problems.

CALENDAR

Edited by Ann McCabe

CALENDAR is a new semi-weekly feature of The Williams Record containing descriptions of upcoming events on and off the campus. Students, faculty and members of the community are encouraged to submit items to CALENDAR.

This column is not intended to duplicate the Register, which is produced by the College news office. CALENDAR will not list meeting dates or times for regular organization meetings nor can it guarantee that everything submitted will be included. All items submitted will be rewritten to fit our style.

Information about a lecture should include a description of the lecturer and a description of the lecture topic. Information about movies should include a brief summary of the plot, the names of the lead actors and actresses and some quotes from reviews of the film. We reserve the right to add quotes from other reviews.

Items for CALENDAR may be placed in the CALENDAR box in the Record office in Baxter Hall or may be mailed to the Record. Most items can run only once. All items must be submitted by noon of the deadline days, Sundays and Wednesdays.

Letter: morality before money

To the editor:

On Saturday, September 11, WCFM sponsored The Texas Chain Saw Massacre. It is unfortunate that for the sake of a few dollars, the management of the radio station failed to consider their responsibility to the college community.

During the seventy-five minutes we managed to see of the film, four young people were butchered: two were felled by blows of a hammer, one died on a meat hook, and the fourth was sawed apart while confined to his wheel chair. Presented as they were, these were not silly events, they were sick. People who enjoy movies like this are not having a silly time, they are having a sick time. People who produce movies like this are not silly people, they are rich. Organizations that sponsor movies like this are not silly organizations, they are irresponsible.

We cannot point to Chain Saw and demonstrate with rational argument that it is trash, or that it is indirectly responsible for crime, cruelty or atrocity. But we can ask a few questions. Does the film "dehumanize" violence? Does it make us more acceptant of true acts of violence? It is easy to fool ourselves. Tap a hammer against your skull and imagine the force of a death-dealing blow. Feel the fear when your hand is an inch away from a running chain saw. Press your finger against a needle and imagine being suspended from a meat hook. It is no rational argument, but if you sincerely laugh, you are truly sick.

People do not produce a film like this for the sake of art. They do it for the sake of money. All around us we are encouraged to purchase useless products to line the pockets of people who do not care what happens as long as they come out on top. Chain Saw is cleverly produced so as to make the film tremendously appealing. Standing on its own, a person slicing up another with a chain saw would be obscene and unsellable. The producers of Chain Saw have dressed up their film. It is filled with sexual inferences among the most obvious of which are a symbolic masturbation while one of the characters wrestles with another over a flashlight, and a man wheeling his wheelchair up an incline as a sexual act, complete with moans and groans, ups and downs, and a satisfying sigh after reaching the top. It is not that the viewer gains sexual satisfaction from these scenes, but rather that they are unconsciously entering the brain and making the movie as a whole palatable and "interesting". Wilson Key points out in his book Media Sexploitation that the use of such subliminal techniques reduces the consumer's ability to make an honest judgment about a product under consideration. In the face of such psychological bombardment, the consumer has little chance.

Finally, WCFM has demonstrated poor taste and a lack of responsibility in choosing to show this film. Not only have they presented an idiotic view of death and violence, not only have they added to the financial success of violent movies in general, but they have also failed to protect children from absorbing this kind of trash. In the audience along with the students were four children no older than thirteen who cannot be said to be able to make an intelligent judgment as to the difference between the hilarity of death on the screen and the horror of death on the street. Someone has to make this decision for them, and in this case WCFM has proved itself unworthy of the task.

Sincerely,
Stephen A. Bernheim

A Dying Art?

Bronfman Auditorium is the last place you'd expect to have an English class. With some 300 odd seats artfully arranged on a slope resembling Brodie Mountain, it has all the intimacy of a gallery above a medical school operating room.

But Thursday afternoon Professor Richard B. Sewall changed the auditorium from cavernous pit into cozy living room as he delivered the opening lecture of his English 371 course entitled "Tragedy" before almost 200 enthralled students.

Two hundred kids in an English class at Williams is something of a record, but when Sewall lectures it's par for the course. The reason is simple: Sewall has refined the art of lecturing to a fine science. Sure, your diehard English majors will spout something about his credentials, which include the National Book Award in 1974 for his biography of Emily Dickinson while your sadists will point to the overcrowded reading list, but when you reach the bottom line, the chief reason students flocked to this particular course was to see Sewall lecture, to find out if he could match last fall's already legendary Convocation address.

They weren't disappointed. In fact, they were overwhelmed. Simply put, Sewall delivered a lecture as intense, as affecting, and as deeply personal as that memorable Chapin Hall speech. The props were similar—a simple podium and a letter—and the effect was just as powerful.

Sewall's magic as a lecturer stems from his ability to develop an intimacy with his audience that he sustains and builds upon for the full 75 minutes. Like a good actor, he seems to conduct a personal conversation with each person in the audience. It's as if you're at home in the living room listening to your father's advice rather than in a huge lecture hall. In the art of lecturing, Sewall ranks as a master practitioner.

Unfortunately, the same can't be said of Edmund Morgan, who delivered the Convocation address Saturday morning before a packed Chapin audience anticipating another Sewall-like Convocation performance. The cards may have been stacked against Morgan from the outset by simply having to follow an act like Sewall's, but I think not. Morgan just doesn't have it as a lecturer.

It's not that his speech wasn't scholarly or well researched—enough numbers, dates, and places flew from the podium to keep trivia freaks happy for years—but that mysterious, hard to define magic was missing. Morgan seemed rather blase and perfunctory about the entire affair, speaking as if he were reading a chapter from one of his books while taking care to omit the footnotes.

I think it was around page five that Morgan finally lost my attention, and with Sewall's 371 lecture still fresh in my mind, I spent the next 45 minutes speculating about the art of lecturing, an art which is, I'm afraid, rapidly dying among college professors today, including those at Williams.

The first few weeks of the semester are a banner time for lecturers at Williams. Whitney Stoddard is trooped out to perform during Freshman Days while R.G.L. Waite wows History 101 pupils with his Hitler lecture and Anson Piper masterfully explicates the episodes of Don Quixote for Modern Literature in Translation students. Unfortunately, there are only a handful of other professors who can boast such proficiency in lecturing.

One of the things that struck me while attending several sessions of the Faculty Lecture Series last year was the willingness and pleasure with which many junior faculty members greeted the opportunity to lecture before the College community. But another one of the things that surprised me during last spring's Modern Lit course—dubbed the faculty vaudeville show—was the uncomfortableness and insecurity about their lecturing ability demonstrated by several of the guest lecturers.

The Los Angeles Times recently ran a series of articles picked up by many local papers concerning education on the university level which concluded that students aren't learning as much or as well as they did in the past and which suggested a re-exploration and perhaps a return to some rather "old fashioned" education ideas.

With button down collars, white bucks, and even chinos returning on the fashion front, perhaps the time is ripe for such a return. Lecturing is an acquired art that must be polished through constant practice, just like writing. While not suggesting that all classes suddenly become lecture oriented, I would suggest that more lecture forums be opened to our faculty and that they avail themselves of these opportunities. As one of the students commented on leaving Sewall's lecture Thursday, watching a good lecturer practice his art is something that should be experienced by all students.

NEWS BRIEFS

Faculty Meeting

The faculty will meet in 4 Griffin at 4 p.m. tomorrow. The monthly meetings, presided over by President John W. Chandler, are closed to students.

The Wednesday meeting will be primarily "organizational," according to Steering Committee Chairman Irwin Shainman. The faculty will "possibly" hear a proposal by Treasurer Francis H. Dewey III for the disposal of the Mt. Hope Farms property, said Dewey.

The faculty will also hear a report from the Evaluation Study Committee, continuing from last year a discussion of course evaluation methods. The Honor Committee will also report, new faculty members will be introduced, and Chandler will speak, according to Shainman.

Danforth Fellowships

Inquiries about the Danforth Graduate Fellowships, to be awarded by the Danforth Foundation of St. Louis, Missouri in March 1977, may be directed to Victor B. Hill, 205 Bronfman.

The Fellowships are open to all qualified persons who have serious interest in careers of teaching in colleges and universities, and who plan to study for a Ph.D. in any field of study common to the undergraduate liberal arts curriculum in the United States. Last year Daniel Stinebring, an astronomy-physics major at Williams, was awarded a Danforth.

Approximately 60-65 Fellowships will be awarded to seniors and recent graduates who are considered "Early Entry" applicants in the Program. Another 35-40 awards will be made to postbaccalaureate persons who are called "Late Entry" applicants and who apply directly to the Foundation. Preference is given in the "Early Entry" component to persons under 30 years of age and in the "Late Entry" component to persons 30-40 years of age.

Students who wish to be considered for a nomination from Williams must have their names submitted to the Danforth Selection Committee by a department or program chairman.

Tavares cancels Friday concert

by Chip Buckner

The All-College Entertainment Committee has cancelled Friday's Tavares concert. The announcement followed a phone call yesterday from the musicians' promoter notifying ACEC chairman Jim Bowe that a band member had hurt a leg and become "immobile", forcing a one-week recuperation. Refunds will be available in the Baxter mailroom from 10 AM to 1 PM throughout the week.

Before scratching the evening's activities, the committee, in an emergency session last night, considered a number of groups including Ramsey Lewis, Lou Rawls and Van McCoy, to replace Tavares as headliners. Another suggestion had Mother Freedom, the warm-up band, play for a "beer blast" in the hockey rink. Committee members decided that Skidmore's "Mixer on the Green" would probably draw more Williams students than a last minute change in Chapman.

Ticket sales on campus were slow, but improving. College Council President Steve Piltch blamed the pace on "terrible" publicity, and added that the accident might have been a "blessing in disguise," noting that the money spent on tickets and posters was considerably less than the thousands that would have been spent if the show had gone on.

Tavares has cancelled, so Chapman Rink won't be missing any angels this Friday night, but the ACEC probably will be.

The timing was poor for the ACEC, who face the College Council Finance Committee tonight. Chairman Bowe notes that it is difficult to ask for money after cancelling your first activity. Even though the loss for tickets and publicity is only $100, he said, it looks bad.

The ACEC will hold an open meeting in Jesup Auditorium Wednesday at 7:00 to hear suggestions for a homecoming concert band.

Cliff Keuter Co. premieres Saturday

by Julie Bermant

The Cliff Keuter Dance Company will start off the year Thursday through Saturday as the first of three dance company residencies sponsored by the Williams College Dance Society. Two world premiere pieces will be featured in Performance II on Saturday at the AMT.

On Thursday, Sept. 16 master classes will be held at 3:30-5:00 p.m. in the Lasell Gym, and a lecture-demonstration will take place at 8:30 p.m. in the Adams Memorial Theater (AMT). Friday will include an open rehearsal from 1:30-3:30 p.m. at the AMT, and Performance I at 8:30 p.m., after which will be a reception sponsored by the Williams College Dance Society. Cliff Keuter and the members of his company as well as the audience are invited to attend at the Williams Faculty Club. The residency concludes on Saturday with Performance II, at 8:30 p.m. in the AMT. Performance tickets can be obtained at the AMT box office. Due to a College Council subsidy, Williams students are admitted free of charge to all events with the exception of the performances for which 200 student discount tickets are available at $2.00 each.

The Performance I program consists of pieces entitled Visit (women quartet involved in pure movement and a landscape made of their bodies), Musette di Taverni, Sunday Papers, and Field; while Performance II consists of Visit, Murder of George Keuter (taped collage by Cliff Keuter), the world premiere of Interlude (another taped collage by Keuter involving a trio—Everyman, the Devil, and the Perfect Woman; a serio-comic piece containing "show" type dancing of the '40's with music by Paul Whiteman and Bela—Bartok), and Tetrad (Stravinsky's Concerto in D, a quartet utilizing pure movement and a good deal of kinetic humor).

Clive Barnes of the New York Times says of Cliff Keuter who formed his New York based company only seven years ago, "Keuter is a fine and vivid dancer whose off-beat reflections upon the kinetic relationships between dance and drama continue to engage me." Joy Anne Dewey, dance society faculty adviser, highly recommends Cliff Keuter's choreography which she says "comes directly to the heart of a situation and then deals with that," and of Keuter she says "he has an immense calm about him, he is kind and his work is honest and very interesting."

The company members have had strong dance careers collectively in such companies as The Harkness Ballet, The Joffrey Ballet Company, Lar Lubovitch, Rudy Perez, Pearl Lang, The Batsheva Bat-Dor Company, The San Francisco Ballet Company, Don Redlich, The Elina Mooney Dance Company and The Netherlands Dance Theater.

The five year old Williams College Dance Society has brought to the College many well-known dance companies such as The Jose Limon Company, The Alvin Ailey Dance Company, and Pilobolus. Later this year it will bring The Margalit Dance Theatre Company and The Paul Taylor Dance Company.

Williams film group to begin series with early Peckinpah

The Williams Film Group (WFG), a college funded film group under the direction of Prof. Michael Bell, will begin its fall film series tomorrow evening with Ride the High Country, an early film of Sam Peckinpah, (The Wild Bunch, Straw Dogs, etc.). The films will all be shown on Wednesday evenings at 7:30 in Bronfman. $1.00 admission will be charged, but a $5.00 season pass for all eleven can be obtained at the door.

The WFG is less concerned with popular films than the Williams Film Society but instead will show classics and exemplary genre films. The theme for the fall term is the adventure film—by which is meant film dealing with experience liberated from requirements and expectations of "normal" life. The series has been broken down further into four categories: The Western, the fall from "normal" life, the criminal as a hero, and the detective film, and will include such films as Hitchcock's North by Northwest, Godard's Weekend, Bresson's White Heat, Kurosawa's Throne of Blood, (a samurai Macbeth), and The Big Sleep.

"The central theme of adventure may be used quite loosely", Bell commented, "and is there to set up a relationship between the films which will provide a basis for discussion. The purpose of the series", Bell concluded, "is to expose people to good films."

Layout Meeting Tonight

The Record reminds freshmen and other new people who are interested in layout, headlines, etc., that a teaching session will be held tonight at 7:30 pm in the Record office. For those who can't make it this evening, there will be an alternate session on Tuesday, Sept. 21st at 7:30 pm.

Varsity soccer squad boasts wealth of talent

by Mark Pogue

"We're very deep," says Head Coach Jeff Vennell, "and everyone out there's really working hard." "Look out," warns fullback Bruce Camilleri, "because we could go nine and two." "The group has so much talent," adds defensive back Marcus Smith, "there's no telling how far it'll go . . ."

Everybody's talking about this fall's Purple soccer team, a squad which features the strongest conglomeration of experience and depth seen at Williams in at least six years. No fewer than eight starters return from last year's respectable 6-5 team, yet pre-season practices have uncovered such a wealth of additional talent that even these players are being pressed to retain their berths. It all makes for a team that, as Vennell cautions, "will probably have no superplayer, no Harry Sheehy," but which will have the depth to resist injuries and give Amherst a real fight for the Little Three crown.

In an effort to utilize the skills of junior Henry Osborne, who is returning to Williams after a year off, Vennell has fashioned a new attack formation for the Ephmen. Last year's 3-forward, 3-halfback alignment will be junked in favor of a 3-1-2 formation in which Osborne will trail centerforward John Friborg (5 goals in 1975), left wing Ray Powell (3), and right wing Jim Hield (5). This move should simplify the "overlapping" duties of the halfbacks, and it will also give sophomore Perry Nelson a chance to shine at the demanding trailer slot. Seniors Pete Barra and Steve Wertimer will also see considerable front-line duty.

The addition of a trailer-forward means the subtraction of a halfback, and that means more running for probable halfback starters Ted Rouse and Steve Smith. When this able junior-senior combo needs to come out for a rest, though, Coach Vennell need not cover his eyes. A load of competent halfback help awaits in the persons of sophomores Greg Hartman and Chick Johnson, and seniors Tony Quay and Rick Zeller. An All-New England Honorable Mention pick in 1974, Zeller is currently sidelined with an injury but should be ready for the Sept. 29 opener against Union.

"In soccer, defense is where experience counts," Vennell believes, and for this reason the loss to graduation of fullbacks Graham Hone and Brian Daggett, last year's co-captains, could be expected to weaken the Purple. Vennell still has two seniors, co-captains John Lanier and a healthy Bill Roper, to use on the left side, with Marcus Smith, Colin Dunne, and Dave Rogers in reserve. The right side has looked good in practice but remains relatively inexperienced under game conditions: presently Bruce Camilleri has the edge on Pete Thayer at sweeper, while senior Geoff Klingenstein is holding down the wing spot with Bill Kister, John Dembiski, and Brian Smith standing ready.

Senior co-captain Skil Grossman returns to the nets for Williams. Should he remain healthy he seems certain to match his fine record of 1.3 goals allowed per game in 1975. Junior Jay Loeffler has shown himself to be a competent replacement when needed.

Thus far the Ephs' pre-season scrimmages against other schools have all been of the "controlled" variety, making it difficult to judge their play under game conditions. The Purple, nonetheless, has been beaten only by nationally-ranked Albany State in four exhibitions, and the revamped offensive attack seems to be effective. Additional tune-ups for the squad will come against Wooster College (Sept. 13), UMass (Sept. 18), an English amateur club (Sept. 22), and the Williams Alumni Club (Sept. 25).

Williams senior halfback Steve Smith shown moving the ball upfield in last year's win over Union. Smith is one of several returning starters who pace a talented and enthusiastic 1976 varsity soccer team. Jeff Vennell's squad opens its season Sept. 29th against Union.

Preseason football loss may have healthy effect

by Tim Layden

Should a drastic revamping of the Williams College football schedule ever occur, the powers that be would certainly be wise to avoid putting Springfield's American International College on the new list.

This appears to be the case after a Bob Odell-coached squad absorbed a humilating 31-0 defeat at the hands of AIC in a preseason scrimmage Saturday afternoon on Miller Field in Springfield.

The loss followed last year's sobering 35-14 loss in a similar scrimmage in Williamstown which spurred the 1975 version of the Ephmen to a 7-0-1 record. If resounding scrimmage losses can be called good omens, then Williams has another powerhouse.

"If resounding scrimmage losses can be called good omens . . .

"We didn't have illusions of going to Springfield and beating AIC," remarked sixth-year mentor Odell, "they are one very fine football team." AIC won eight straight games a year ago before dropping their finale to C. W. Post and Odell feels that "This year's team is even stronger."

AIC is a big, strong team which has more size and quickness than anyone on the Williams schedule and the Yellowjackets had been out for summer practice a week longer than Williams. AIC also played New Hampshire (a 17-3 winner over Holy Cross Saturday) even in a scrimmage a week ago.

AIC scored on its first possession of the game, with quarterback Jim Jagiello, the New England small-college player of the year in '75 directing a seven-play drive and hitting junior split end John Riccio with an 11 yard scoring toss.

The talented Jagiello also fired an 80-yard touchdown pass in the first quarter and Harold Anderson scored on an eight-yard run. More impressive, however, is the fact that AIC held Williams to zero total offense yards in the first half.

"We rotated everybody in and out," said Odell, and that made it very frustrating;" they soundly put it to us, we just never generated any offense at all."

The Eph defense solidified a little in the second half, holding AIC scoreless. The Yellowjackets broke into the scoring column only when an errant Don Wallace aerial was returned for a touchdown.

Veteran coach Odell is by no means ready to hit the panic button, and seems to have put the loss in perspective. "It was something we needed to jar us up; we'll bounce back."

It will be much easier to bounce back from the scrimmage loss, as long as the memory of a similar loss lingers in the minds of the veterans, but another of Saturday's occurrences will not be so easily shaken off.

Outstanding tight end Dave Milecarz, practically on the heels of Odell's description of him as the "best we've ever had", has been lost for the season with a torn achilles tendon.

"There's no way to adequately replace Milecarz," says Odell, "we lost our poise out there once he left the game." Coach Odell is now faced with the problem of replacing the versatile Milecarz.

The coaching staff finds itself tossing around several names, ranging from possible convertees John Dombroski and Todd Eckerson to split end Herb McCormick and backup Kurt Anderson. Odell is unsure of when the final decision will be made.

Center Lew Kitchin, a rugged junior, aggravated a shoulder injury in the scrimmage and Odell "is not sure if he'll be available at all this year." Sophomore Joe Maguire is a capable, but inexperienced backup and will get the starting nod.

. . . then Williams has another powerhouse."

The third Williams casualty of the afternoon was the broken collarbone suffered by third-string quarterback Greg Collins. The cannon-armed sophomore is also likely lost for the season.

So, while the walls of Jesup appear to be a-tumbling down, and the wave Odell has been riding for five years seems about to break, the steady coach heads back to the drawing board and prepares his charges for the season opener against Hamilton in two weeks.

If the lynch mob which is already rumored to be congregating outside Cole Field House can hold their rope for just a little while longer, Mr. Odell and his fellow coaches will no doubt put a winner on the field September 25, they always do.

VOL. 90, NO. 4 WILLIAMS COLLEGE SEPTEMBER 17, 1976

Cites Adelphic Literary Society

Berek warns of frat return

Dean of the College Peter Berek discussed the "return" of fraternities to Williams at Wednesday afternoon's faculty meeting in Griffin Hall.

According to Berek, a group of students formed an organization called the Adelphic Literary Society last spring. He noted that this was the same name which the Alpha Delta Phi fraternity used at its founding.

Berek said the society had made contact with the Alpha Delta Phi international organization. In the letter, the ALS indicated it wanted to establish a relationship with ADP and wanted to be supervised and aided by it with the eventual goal of achieving a chapter.

Berek added individuals familiar with both the ADP and the ALS constitutions notice a "strong resemblance" between the two.

The Williams group also contacted alumni, according to Berek. The College learned of the situation through students and some of these alumni, he said.

In late spring, two representatives of the international fraternity visited and stayed at Perry House. Sources indicated that one of the two, a field representative, stayed for almost a week.

A College official contacted the fraternity, Berek said, but received "evasive and conflicting" answers. The College set up a meeting in July between administration officials and the national officers of Alpha Delta Phi. At the meeting, the fraternity officials read the College officials an article from the Alpha Delta Phi newsletter entitled "Rebirth at Williams" which described the events of the spring as a refounding of fraternities. The newsletter listed Williams as having an active chapter.

The College "respectfully and forcefully requested" that the fraternity cease "interfering in the internal affairs" of Williams, Berek said.

The fraternity officials "were vaguely threatening," said Berek,

Group's founding has administration worried

by David R. Ross and George J. Schutzer

The founding of the Adelphic Literary Society (characterized by College officials and members as a fraternity) last spring has generated concern among College officials who for years have tolerated the existence of at least two fraternities in Vermont.

According to Douglas C. Fritch '76, a founding member of the society, the ALS consists of a group of undergraduates who "love Williams College and wish to change certain educational perspectives that the College has right now."

Chief among the concerns of the founding members was the perception of inadequacies in the residential house system that grew up following the abolition of fraternities in the mid-1960s, Fritch indicated.

He noted that the current members are very concerned that the society not become a divisive element on campus. He noted that the ALS would not threaten the present residential housing system, since only a small number of students favor the return of fraternities (seven per cent, according to a Committee on Un-

Drummond Cleaners took all the clothes they could carry on their backs and moved to their new store, behind Salvatore's. Their prime Spring Street location will soon house Diau's Delicatessen.

Deli to replace Drummond's

Drummond Cleaners will vacate its Spring Street offices this week to relocate adjacent to its cleaning facility behind McClelland Press Inc., according to owner James S. Drummond. The office space will be converted into a delicatessen under the management of Duan Hall, currently head chef and budget director of the Williams Inn, Drummond said.

"We decided to relinquish our lease to the college owned property after a management consultant recommended integration of the main office and the cleaning facilities," Drummond said. "The move will make us more accessible to our customers," Drummond explained, "since the College recently paved a large parking lot next to the new location."

Drummond said the move will also reduce the firm's overhead costs.

Hall said he will begin remodeling as soon as possible and predicted that Diau's (De-oz) Delicatessen will open next month.

"Diau's will offer both eat-in and take-out service and will make campus deliveries for large orders," Hall said. The menu will include some 30 different sandwiches—everything from roast beef, ham, turkey and sardines to combinations like the Bebe Robozzo, all at "reasonable prices," according to Hall. Individual taste requests will also be honored.

Hall, who will leave the inn to head the delicatessen operation, said he plans to hire three or four student employees.

Changeover upsets CC

The College Council adopted a resolution Wednesday night expressing its displeasure over the administration's failure to consult student opinion before instituting the new central mailroom system. The resolution, sponsored by Gar-Wood representative Larry Mitchell, did not take issue with the central system itself, only with the lack of student participation in the changeover decision.

The Council also voted to allow the Lumber Mutual Fire Insurance Company of Boston to solicit student participation in a homeowners type of insurance program. The policy offered would cover property losses up to $1,000 due to fire, theft, vandalism, etc. and would cost the individual student $10 per year. The Council's action merely permits the company to distribute its literature to the students and in no way commits their participation in such a plan.

Treasurer Clarence Otis outlined the Finance Committee's schedule for the S.A.T. allocation procedure. Otis said that the Finance Committee will begin reviewing budgets on Monday and hopes to complete its review and recommendations by the first week in October. Budget requests are due to the Committee by September 23. Otis also promised to make the organizations more fiscally responsible by cutting down on publicity costs and by having Finance committee members act in a greater watchdog capacity than before.

Lilli Scheye and Cathy Jackson were elected co-chairmen of the Housing Committee upon the recommendation of the Elections Committee. Scheye served as co-chairman last spring and Jackson is the current Council representative to the committee.

The Elections Committee also reported that applications are now being accepted for eight positions on the Student Evaluation Committee; nine positions on the new Food Services Committee including two persons each from Greylock, Mission Park and Driscoll Halls and three freshmen from Baxter; and an undetermined number of positions on a Career Counseling Committee.

The Council also voted to change its meeting day from Wednesday evening to Tuesday evening at 9:00.

Mt. Hope plans aired

by Dave MacGregor

College Treasurer Francis H. Dewey III outlined possible means for the disposal of the Mount Hope Farms property at the faculty meeting Wednesday. The faculty also heard reports on admissions by Director of Admissions Philip F. Smith and on freshman inquiry courses by Chairman of Freshman Year Committee Michael D. Bell. President John W. Chandler announced the formation of a search committee to replace retiring Chapin Librarian H. Richard Archer and commented on the coming accreditation process.

According to Dewey, the Mount Hope Farm proposal would involve a partnership of fifty "friends, alumni, and others" who would each give $20,000 to the College. In return, each partner would receive the right to build a home on a four-acre lot. The remainder of the property would be donated to a "land trust" which would maintain the property and farm it.

Dewey emphasized that this was not yet a definite proposal, but would be reviewed by the board of Trustees in October.

Smith reported that the College has begun using a common application form, as have "many other colleges." He also announced that the deadlines for the filing of applications had been moved back fifteen days to give the Admissions Office more time to consider them.

Bell reminded the faculty of last year's decision to study the concept of freshman inquiry courses which would "concentrate on modes of understanding rather than specific skills." He said that only two Winter Study inquiry courses have been proposed, and "at least a few more are needed."

Chandler announced that the process of accrediting Williams would take place in April. He also announced that the association which accredits New England colleges is soliciting faculty for accreditation committees to examine other colleges.

Berek urged the faculty to explain course requirements to students at the beginning of the semester to allow students to more effectively plan their assignments. He also reminded the faculty that all course work must be completed by the end of the semester unless excused by the Dean, and that there were no College attendance requirements except those established by individual faculty members.

State votes on meal tax Monday

by Ann Sierks

A bill exempting Williams and other Massachusetts private colleges from the state's 8 per cent meal tax is scheduled to come before the state House of Representatives Monday. The tax, which students pay as part of their term bills, will cost each Williams student on board $99 this year; of the $177,000 total, the College financial aid department will pay more than $50,000.

College business manager Shane Riorden said his hopes for the bill's passage on Monday "are not very great." He indicated that his feelings are shared by the lobbyists of the Association of Independent Colleges and Universities in Massachusetts (AICUM), but that they think it will eventually be approved.

Calling the 8 per cent tax, "inapplicable to a school situation," Riorden said that Massachusetts legislators "all grant that it's unfair, but they need the money." He estimated that the tax levied against private colleges since last September nets the state between five and ten million dollars a year.

Prep schools, hospitals and other public facilities serving meals to residents are exempt. The status of state colleges has not been resolved; to date, the state colleges have not paid the tax.

Early this month, College treasurer Francis H. Dewey III sent letters to the parents of Williams students from Massachusetts, urging them to put political pressure on their representatives. "If you believe, as we do," he wrote, "that it's wrong to tax college board bills as if they were restaurant meals—and that it's doubly wrong to tax private college students while exempting those at public institutions—a letter from you could help us put these points across."

If the legislature votes to exempt private colleges from the tax, the tax commission would set a date at which the exemption would take effect. Since the College pays the tax monthly, it would return to students the money earmarked for the tax that had not been paid to the state by that date.

Massachusetts residents decide the fate of the 8 per cent food tax that screws up the nice even amounts of change hungry students used to get when they dined at the Baxter snack bar. (photo by Read)

Letters: concert, sexist guide

Road tripping

To the editor:

We would like to say a few words in response to the anonymous "how-to" guide for roadtripping. The article was, for the most part, as informative as most roadtrippers might wish it to be. However, the implied sexism and the undisguised snobbery of the last few paragraphs were in poor taste. Particularly offensive are such sentences as "As for guys, well, what school do you think Spring Street's Friday night hotrodders attend?" and "If you can look past the strict parietals, the roads should provide more challenge than the women . . ."

Because of a number of adverse reactions to these statements, we ask that The Williams Record please consider more carefully the derogatory overtones of such a guide.

Tavares injury?

To the editor:

In your last issue, Steve Piltch blamed poor ticket sales for the Tavares concert on "terrible" publicity. In reality, the problem has to do with a lack of common sense, not a lack of adequate publicity. Whoever booked the group must have little or no popular musical perspective, because there is absolutely no way Tavares, one of the disco-soul genre's least popular groups, could possibly generate enough interest and ticket sales to break even at a small-town, conservative venue such as Williams. Granted, booking concerts is a difficult and extremely risky proposition, especially since very few groups worth paying to see are willing to perform for small audiences, but let's be honest about it, signing Tavares was a big mistake, and it had nothing to do with publicity. In fact, I'd be very surprised if one of the group members really did tear some ligaments, because it sounds to me like the perennial excuse for concert promoters who screw up has appeared once again.

Sincerely,
Steve Case

Book prices

To the editor:

Joe Dewey (Record 9-14-76) states that "we receive text books (sic) at price 20 per cent below that at which we sell them." According to my calculations, this is a 25 per cent mark-up, not a 20 per cent mark-up as the Record reported.

To fully understand the "loss" the two bookstore owners claim to be taking, one would need to know their salaries, which are undoubtedly included as part of the overhead cost.

E. C. Cole, former teacher, dies

Dr. Elbert C. Cole, 85, an internationally known biologist who taught here from 1924 to 1956 died suddenly Thursday morning at his home in Chipman Park, Middlebury, Vermont, the North Adams Transcript recently reported.

Born in Northampton April 2, 1891, he was the son of George E. and Alice (French) Cole. He grew up in Orleans, Vt., attended Orleans High School, and was graduated from Middlebury College in 1915. He earned his master's degree from Trinity College in 1918 and took his Ph.D. from Harvard in 1924.

Following seven years as a biology teacher at Hartford (Conn.) High School, and a year at Trinity College, he joined the Williams faculty in 1924. He became a full professor in 1934 and was named Samuel Fessenden Clarke, Professor of Biology in 1945. He served in that capacity until he retired in 1956 and left for Middlebury to make his home. Prof. and Mrs. Cole resided on Ide Road while residents of Williamstown.

Phil Poppagino, a sophomore from Currier Hall, has entered the College Infirmary for treatment of what is described as "nervous exhaustion." In typical undergraduate spirit, Phil attempted to do everything listed in the Register for the week of Sept. 11-17. "I was a big groggy during the Chapel Board meeting, and could hardly stand up during 'The Stars Tonight.' But what really did me in was the Bio colloquium, 'The Anal Gland in the Woodchuck.' And hey—I wasn't the only groggy one in that lecture!"

Several matrons from the freshman quad have been dishonorably discharged from their custodial duties. According to Mr. Jankey, a ring of women were providing a sock-mating service to undergraduates for pay. Frosh returning to their rooms with laundry would be approached by their matron who would say something like, "let me knock those socks off." An undercover squad of janitors busted the ring. An investigation is expected.

Students in Psych 333 (Freudian Psychology) will be encouraged to present oral or anal reports, depending on which medium is more suited to the individual. The option for genital reports will be offered to majors only, and latent reports will not be accepted.

In what he describes as "basically an economy move" President John Chandler has moved himself and his family out of the President's House and into a dorm room in nearby West College. "All my family needs is a mattress on the floor and a roof above our heads. What else is there?" This is thought to be another ploy in Chandler's attempt to be labelled "President of the People."

One of the stranger incidents on campus occurred in Griffin Hall, when two desks in Griffin 5 unbolted themselves from the floor and left hurriedly from the room. An eyewitness had this to say: "It was a very boring class, but they should have had some respect for the teacher." The desks were later found in the snack bar, eating various rich desserts.

and offered support to students disciplined by Williams for participating in an illegal fraternity.

Berek was "distressed at the lack of concern for the welfare of Williams students" on the part of the Alpha Delta Phi officials. He theorized that the problem may have arisen partly because "some students may have misunderstood" the College position on fraternities, and said he hoped these students would give up the organization when the regulations were made clear.

Berek discounted the idea that fraternities remedied problems with the residential house system. He said that dissatisfied students should bring their problems to the Deans. The College "would have to take appropriate action" if students turned to fraternities. He mentioned the study of the house system conducted by the Committee on Undergraduate Life, and revealed that the questionnaire distributed by the CUL found that only seven per cent of the students responding favored a return to the fraternity system.

Berek also rejected the possibility of a mixed fraternity-residential house system, as Williams had between 1963, when fraternities were banned as residential and dining units, and 1968, when they were banned altogether. According to Berek, "The files in the Dean's Office are filled with documents showing the incompatibility of fraternities and the residential house system." He cited the tendency of fraternity members to play no part in the activities of their houses and stated the opinion of the College that students can best "learn from the experience of living with students who are unlike one another instead of alike as in a self-selected fraternity."

Berek said many students came to Williams because of the absence of fraternities. Admitted students knew the regulations and agreed to follow them, he stated.

The Williams College Student Handbook states: "Participation by undergraduates in fraternities at Williams College is prohibited as a matter of educational policy."

President Chandler added that "the Trustees have been concerned for some time" about the fraternity situation, and that when they meet on October 8 and 9 they will reaffirm their opposition to a return to a fraternity system.

Chandler described as "a sobering aspect" the fact that five of the fraternities whose property was taken over by Williams when fraternities were banned have "reverter clauses" in their agreements such that, if fraternities return to Williams, their former property will revert to them.

Chandler characterized the return of fraternities as resulting in "a great deal of diverted energy and attention that would do no one any good."

Yo - Yo reaches a ripe old 10

Campus canine celebrates birthday

by Jim Levinsohn

Please drop by today and wish a happy birthday to Yo-Yo, that ever-present dog at Baxter's snack bar. Yo-Yo will be ten years old and if he could talk, he would reveal a most remarkable history. Fortunately, he has friends who were happy to relate his life story.

On September 17, 1966, a young coed from Skidmore went to the dog pound in Pittsfield and returned with a cute part beagle, part dachshund, and part collie puppy. She gave the dog to a student living in Garfield House, and he quickly became an accepted mascot.

Following the graduation of Yo-Yo's guardians in 1967, he was adopted by the Scherr family of Williamstown. Two weeks later, while sitting on South Street, Yo-Yo was hit by a car and suffered a broken pelvis. A bent tail and arthritic walk have since distinguished our friend among campus canines.

Each fall, Yo-Yo officially opens the football season at Williams when he runs across Weston field before the opening game. During the Amherst game, Yo-Yo traditionally runs downfield whenever Williams scores a touchdown. Immediately after the game, he slims down for a week at a canine "fat farm" in Bennington.

Yo-Yo is not without culture. He often attends movies in Bronfman. Italian flicks are his favorites. Yo-Yo also enjoys classes but if he becomes bored, he will saunter out, much to the chagrin of the professor. On another occasion, Yo-Yo returned home with a bona fide "Old Guard" pin, given to 50-year alumni. The pin's source remains a mystery.

Like most who frequent the snack bar, Yo-Yo loves food. His favorite cuisine is A and W hamburgers, yet he is not particular. At one sitting, Yo-Yo finished off 25 hot dogs. The dog will also spend an occasional evening in a local pizza pub and there have been at least two instances in which he was locked in for the night. He did not complain.

According to Mrs. Scherr, "Yo-Yo is great with the coeds." His pathetic looks easily attract ones sympathy, however, Yo-Yo is not always quite so loveable. The canine has a monopoly on the bench in the snack bar. If Yo-Yo wishes to sit on it, he will do so, regardless of its occupants.

Neither is everyone so accommodating to Yo-Yo. The Security Department knows the dog only too well. He has been taken in on one occasion for courting a girlfriend with howls in the middle of the night. In addition, the Scherrs report that Yo-Yo usually accumulates ten dollars of fines per year.

The next time you see Yo-Yo, he may be on his way to a Fellini movie at Bronfman or returning from a boring class. Perhaps he will be leading the Williamstown Memorial Day Parade, for he knows the route by heart. Regardless of his destination, stop, shake Yo-Yo's paw and wish him a happy tenth birthday.

Admissions refuses to alter acceptance policies; still aims at total size of 1850

The Admissions department will institute no changes in their acceptance policies for the Class of 1981, despite over enrollment in this year's freshman class, reports Phillip F. Smith, Director of Admissions. "The goal is to maintain a school size of 1850," Smith said, adding that future freshman classes will consist of "no less than 40 per cent of either sex."

The admissions department issued a slightly larger number of acceptances to the Class of 1980 than it has to freshman classes in recent years. According to statistics published in the RECORD last April, Williams issued 50 more letters of acceptance in 1976 than in 1975, although the Classes of '79 and '80 were targeted for the same number of students.

The decision to increase acceptances was based on two major facts, Smith explained. The number of applications expanded by one-third in 1976 and the department expected financial factors to deter more students from entering Williams this fall than previously.

The ramifications of sixteen extra students seem to be minor and negligible. "English 101 teachers may find slightly larger classes," Smith reported, adding that the College may have to reduce its finite belief in off-campus living to accommodate the new freshmen. Smith foresees no other real problems and reiterated College President John W. Chandler's statement made at Fall Convocation that there is "no one individual we'd like to lose."

Smith mentioned one minor change saying that he would like to see students accepted from the waiting list into the Class of 1981. He said he regretted that there was no leeway for such acceptances this year.

Reflections

Returning to the campus collage

Rajendra Singh Khadka

It is one of those last clear, sunny days in the Berkshires. Soon the leaves will change their color. From green to yellow, red, purple pastiche of colors. And then dull grey. And snow; cold lashing winds that cut through your down jackets and insulated boots. Some find it invigorating. Skiing. So I am catching the last rays of the sun before the blanket of snow and ice invades the valley and submerges it. I am enjoying a cup of tea and warmth from the sun. Everything is tranquil and beautiful. The lawn, road spreads out in front of me, convulsed with frantic activities of the incoming freshmen, their parents and their new arrivals to the beginning of another college year.

You can tell freshmen. They are unsure and fumble around. Look sheepish, or self-consciously self-assured. They also ask questions like, "Say, where is Baxter Hall?" You tell him he is in it. They give you a sheepish grin and mumble something. Translate that in to "thank you". As a sophomore, you know it all. You have been there before. King of a deja vu you are witnessing. You enjoy it all with a sadistic gratification. And you watch the campus kaleidoscope unfold before your eyes. How ridiculous, I think, observing all that frosh activity. I must have looked pretty dumb too, I think.

A friend of mine joins me in my sadistic pleasure. I vaguely remember his face from last year. I think we played soccer together. And then quit after a few weeks together. I may have taken a course with him, but I am not sure.

"Nice day," he says. It is a preliminary to those stock questions and answers you go thru as soon as you arrive at the college after the summer vacation.

"So how was summer?" Good.

What did you do? Work? Oh, yes, made a pile of money, I bet. Laughter. Oh me? Well, I worked too.

"And where are you living?" he asks.

"Pratt," I say. "Oh, I had heard that it is pretty rowdy. You know, a lot of drinking, loud music and all that."

"Yeah, but so far it has been quiet," I say.

So how was summer? You already asked that.

Silence. We are both lost in our own contemplations and observations.

And what are your courses? What, changing all of them? Yeah, me too, you know.

A freshman is kissing his mother good-bye. He shakes hands with his dad. The parents get into the car and drive off. They wave at each other. The car disappears, and the boy turns around. He sees us and realizes that he was being watched. He gives us an embarrassed and almost apologetic smile and shrugs his shoulders as if to say I had to do it, you know. A little bit to our right, music is blaring from stereos. Rock, progressive rock and hard rock. The windows are open and the speakers are set up on it. "They will be rowdy ones—Insecure." Armchair psychologists analyze this particular phenomenon as an act of attracting attention and insecurity. It is as if the person is saying this is my music. Please listen to it and me. Notice me. I am here. Baby, I am cool. Of course, the armchair psychology could be totally erroneous, like armchair detection where things always end up something quite opposite to what the author leads us readers on to, until the last two pages.

"Do you have this feeling that you don't know or have forgotten people's names?" my friend asks me.

"Yeah, you are right. I had exactly the same feeling. Like, for example, see that guy. Well, I remember him very well. I took Poli Sci with him but I don't recall his name." I say.

"Yeah." An uncomfortable silence. The silence is prolonged, like a third rate mystery story that drags on.

"Say, what is your name anyway?" he asks.

"Raj," I say. "Sorry about that," he says and squirms uncomfortably.

"That is all right; come to think of it, I don't recall your name," I say. "Guess," my friend says. Jesus! I reflect back upon my freshman days when things were much simpler. You smiled nervously when you saw an unfamiliar face. You always told the other guy your name and asked for his, if he smiled back equally nervous. It was easy to tell the upperclassmen apart because they looked down condescendingly upon you and gave you a half-smile. And then you told them your name and perhaps where you were from. They never introduced themselves first. One of those unspoken and unwritten codes, you know.

"Frank," I say. He smiles. That could mean yes or no, but the way he is smiling, I interpret it as a no.

"Joe," A broad beaming smile. By God! I got it on the second try.

"Pretty good," he says. I feel embarrassed. Silence reigns once more.

Everything seems quieter now. The sun is slowly sinking upon the western hills. In the road ahead I see two people embracing and kissing each other. That has always been my problem. I don't know whether to kiss, hug or shake hands with a person when I see him after a long time. So I usually end up saying "Hi" and making a nebulous gesture that could either lead to a handshake or my hand just buffeting the clean autumn air.

I suddenly realize that I really hadn't missed anyone. In fact I had forgotten a lot of faces. It was kind of a jolt to see all those faces and realize you never thought of them at all. I was vaguely eager to see and meet only a few countable people, even though I did say nice to see you again to all the people I said hello to. Meaningless. Perfunctory and very artificial indeed. Well, the world revolves around such trivial and artificial gestures and words, I philosophized.

"Somehow the women this year seem more pretty, don't you think so?" my friend, the connoisseur of good women, remarks.

"Well, yes, but last year my JA's told me that we had an exceptionally beautiful batch of women," I say.

"I guess that is what they all say every year. But I tell you, you have to move in quick. Find a beautiful, understanding woman and all your troubles are over, you know what I mean."

"I can see the understanding part, but does she have to be beautiful? And besides, I am the slow and steady type," I volunteer. My friend gives me a weird look which plainly says, "You're nuts."

"You got it all wrong man. Like, your priorities and pace of action are screwed up. You gotta move in quick. Slam-bang, you know. Okay so you are slow and steady. How long have you been that way?" he asks me.

"A year", I say.

"And where has that got you? Have you been successful?"

Well, not exactly, but . . ."

"Exactly! See what I mean," he cuts in. "Man, this is the time. You gotta operate quick and . . ." He falls silent as a shapely woman walks by. He follows her with his eyes and head. Turns to me and winks. "I told you so" are his unspoken words. He keeps on looking in her direction.

A car zooms by at 30 mph around the corner. Clearly an upperclassman. He knows his way around. You can tell an upperclassman quite easily during the first hectic days of college. He is calm and controlled. Even arrogant, perhaps. He is the one who is drinking wine and discussing art history or contemporary literature while everyone else is getting drunk in the local bar.

They also look the kind who have that quasi-worried look. After all, they will soon be going out and facing the real world. They are the ones discussing grad schools and talking about their activities which will be their last. They exude that "last supper" emotionalism. And most of all, they tell you pointedly that you can no longer meet then as often because they are now seniors and now have to get their act together. Or they will be more subtle. "Getting old. I'm a senior now, man."

The sun has finally set. It is all quiet on the quad front. Patches of random lights twinkle in the rooms.

"Well, gotta get going," says my friend.

"See you later, Frank," I say. "Joe", he corrects me. And drifts into the darkness.

Tucked away in the north-east corner of Cole Field, an old baseball field is prepared early for the coming barren months. The bleachers stripped bare of their board seats and footrests cast thin shadows on the brown grass. The bases, players, and spectators have all gone away, and only the farm silos stand as lonely sentinels guarding the diamond from the cold. (photo by Kahane)

Letters: concert, sexist guide

To the editor:

We would like to say a few words in response to the anonymous "how-to" guide for roadtripping. The article was, for the most part, as informative as most roadtrippers might wish it to be. However, the implied sexism and the undisguised snobbery of the last few paragraphs were in poor taste. Particularly offensive are such sentences as "As for guys, well, what school do you think Spring Street's Friday night hotrodders attend?" and "If you can look past the strict parietals, the roads should provide more challenge than the women . . ."

Because of a number of adverse reactions to these statements, we ask that The Williams Record please consider more carefully the derogatory overtones of such a guide.

To the editor:

In your last issue, Steve Piltch blamed poor ticket sales for the Tavares concert on "terrible" publicity. In reality, the problem has to do with a lack of common sense, not a lack of adequate publicity. Kim West, a Skidmore sophomore in charge of the weekend, told the Record in a private interview that 25 kegs will be ready and waiting.

Random Notes

Phil Poppagino, a sophomore from Currier Hall, has entered the College Infirmary for treatment of what is described as "nervous exhaustion." In typical undergraduate spirit, Phil attempted to do everything listed in the Register for the week of Sept. 11-17. "I was a big groggy during the Chapel Board meeting, and could hardly stand up during 'The Stars Tonight.' But what really did me in was the Bio colloquium, 'The Anal Gland in the Woodchuck.' And hey—I wasn't the only groggy one in that lecture!"

Several matrons from the freshman quad have been dishonorably discharged from their custodial duties. According to Mr. Jankey, a ring of women were providing a sock-mating service to undergraduates for pay. Frosh returning to their rooms with laundry would be approached by their matron who would say something like, "let me knock those socks off." An undercover squad of janitors busted the ring. An investigation is expected.

Students in Psych 333 (Freudian Psychology) will be encouraged to present oral or anal reports, depending on which medium is more suited to the individual. The option for genital reports will be offered to majors only, and latent reports will not be accepted.

In what he describes as "basically an economy move" President John Chandler has moved himself and his family out of the President's House and into a dorm room in nearby West College. "All my family needs is a mattress on the floor and a roof above our heads. What else is there?" This is thought to be another ploy in Chandler's attempt to be labelled "President of the People."

One of the stranger incidents on campus occurred in Griffin Hall, when two desks in Griffin 5 unbolted themselves from the floor and left hurriedly from the room. An eyewitness had this to say: "It was a very boring class, but they should have had some respect for the teacher." The desks were later found in the snack bar, eating various rich desserts.

and offered support to students disciplined by Williams for participating in an illegal fraternity.

Berek was "distressed at the lack of concern for the welfare of Williams students" on the part of the Alpha Delta Phi officials. He theorized that the problem may have arisen partly because "some students may have misunderstood" the College position on fraternities, and said he hoped these students would give up the organization when the regulations were made clear.

Berek discounted the idea that fraternities remedied problems with the residential house system. He said that dissatisfied students should bring their problems to the Deans. The College "would have to take appropriate action" if students turned to fraternities. He mentioned the study of the house system conducted by the Committee on Undergraduate Life, and revealed that the questionnaire distributed by the CUL found that only seven per cent of the students responding favored a return to the fraternity system.

Berek also rejected the possibility of a mixed fraternity-residential house system, as Williams had between 1963, when fraternities were banned as residential and dining units, and 1968, when they were banned altogether. According to Berek, "The files in the Dean's Office are filled with documents showing the incompatibility of fraternities and the residential house system." He cited the tendency of fraternity members to play no part in the activities of their houses and stated the opinion of the College that students can best "learn from the experience of living with students who are unlike one another instead of alike as in a self-selected fraternity."

Berek said many students came to Williams because of the absence of fraternities. Admitted students knew the regulations and agreed to follow them, he stated.

The Williams College Student Handbook states: "Participation by undergraduates in fraternities at Williams College is prohibited as a matter of educational policy."

President Chandler added that "the Trustees have been concerned for some time" about the fraternity situation, and that when they meet on October 8 and 9 they will reaffirm their opposition to a return to a fraternity system.

Chandler described as "a sobering aspect" the fact that five of the fraternities whose property was taken over by Williams when fraternities were banned have "reverter clauses" in their agreements such that, if fraternities return to Williams, their former property will revert to them.

Chandler characterized the return of fraternities as resulting in "a great deal of diverted energy and attention that would do no one any good."

Yo - Yo reaches a ripe old 10

Campus canine celebrates birthday

by Jim Levinsohn

Please drop by today and wish a happy birthday to Yo-Yo, that ever-present dog at Baxter's snack bar. Yo-Yo will be ten years old and if he could talk, he would reveal a most remarkable history. Fortunately, he has friends who were happy to relate his life story.

On September 17, 1966, a young coed from Skidmore went to the dog pound in Pittsfield and returned with a cute part beagle, part dachshund, and part collie puppy. She gave the dog to a student living in Garfield House, and he quickly became an accepted mascot.

Following the graduation of Yo-Yo's guardians in 1967, he was adopted by the Scherr family of Williamstown. Two weeks later, while sitting on South Street, Yo-Yo was hit by a car and suffered a broken pelvis. A bent tail and arthritic walk have since distinguished our friend among campus canines.

Each fall, Yo-Yo officially opens the football season at Williams when he runs across Weston field before the opening game. During the Amherst game, Yo-Yo traditionally runs downfield whenever Williams scores a touchdown. Immediately after the game, he slims down for a week at a canine "fat farm" in Bennington.

Yo-Yo is not without culture. He often attends movies in Bronfman. Italian flicks are his favorites. Yo-Yo also enjoys classes but if he becomes bored, he will saunter out, much to the chagrin of the professor. On another occasion, Yo-Yo returned home with a bona fide "Old Guard" pin, given to 50-year alumni. The pin's source remains a mystery.

Like most who frequent the snack bar, Yo-Yo loves food. His favorite cuisine is A and W hamburgers, yet he is not particular. At one sitting, Yo-Yo finished off 25 hot dogs. The dog will also spend an occasional evening in a local pizza pub and there have been at least two instances in which he was locked in for the night. He did not complain.

According to Mrs. Scherr, "Yo-Yo is great with the coeds." His pathetic looks easily attract ones sympathy, however, Yo-Yo is not always quite so loveable. The canine has a monopoly on the bench in the snack bar. If Yo-Yo wishes to sit on it, he will do so, regardless of its occupants.

Neither is everyone so accommodating to Yo-Yo. The Security Department knows the dog only too well. He has been taken in on one occasion for courting a girlfriend with howls in the middle of the night. In addition, the Scherrs report that Yo-Yo usually accumulates ten dollars of fines per year.

The next time you see Yo-Yo, he may be on his way to a Fellini movie at Bronfman or returning from a boring class. Perhaps he will be leading the Williamstown Memorial Day Parade, for he knows the route by heart. Regardless of his destination, stop, shake Yo-Yo's paw and wish him a happy tenth birthday.

Reflections

Returning to the campus collage

Rajendra Singh Khadka

It is one of those last clear, sunny days in the Berkshires. Soon the leaves will change their color. From green to yellow, red, purple pastiche of colors. And then dull grey. And snow; cold lashing winds that cut through your down jackets and insulated boots. Some find it invigorating. Skiing. So I am catching the last rays of the sun before the blanket of snow and ice invades the valley and submerges it. I am enjoying a cup of tea and warmth from the sun. Everything is tranquil and beautiful. The lawn, road spreads out in front of me, convulsed with frantic activities of the incoming freshmen, their parents and their new arrivals to the beginning of another college year.

You can tell freshmen. They are unsure and fumble around. Look sheepish, or self-consciously self-assured. They also ask questions like, "Say, where is Baxter Hall?" You tell him he is in it. They give you a sheepish grin and mumble something. Translate that in to "thank you". As a sophomore, you know it all. You have been there before. King of a deja vu you are witnessing. You enjoy it all with a sadistic gratification. And you watch the campus kaleidoscope unfold before your eyes. How ridiculous, I think, observing all that frosh activity. I must have looked pretty dumb too, I think.

A friend of mine joins me in my sadistic pleasure. I – vaguely remember his face from last year. I think we played soccer together. And then quit after a few weeks together. I may have taken a course with him, but I am not sure.

"Nice day," he says. It is a preliminary to those stock questions and answers you go thru as soon as you arrive at the college after the summer vacation.

"So how was summer?" Good.

What did you do? Work? Oh, yes, made a pile of money, I bet. Laughter. Oh me? Well, I worked too.

"And where are you living?" he asks.

"Pratt," I say. "Oh, I had heard that it is pretty rowdy. You know, a lot of drinking, loud music and all that."

"Yeah, but so far it has been quiet," I say.

So how was summer? You already asked that.

Silence. We are both lost in our own contemplations and observations.

And what are your courses? What, changing all of them? Yeah, me too, you know.

A freshman is kissing his mother good-bye. He shakes hands with his dad. The parents get into the car and drive off. They wave at each other. The car disappears, and the boy turns around. He sees us and realizes that he was being watched. He gives us an embarrassed and almost apologetic smile and shrugs his shoulders as if to say I had to do it, you know. A little bit to our right, music is blaring from stereos. Rock, progressive rock and hard rock. The windows are open and the speakers are set up on it. "They will be rowdy ones—Insecure." Armchair psychologists analyze this particular phenomenon as an act of attracting attention and insecurity. It is as if the person is saying this is my music. Please listen to it and me. Notice me. I am here. Baby, I am cool. Of course, the armchair psychology could be totally erroneous, like armchair detection where things always end up something quite opposite to what the author leads us readers on to, until the last two pages.

"Do you have this feeling that you don't know or have forgotten people's names?" my friend asks me.

"Yeah, you are right. I had exactly the same feeling. Like, for example, see that guy. Well, I remember him very well. I took Poli Sci with him but I don't recall his name." I say.

"Yeah." An uncomfortable silence. The silence is prolonged, like a third rate mystery story that drags on.

"Say, what is your name anyway?" he asks.

"Raj," I say. "Sorry about that," he says and squirms uncomfortably.

"That is all right; come to think of it, I don't recall your name," I say. "Guess," my friend says. Jesus! I reflect back upon my freshman days when things were much simpler. You smiled nervously when you saw an unfamiliar face. You always told the other guy your name and asked for his, if he smiled back equally nervous. It was easy to tell the upperclassmen apart because they looked down condescendingly upon you and gave you a half-smile. And then you told them your name and perhaps where you were from. They never introduced themselves first. One of those unspoken and unwritten codes, you know.

"Frank," I say. He smiles. That could mean yes or no, but the way he is smiling, I interpret it as a no.

"Joe," A broad beaming smile. By God! I got it on the second try.

"Pretty good," he says. I feel embarrassed. Silence reigns once more.

Everything seems quieter now. The sun is slowly sinking upon the western hills. In the road ahead I see two people embracing and kissing each other. That has always been my problem. I don't know whether to kiss, hug or shake hands with a person when I see him after a long time. So I usually end up saying "Hi" and making a nebulous gesture that could either lead to a handshake or my hand just buffeting the clean autumn air.

I suddenly realize that I really hadn't missed anyone. In fact I had forgotten a lot of faces. It was kind of a jolt to see all those faces and realize you never thought of them at all. I was vaguely eager to see and meet only a few countable people, even though I did say nice to see you again to all the people I said hello to. Meaningless. Perfunctory and very artificial indeed. Well, the world revolves around such trivial and artificial gestures and words, I philosophized.

"Somehow the women this year seem more pretty, don't you think so?" my friend, the connoisseur of good women, remarks.

"Well, yes, but last year my JA's told me that we had an exceptionally beautiful batch of women," I say.

"I guess that is what they all say every year. But I tell you, you have to move in quick. Find a beautiful, understanding woman and all your troubles are over, you know what I mean."

"I can see the understanding part, but does she have to be beautiful? And besides, I am the slow and steady type," I volunteer. My friend gives me a weird look which plainly says, "You're nuts."

"You got it all wrong man. Like, your priorities and pace of action are screwed up. You gotta move in quick. Slam-bang, you know. Okay so you are slow and steady. How long have you been that way?" he asks me.

"A year", I say.

"And where has that got you? Have you been successful?"

Well, not exactly, but . . ."

"Exactly! See what I mean," he cuts in. "Man, this is the time. You gotta operate quick and . . ." He falls silent as a shapely woman walks by. He follows her with his eyes and head. Turns to me and winks. "I told you so" are his unspoken words. He keeps on looking in her direction.

A car zooms by at 30 mph around the corner. Clearly an upperclassman. He knows his way around. You can tell an upperclassman quite easily during the first hectic days of college. He is calm and controlled. Even arrogant, perhaps. He is the one who is drinking wine and discussing art history or contemporary literature while everyone else is getting drunk in the local bar.

They also look the kind who have that quasi-worried look. After all, they will soon be going out and facing the real world. They are the ones discussing grad schools and talking about their activities which will be their last. They exude that "last supper" emotionalism. And most of all, they tell you pointedly that you can no longer meet then as often because they are now seniors and now have to get their act together. Or they will be more subtle. "Getting old. I'm a senior now, man."

The sun has finally set. It is all quiet on the quad front. Patches of random lights twinkle in the rooms.

"Well, gotta get going," says my friend.

"See you later, Frank," I say. "Joe", he corrects me. And drifts into the darkness.

Admissions refuses to alter acceptance policies; still aims at total size of 1850

The Admissions department will institute no changes in their acceptance policies for the Class of 1981, despite over enrollment in this year's freshman class, reports Phillip F. Smith, Director of Admissions. "The goal is to maintain a school size of 1850," Smith said, adding that future freshman classes will consist of "no less than 40 per cent of either sex."

The admissions department issued a slightly larger number of acceptances to the Class of 1980 than it has to freshman classes in recent years. According to statistics published in the RECORD last April, Williams issued 50 more letters of acceptance in 1976 than in 1975, although the Classes of '79 and '80 were targeted for the same number of students.

The decision to increase acceptances was based on two major facts, Smith explained. The number of applications expanded by one-third in 1976 and the department expected financial factors to deter more students from entering Williams this fall than previously.

The ramifications of sixteen extra students seem to be minor and negligible. "English 101 teachers may find slightly larger classes," Smith reported, adding that the College may have to reduce its finite belief in on-campus living to accommodate the new freshmen. Smith foresees no other real problems and reiterated College President John W. Chandler's statement made at Fall Convocation that there is "no one individual we'd like to lose."

Smith mentioned one minor change saying that he would like to see students accepted from the waiting list into the Class of 1981. He said he regretted that there was no leeway for such acceptances this year.

Tucked away in the north-east corner of Cole Field, an old baseball field is prepared early for the coming barren months. Griffin hosts 'Variations'

The Griffin Hall Concerts series opens its ninth season this weekend with performances of the "Goldberg Variations" for harpsichord by J. S. Bach. Associate professor of Mathematics Victor Hill will play the two-manual harpsichord Saturday and Sunday evenings.

The "Goldberg Variations" form probably the most difficult piece ever written for the harpsichord. The work begins with an initial aria whose bass becomes the foundation upon which the body of the piece builds. This body first is comprised of ten character pieces, each of which captures a specific mood: then come ten display pieces which form the most technically demanding part of the work; finally, came nine canons grouped in sets of three. In a final quodlibet Bach intertwines two German folk songs to capture the essence of the work: one, entitled "I have not been with you for such a long time," recapitulates the initial aria; the other, "Cabbages and turnips have driven me away," suggests the many variations which have undermined the aria.

Victor Hill, who has performed in the Griffin Hall series since he founded it nine years ago, is also organist and choirmaster of St. John's Episcopal Church on Park Street in Williamstown. He performs a complete cycle of Bach harpsichord works, including the "Goldberg Variations", every four years.

The doors open at 7:30 and the concert begins at 8:00 both Saturday and Sunday nights. Latecomers will be admitted only during the intermission, approximately 8:45.

Juilliard Quartet to play

The first Thompson Concert of the year hosts the "first family of chamber music", the Juilliard String Quartet this Monday evening at 8:30 in Chapin Hall. The energetic internationally acclaimed ensemble will take bows in hand, and perform a musically diverse program consisting of Mozart's Quartet in D Minor (K. 421), Bartok's Quartet No. 4, and Beethoven's Quartet in B Flat Major, Opus 130. Williams students are admitted free.

In a recent review the New York Times praised the group as, "representing the very model of modern quartet playing at its best," Robert Mann, the group's first violinist and a Juilliard alumnus, is largely responsible for this. He is often called the quartet's "guiding light and spiritual mentor". Other group members include another Juilliard graduate, Earl Carlyss on second violin, Samuel Rhodes on viola, and Joel Krosnik playing cello.

These four bowmen because of their cohesiveness and individual virtuosity produce some of the most brilliant interpretations in music today.

Clark screens Cooke's 'America' history series

by Mimi David

Capturing the American spirit is a worthwhile thought, to say the least, challenging endeavor. Alistair Cooke attempts this in his thirteen part film series, "America: A Personal History of the United States." The films are being presented each Friday afternoon at 2 and repeated Sunday afternoon at 4 at the Clark Art Institute. Admission is free.

In Cooke's words: "I dare because I have been roaming the country (as a foreign correspondent) for over 30 years and tracking down its history as I went. Because I believe that there is a true American heritage which . . . is something most Americans are only vaguely aware of . . . I can reawaken Americans to the best of their story, and remind them of the worst . . ."

One hears Cooke's story of American life as his camera brings the eye through the halls in which the great scene of American history were played. This audio-visual interplay brings history to life in an interesting way. Not as well-supported as an Edmund Morgan argument nor as romantic as "Gone With the Wind," the film series combines historical accuracy with the wit and charm of Cooke's narration. Perhaps best characterized as a well-guided tour of American history without the troubles of the tourist, the film series is well worth the walk to the Clark.

The thirteen films (any relation to the number of colonies intended?) progress from the discovery of America to the present day. The series began today with "The New Found Land" about the era of exploration (to be repeated on Sunday) and "Home Away From Home," a look at the colonial period, next Friday and Sunday. The titles of the subsequent films will be announced regularly in the Record.

Gray Film Atelier offers classes in movie writing skill

The Gray Film Atelier of Hoosick Falls (twenty miles north of Williamstown in N.Y.) is again this year opening its Screenwriting Unit to area residents who are interested in learning to master the special techniques of writing for the screen. The unit will consist of 20 Saturday morning classes to be taught at the Caffee Lena in Saratoga and are scheduled to begin on September 25, 1976. Work written in the Screenwriting Unit is eligible for production by apprentice directors at the Studio. There is a precedent at the Atelier for transferring college credits to home institutions.

The class, which is at the heart of the Atelier program, will be taught by Paul Gray, the Director of the Atelier and a professional writer and filmmaker. Gray incorporates his practical knowledge of producing, directing, cinematography, and editing into his approach to the teaching of screenwriting. Gray was formerly Head of the Theatre and Film Department at Bennington College.

Two of Gray's films, "P.I.N.S." and "APHASIA", were recently selected and screened at major international film festivals in Europe. He is currently producing and directing a full-length film adaptation of "EVERYMAN."

Area residents interested in more detailed information should contact Judy Reynolds at 518-686-5985 or write to the Atelier, Box 70, Hoosick Falls, New York 12090. The Atelier is a non-profit educational institution.

Frat concerns administration

dergraduate Life questionnaire last spring). Thus, he argued, there would be none of the extensive bitter campus-wide rushing which characterized the old system.

He further stressed that the ALS did not intend to sponsor separate housing and eating arrangements. Nor did it intend to become a social fraternity. Fritch asked that the ALS not be confused with the Vermont fraternities, which are characterized as drinking clubs by sources familiar with them. Fritch described the ALS as solely a discussion group in the tradition of the fraternities founded in the early 1800s.

Concern raised

The ALS first became a concern of College officials when the ALS contacted national officials and Williams alumni and Alpha Delta Phi fraternity, which owned the present Perry House. A number of the ALS founding members lived in Perry House last year.

"We approached them (ADP) because their goals (learning, morality, social culture and benevolence) were valued by the group," said Fritch.

Fritch declared that no active affiliation was sought with ADP and no students will be initiated in ADP. However, in a statement at Wednesday's faculty meeting, Dean of the College Peter Berek noted persons familiar with both the ALS constitution and the old ADP chapter's constitution said they bear a strong resemblance. An ADP newsletter listed an active Williams chapter of ADP.

Representatives of ADP visited Perry House last spring, generating, according to a College official, concern among some students who reported the matter to the College.

"That was just poor handling on my part," said Fritch. He added that the ALS members are aware of the distress visible fraternity-type activities can have for house members. "I'm very doubtful that there will be any repetition" of the visible fraternity organizing activity at Perry House last spring, he said.

The College also heard about the matter from some ADP alumni who received a mailing from the ALS requesting funds for the support of the society. A substantial proportion of those funds were to be earmarked for a lodge house. Fritch indicated that the lodge house would not be for member housing, eating or parties.

A group of about thirty alumni who had been members of ADP sent a letter to ADP alumni advising them that it would not be wise to help in an effort to revive the fraternity. The letter noted the College disapproved of ALS.

Disciplinary action

At Wednesday's faculty meeting, Berek said the "College would have to take appropriate action" against students who are actively participating in fraternities. "Some students may have misunderstood" College regulations against fraternities, he said, adding that he hoped students would now cease participating in the fraternities.

In a July meeting with College officials, ADP representatives indicated that they would offer support to any students against whom the College starts disciplinary action as a result of their membership in the ALS.

Fritch said he hoped College officials had better things to do with their time than preventing students who wanted to get together from doing so.

Berek indicated that the College's concern with fraternities centered on the divisive effects they would have on the residential house system. He cited the bitterness that existed in some houses during the mid-1960s when fraternities and residential houses existed within one another.

Fritch said that he perceived the College's main concern as centering on clauses in the agreements under which, some of the old fraternities transferred their houses to the college calling upon the College to return the houses to the fraternities should they ever return to Williams.

President John W. Chandler said that he was concerned that "if the College implicitly allowed fraternities to operate," some fraternities might desire to activate those clauses. Although Chandler placed the number of College buildings having this type of agreement at five, only three could be identified with certainty: Mears House (Theta Delta Xi), the Center for Developmental Economics (St. Anthony's) and Garfield House (Delta Upsilon).

Vermont frats

College officials in conversations with the Record did not indicate the same concern about the two fraternities centered in Vermont as they showed toward the ALS.

Sources identified the two fraternities as Theta Delta Xi and Kappa Alpha although their connections with the national chapters were described as tenuous.

An unpublished Record study two years ago indicated that TDX was the more active of the two fraternities. At the time of the study and still now according to informed sources, many of the members of TDX are males who participate in fall sports at Williams.

Fraternity members do not officially reside at the fraternity houses although the TDX house has bedrooms. One source indicated that some alumni have stayed in the house while visiting Williamstown.

Fraternity members told the Record two years ago that they saw TDX as an escape from the campus; it offered them an opportunity to socialize with the type persons they were most comfortable with.

TDX was involved in some rushing but potential members were not rushed until their sophomore year.

The Record investigation indicated Kappa Alpha had only about ten members and took an elitist attitude.

Richard Dreyfuss pursues the almighty dollar in tonight's film, 'The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz'.

Panel debates freedom

Controversy heated last Friday night's pre-convocation panel discussion as six speakers addressed the topic, "Liberty and Equality: The Next One Hundred Years." Moderated by author, columnist and former Williams faculty member, Max Lerner, the panelists focused their remarks on issues including preferential admission and hiring policies for minorities and the U.S. role in securing human rights for foreigners.

Speaking in defense of affirmative action in minority admissions programs, Norman Redlich, Dean of New York University's Law School, said, "We try to help those who start the race behind the starting line." Such preferential policy is meant to offset the "inequalities of condition that make for inequalities for opportunity", according to Redlich.

Several Williams students in the audience, concerned with problems of reverse discrimination, expressed opposition to Redlich's stand. Redlich responded to such criticism saying that "reverse discrimination will be bitter medicine for Americans to accept" but adding that "it is necessary to achieve true equality of opportunity."

Dorothy Fosdick, staff director of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, introduced a second issue of contention in her assertion that "the United States should use coercion and persuasion of all types in attempting to foster human rights abroad." "America cannot be true to itself unless it stands up for human rights in the international field," Fosdick claimed.

Both Lerner and panelist Clarence Clyde Ferguson, Jr., of the Harvard Law School faculty, took issue with this position. Drawing on his experience in the State Department, Ferguson said he felt that the United States "ought not to have the gall to tell others what to do until it looks inward and realizes human rights at home."

Williams Women pursue improvement of relations

by Jane Adams

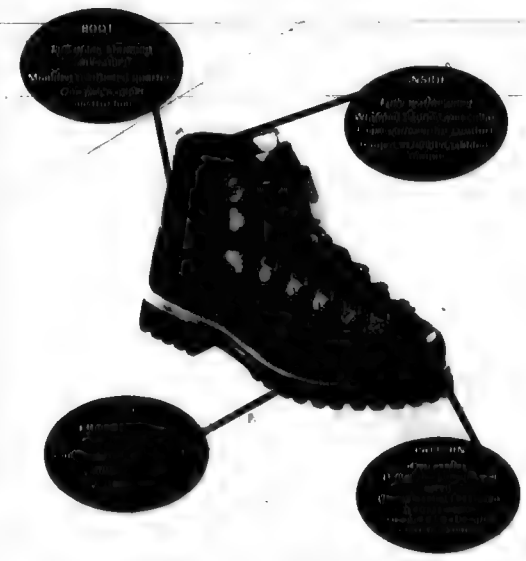
"Feminism at Williams is not a thing that's discussed much. There is a need for greater communication and the airing of ideas." As co-ordinator of the Williams Women Group, Lesley Christoph '79 said she is hoping to promote better relations between men and women on campus as well as a feeling of solidarity among women themselves.

Maryellen Shea '78, the other co-ordinator, feels interest in feminism is rising as the male-female ratio changes and awareness of the women's movement increases. Christoph supported this idea saying, "Most women here are products of the 'new awareness' .... There is no hostility between men and women here but certainly consciousness needs to be raised. There is very little activism."

The format for the year's program for Williams Women has not yet been organized and both Christoph and Shea stressed the options and the flexibility possible.

The co-coordinators are considering creating a consciousness-raising group. Christoph said she is optimistic about a positive male response to such an idea, citing the "strong response" from men on last year's panel discussion. Shea, however, criticized the general lack of male support for the group. "Most male comments are derogatory towards the group," she noted.

Female poets, musicians, and artists may be represented in a proposed Women's Art Festival. Other ideas concern speakers dealing with the roles of blacks, lesbians, and radicals in the feminist movement, as well as a speaker from the Boston Women's Health Book Collective.



The Monday night dinners, a main feature of last year's women's program, may be phased out. Shea commented on both the low attendance rate and the lack of a sense of unity among those present. Christoph mentioned the possibility of "more high powered activities and maybe less of them."

Increased utilization of the Women's Center as a gathering point for women will be a discussion topic for the group.

There will be a meeting Sunday at 7:00 p.m. at the Women's Center.

Injuries plague Ephs; Zabroske added to list

by Tim Layden

"If you can keep your head when all about you are losing theirs and blaming it on you, ..."

Rudyard Kipling

Granted, no one around Williams head football coach Bob Odell is losing his head, but much of his once-promising squad is losing its health and the successful five-year mentor could not be blamed for losing his head at this point.

Junior offensive tackle Paul Zabroske, a starter for his entire sophomore season and one of the biggest players on the squad has been lost for the season with a kidney ailment.

Also suffering an injury since the Williams scrimmage loss a week ago at A.I.C. was junior wingback Scott Harrington, who was a starter. Harrington suffered a slight shoulder separation while playing touch football during the past weekend.

These two are added to the list which already includes outstanding tight end Dave Mielcarz, who is out for the season, sophomore quarterback Greg Collins, ditto, and center Lew Kitchin, whose injured shoulder is a mystery and could hold up for anywhere from one play to eight games.

Zabroske suffered an injury to his side in the A.I.C. scrimmage and x-rays later in the week showed that the rugged tackle had been playing with only one kidney, a high risk indeed.

"The injury was a real blow to him, personally," said Odell, "he is a fine player and a tremendous person. He made a great contribution last year and we'll miss him very much." Zabroske will probably be unable to safely play football again.

Harrington, whose injury is not of the magnitude as Zabroske's, has been held out of contact for the past week, and Odell hopes to use the slippery junior against Hamilton in next Saturday's opener.

Harrington's backup is also in sick bay at the present. Sophomore Mark Gerry is suffering from an arm injury.

Kitchin received his injury originally during a lacrosse game last spring, and has played with a great deal of discomfort since. The tough junior was to test the injury in this afternoon's scrimmage against the Albany St. jayvee squad.

The Kitchin, Zabroske, and Mielcarz injuries have nearly depleted an offensive line which Odell had hoped would be one of the strongest parts of the team. Only Tim Dunn remains as a starter in the now very green pit.

So, as the 1976 Williams Ephmen took the field this afternoon for the scrimmage, only a shadow of the unit which turned out for preseason workouts three weeks ago remained. "We've just got to put these injuries behind us and keep going," says Odell.

As the picture seems to get darker and darker with every practice, Odell laments that "it will probably get worse before it gets better." Perhaps the coach's biggest consolation is that a series of crippling injuries occurred now and not three weeks into the season, when replacements would be difficult to break in. After all, Hamilton is still a week away.

What Committee?

Today's subject: the Athletic Committee. Never heard of it? I'm not surprised. I wonder, in fact, how much the members themselves know about it. They met a grand total of twice last year.

The committee reached but two decisions during the entire 1975-76 school term, one concerning lab extensions past 4 p.m. and the other an exam period basketball game. And yet it was a year when somebody made several extremely important decisions about Williams intercollegiate sports.

A College response to NCAA-imposed squad size limitations was formulated; a new assistant football coach and a new women's basketball coach were hired; the status of club sports, particularly the crew, was hotly debated in every campus forum but the Kitchen Sink Club and the Athletic Committee.

Team managers were stripped of half of their physical education credit eligibility despite strong protests from the College Council and the managers themselves, but the Committee sent no recommendation to the CEP; in fact, they apparently never even discussed the issue.

Now as I read that nice bright baby blue Student Handbook Mr. Howard handed out to each of us last week, "The immediate government of Williams College is ... conducted in the meetings of the full Faculty and by its Committees." The Athletic Committee in particular is charged with advising the Faculty on "matters of general policy concerning intercollegiate athletics."

Somehow, the job never got done last year, and it's the fault of nobody but the committee members. Ten responsible persons appointed to oversee as broad and successful a program as Williams has evolved must know they've got to get together more than twice in a year. Their neglect deprived faculty and students, both those directly involved in sports and those on the sidelines, of the input into athletic decisions supposedly guaranteed them under the committee system and of a highly visible policy making body to turn to with questions and problems.

This year presents ample opportunity for improvement. The committee met yesterday to discuss the possibility of College membership in regional or national women's athletic associations. The momentum generated by such an early meeting on a fairly substantial topic can be sustained. The committee should act quickly to set up an informal meeting with the captains of all varsity sports, a group the Athletic Department found it very helpful to consult regarding last year's Purple Key Dinner.

The captains would probably welcome a definitive outlining of College restrictions on post-season competitions.

They might also appreciate an opportunity to air such minor but nagging grievances as game scheduling—one varsity team has now been scheduled away three Winter Carnivals in a row.

While they're at it, the committee should reopen communications with the coaching staff. Who, after all, has a better feel for where the program is headed than those directly responsible for taking it there? The coaches' viewpoints on the new admissions staff policies on student athletes also warrant discussion.

And if the committee really wants an issue to sink its dentures into, may I suggest evaluation of coaches analogous to the familiar semester end teacher evaluations?

Yeah, it's a touchy question, one fairly laden with potential for divisiveness and bad feelings, but it deserves better than the complete disregard it received after its first suggestion in a letter to the Record last year.

Coaches need not view evaluation as threatening to their positions (considering the amount of attention the College often pays to student opinion in tenure decisions, I'd say no threat at all). There's no overwhelming necessity that such evaluations play any part in contract renewal decisions, and really no need for anyone but the coach himself to see the completed forms.

Furthermore, I know that the majority of Williams coaches would come out of any evaluation process looking like budding Ara Parseghians and John Woodens. But none of them is perfect, and the constructive criticisms team members come up with would be valuable for each one.

It's a tough but important question, and one the Athletic Committee ought to get to work on right now.

Another winning season?

Women's tennis foresees headaches

by Evan Bash

The women's varsity tennis team, having compiled a remarkable 21-1 record over the past two seasons this year, finds itself faced with something as rare as losses; problems. Problems can be overcome, but this season should be more challenging than the past two.

The troubles besetting Coach Curt Tong's racketwomen include the decision of last year's number two, three, and four singles players to take a year away from Williams, the compiling of the toughest women's tennis schedule in New England, and enough injuries for Coach Tong to remark, "You'd think we were a football team."

According to Coach Tong this year's contingent is "representative and potentially very good, although there are several question marks." Usually the only question mark concerning Joninna Sadoff is how badly she will beat her opponent. Sadoff, completing an outstanding career, will team with Laura Carson, returning after a year off, to give the line-up a solid spearhead.

Tong terms the strength of the middle of the ladder "questionable and something that needs proving." This could prove to be the squad's major worry as the lower rungs of the ladder should be stronger than most other schools.

With a year of highly successful singles play in hand, soph Amy Demorest returns along with senior Babe Kirk, who also has some singles experience. Both are fighting to help plug the gap caused by the vacant singles positions.

Returning doubles players from last season include seniors Holly Prentice and Sue Guttman and juniors Amy Sterling, Sherry Willcox and Sally Kruse. Also competing for positions are seniors Marcia Sherman, Carol Reid and Holly Boyer, sophs Barb Ernst and Marcia Johnston and strong freshwomen Rebecca Chase and Trudy tenBroeke.

The Williams schedule remains difficult this year. Powerful New England opponents Tufts, Dartmouth, Yale (the only squad to top Williams in 1875) Trinity, Springfield and Radcliffe will all be trying to spoil the Ephwomen's two-year joy ride.

Only performance will tell whether the question marks of the pre-season outlook can be replaced with exclamation points from the post-season commentary.

Joninna Sadoff '77, concentrates on a forehand volley. Sadoff again holds down the no. 1 singles spot in Coach Tong's lineup.

Alumni recall breakup of fraternities

by Andy O'Donnell
and Vernon Kirk '75

On May 23, 1961, about 70 Williams students gathered in the physics lab at 1:00 a.m. to discuss the fraternity situation. From this meeting came a petition calling for the abolishment of fraternities at Williams and the establishment of "small dorm units" in their place. The Grinnell petition, as it was later called, capped a decade of growing dissatisfaction with the fraternity system at Williams and became a primary catalyst in the establishment of the Angevine Committee by the Board of Trustees to investigate the situation.

In the summer of 1962 the committee released its findings and recommended that the College assume full responsibility for the housing, eating, and social accommodations of its students because "fraternities at Williams (had) come to exercise a disproportionate role in undergraduate life, and as a result, the primary educational purposes of the College (were) not being fully realized".

Last week the fraternity issue surfaced again when Peter Berek, Dean of the College, discussed the college's concern and displeasure over the formation of a group called the Adelphic Literary Society at Wednesday afternoon's faculty meeting. Berek pointed to the divisive effect which fraternities would exert on the residential house system, citing as evidence the joint fraternity-residential house system which existed at Williams from 1963 to 1968. In this, the first of a two part RECORD series, we will focus on the factors present during the 1940's and 1950's which produced the Grinnell petition. Friday we will look at the Angevine Committee, its report, and the state of the housing situation at Williams during the 1960's, with the intention of inquiring how much Williams has changed since the days of fraternities, and whether or not they could exist here again.

The transcripts of the interviews presented here were conducted by Andy O'Donnell and Vernon Kirk '75 for a 1974 Winter Study project entitled "The Oral and Archival History of Williams College". Those interviewees appearing in Part 1 include Hodge Markgraf '52, who served as non-voting secretary to the Angevine Committee and is currently a professor of chemistry here, R. R. R. Brooks, Dean of the College from 1946-1963, John English '32, Secretary, Society of Alumni from 1959 - 1975, and Bruce Grinnell '62, former quarterback of the football team, and president of Alpha Delta Phi who lent his name to the petition calling for an end to fraternities. He currently has a law office on Spring Street.

Stetson work proceeds on schedule, but savings lag

by Brad Caine

Workmen will meet a September deadline for completion of the Stetson Library renovations, according to Charles Fuqua, Chairman of the Stetson Renovation Committee. "Only minor finishing touches remain to be completed," Fuqua said.

The College hoped that renovation of Stetson, including the construction of new faculty offices and the expansion of old ones, would save money in the long run, Fuqua said. Faculty office space would be consolidated and buildings with costly maintenance problems such as Seeley House would be closed.

Fuqua said the number of offices in older campus buildings has been reduced but added, "The savings won't be as large as expected since students are now housed there due to increasing enrollment."

In the absence of a Treasurer's report, which has yet to be completed, Winthrop M. Wassenar of Buildings and Grounds said that renovation costs remained within the $750,000 budget set by the Trustees. "We are presently within 5 per cent of that figure," said Wassenar, "and that includes items which were not originally planned."

Plans called for the removal of stacks and carrels, installation of an elevator, addition of a faculty lounge and conference rooms and construction of a four-story access bridge between the original building and the '57 addition. Faculty offices were carpeted, sound-proofed, and refurnished.

Additional money was used to carpet the main lobby, furnish a faculty lounge and install a mail room and a kitchenette.

Future plans include converting the Mabie Room, the old periodicals room, into a reading room for Chapin and Williamsiana material. This will give students better access to a more organized collection of Williams' rare books and historical materials. "Before this can be done, though," said Lawrence E. Wikander, the College librarian, "the room must be made more secure. In light of recent thefts of rare books at Bowdoin and Mount Holyoke, this is essential."

Mandatory recycling debated

by Margaret Graham

The town conservation commission met last Friday to discuss a proposal requiring the recycling of all newspaper in Williamstown, including the College's.

According to Richard Scullin, chairman of the commission, the Board of Selectmen will discuss the regulation prohibiting the deposit of newspaper in Williamstown sanitary landfill on September 27. Town manager Robert M. Janes, will propose a public hearing on the issue. If passed by the board, the regulation could go into effect within a few weeks of the hearing.

The Board of Selectmen discussed a mandatory recycling program last spring, but took no action at the time. The conservation committee, which would oversee the program, supports this measure. According to commission members, the town would be aided financially through savings of valuable land area; in addition, it would be eligible for a refund from the Bennington Berkshire County Recycling Council if the volume of

Log cuts hours, wages

An unexpectedly large deficit at the Log (the College's student faculty pub) has forced manager Gene Falk '75 to institute programs aimed at reducing costs and increasing attendance. Falk estimated the current deficit at $15,000 adding that the figure is $4,000 above predictions made last spring.

Blaming an unforeseen drop in sales, Falk said that the Log "lost much more than expected last year." Falk attributed some $7,000 of the deficit to fixed expenses such as taxes, maintenance and repair.

"We have cut back on salaries," the manager remarked, "making them more commensurate with salaries in other parts of the college for similar jobs." He has also reduced the staff, and cut working hours, by discontinuing service on Mondays as well as Sundays. Sandwiches will also no longer be available.

"This was not a pleasant thing to do," commented Falk, since the cuts conflict with the original function of the Log: to provide a place where students and faculty could meet in a relaxed atmosphere. He noted, however, that without cuts the Log might have closed.

Falk said he hopes to draw more students this year by offering special rates on certain nights. Last Wednesday was Senior Night, and seniors received discounts on beer. The Log will feature similar nights for each class this semester, as well as "house nights" and will occasionally offer discount rates to freshman entries with their JA's.

Each Wednesday the Log will import live entertainment, according to Falk. The manager is also trying to buy electric ping-pong and football machines to set up in the Log's lobby.

Unlike recent years, the Log will remain open to students on home football weekends. In the past the Log has reverted to its original function as Alumni House, serving alumni only.

The Log staff has been negotiating for a cable television set for the last four years, Falk said, with a television, the building would open Sunday and Monday nights for sports events. At present, the major obstacle is the absence of cable service on the east side of Spring Street. Falk hopes to run a cable across the street to the Log.

"So far, it's looking good," Falk remarked, stating that the gross is above last year and costs are down because of the cuts. "We have more people drinking less," he noted, "and attendance is up slightly over last year."

Falk said he does not expect the Log to be self-supporting this year and acknowledged that the College may decide to close it. He hopes to reduce the deficit to near the level of fixed expenses but remains reservedly optimistic about the Log's future.

Space limits room decorating creativity

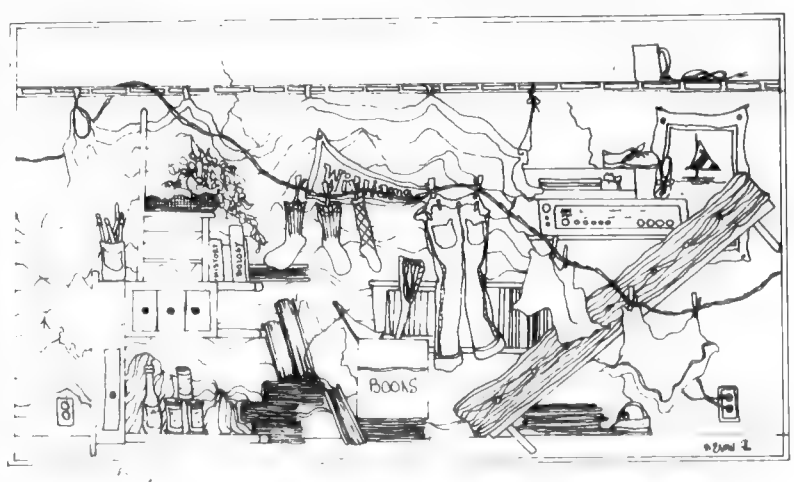
by Peter Rintels

"Be it ever so humble," so the saying goes, "there is no place like home." Which is fortunate since there is no question that here at college, there is much of the humble in what we call home.

But dorm rooms, unlike Chinese philosophers, were not meant to remain humble. Hence a good deal of time goes into changing our rooms into viable and comfortable human habitats.

There are essentially two problems to be overcome in putting together a room: first, space-making, or making more of it in some places (i.e. a Mission Park bedroom) and filling (i.e. with furniture) everywhere else and second, atmosphere, or getting it to look like something.

The mathematician Leibniz once postulated that space was infinite, which only goes to prove that he never lived in Mission Park. Both here and at Greylock one is faced with four or more walls and several sticks of furniture. The problem is not unlike a Chinese puzzle box. You have your sticks of furniture and attempt to fit them together in ingenious ways in order to outsmart the designer of the room and create space. God's creating the world was probably easier. Here are a few suggestions in any case.



First, if you are really bothered by the size of your room, consider this: the square of the hypotenuse is equal to the sum of the squares of the other two sides. This will not enlarge your room any but will at least help you take your mind off the problem.

You could conceivably attempt to increase the physical size of the room. One method would be to try and blow it up like a balloon by increasing the pressure inside the room until it began to expand. Increasing the pressure may be done by sealing the room and pumping air into it, or by locking ten pre-meds inside the night before an orgo exam.

If this method should fail, the only approach left is the arrangement of the furniture. This assumes that furniture is necessary for decent rooms, an assertion which has not been proven, although the Physics department is hard at work on it and is anticipating making a report later this semester.

Assuming that desks, beds and wardrobes are desirable, we are once again faced with the problem of how to arrange them to maximize space. One possibility is stacking; if you can't build out, build up. This is the same principle that went into the Fraternity Decision

Fraternities are once again an issue at Williams College. Dean of the College Peter Berek's statement during last Wednesday's faculty meeting concerning the existence of the Adelphic Literary Society (a fraternal organization with links to the Alpha Delta Phi Greek-letter fraternity) was the first public recognition by a College official that fraternities exist at Williams since the complete abolition of fraternities in 1970.

It is not clear that the College's raising the issue at this time is entirely motivated by concern for the possible disruptive effects of fraternities on the social and academic life of the campus. The ALS seems to have attracted more College attention than two fraternities located in Vermont in part because the ALS made an effort to contact alumni for financial support.

Of deep concern to some members of the administration is the fact that some College buildings could revert to ownership by the fraternities formerly housed in them should the College implicitly permit the return of fraternities. Also in Wednesday's faculty meeting, President John W. Chandler said that the trustees will reaffirm their opposition to a return to a fraternity system.

This will deal with the present latent legal problem, but does not deal with the issues raised by the recently formed ALS and the continued clandestine existence of Theta Delta Xi and Kappa Alpha out of Vermont chapter houses.

The key issue is not the fact that the ownership of some College buildings may at some point be brought into question. More important is the fact that at least fifty undergraduates are members of organizations the College has prescribed as fraternities. A trustee resolution endorsing the abolition of fraternities achieves little in the direction of solving the problem.

The College needs to know why undergraduates are violating College policy by joining fraternities. Is it an opportunity to have one's drinking supported by alumni dollars as some College officials seem to suggest? Are there as many problems with the residential house system as some students suggest? Is it that fraternities provide students with such advantages as preferential treatment in the job market by other members of the same fraternity, a place to stay when returning to Williams and a place to stay when visiting other campuses? Or is it just the aura of doing something forbidden?

If College officials are as concerned with the return of fraternities as they appear to be, they must begin trying to answer these questions. In any case, they must change the hear-no-evil fence-wavering which has distinguished their fraternity policies in the past.

NEWS BRIEFS

Foreign teaching posts available

Dean Julien has announced that there are a number of grants available for graduating seniors who are interested in studying or teaching abroad next year. Applications are due Oct. 13 and are available in the Dean's Office.

Goodell sees no need for swine flu shots

College physician Robert A. Goodell stated last week that the Thompson Infirmary has made no plans for innoculating students against swine flu.

"There will almost certainly be innoculations given in the Williamstown area in early October," said Goodell, but the program will initially concentrate on those who will be most susceptible, primarily people who are over 65 or who have chronic diseases. Goodell added that, "I have yet to see a firm recommendation for ages under 25 from HEW. When this becomes clear, I'll be glad to submit my own recommendations to the college."

Amherst frosh class biggest ever

Amherst College registered the largest freshman class in its history this year, the Amherst Student reported last week. The 422-member class of 1980 included 157 women, admitted as freshmen for the first time. The enrollment of 99 transfer students raised the total student population close to 1500, 300 larger than last year.

The Student also noted high acceptance rates for alumni children, "the largest percentage of minority student in the freshman class in history (15 per cent)," and "extensive resort to the waiting list (53 students admitted)."

Deficit Pleasure

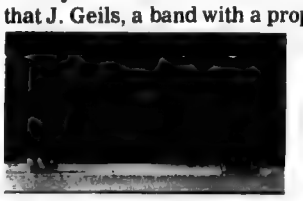
Jim Bowe and his beleaguered ACEC borrowed a page from Henry Kissinger's crisis diplomacy techniques last week as they scrambled to extricate themselves from their latest dilemma in the wake of the Tavares cancellation. In the process, however, they may have sounded the death bell for the group.

Towards the beginning of the week we were informed that Tavares would be unable to perform here because of a leg injury sustained by one of its members. And since legs play such a crucial role in the ability of the individual to sing, everyone bought Tavares' excuse.

A personal letter from the ACEC handed out to all students in Baxter and an open meeting Wednesday night in Jesup soon followed. The letter informed us that Arlo Guthrie would appear here the eighth of October. The meeting led to the consideration of the J. Geils Band for the Homecoming concert.

Round Two: The letter didn't say that Guthrie, a performer ideally suited for Chapin Hall, would have to appear in the hockey rink because someone in the Purple Valley had already scheduled performances of Gilbert and Sullivan's "HMS Pinafore" in Chapin that weekend. Friday's Record then informed us that J. Geils, a band with a propensity for cancelling just days before a concert, had been kind enough to take itself out of the picture early.

All in all, a rather traumatic but fairly well handled week for an organization that has spent the past three years trying to fend off student criticism, Finance Committee skepticism, and bi-monthly editorial attacks in the Record. The coming weeks, in which the ACEC must present its budget to the Finance Committee, book a Homecoming concert, and present and promote the Guthrie concert, will provide even more challenging tests for the committee, however. Its future existence may well depend upon both the student body's and the committee's recognition of and response to several key factors.



First, the cards are stacked against the committee from the outset since the next year's officers aren't selected until the spring. As a result, the committee must fight the calendar when booking concerts, especially those in the fall semester.

Second, the glory days of Stevie Wonder, Loggins and Messina, Jim Croce, and John Sebastian are long gone. Many top rate performers are reluctant to perform before only 1,000 fans in Chapin, and those who are unfortunately out of the ACEC's price range. Consequently, the committee must content itself with booking up and coming talent (Pousette Dart Band), bands that never quite made it despite all their hype (King Crimson), or groups that have already peaked and are trying to catch all they can before calling it quits.

Third, you can't please the musical tastes of all Williams students any of the time. About the only common denominator for the music tastes here is an interest in jazz. Therefore, it is becoming increasingly difficult to sell 1200 tickets to 1800 students for any given concert. Townies are being counted on more and more to help fill Chapin.

Which brings us to the final factor. Can the ACEC, given the above, continue to justify its existence? Or is it an anachronism? Are students willing to see upwards of $20,000 given to a committee that concerns itself with what one might call deficit pleasure? Will the Finance Committee justify as sound and acceptable economics the presentation of concerts whieh lose anywhere from $1,000 to $3,000 a shot?

These aren't easy questions to resolve, but they are ones to which Jim Bowe and the ACEC must address themselves in the next few weeks. Their responses will determine both the future of the ACEC and the future of concerts at Williams.

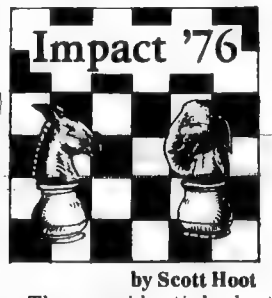
Housing Hassle

by Larry Saunders

The College Council vote last Wednesday to elect Lilli Scheye and Cathy Jackson co-chairmen of the Housing Committee revealed a serious shortcoming of our student government. Many council members did not actually know what they were voting on when Scheye and Jackson were elected.

According to council president Steve Piltch, the council was not actually voting on whether to name Scheye and Jackson as co-chairmen, but rather on a proposal that mandated their appointment.



Piltch claims that he informed the council that in the past one co-chairman had always been a carry-over from the previous year. Lilli Scheye was co-chairman of the Housing Committee last spring. He also claims that last spring the council passed a resolution that made the council's representative on the Housing Committee a co-chairman as well. Cathy Jackson is the council's representative on the Housing Committee. According to Piltch, he was asking the council to vote to accept this procedure in appointing co-chairmen. Even though this procedure necessarily meant the naming of Scheye and Jackson as co-chairmen, the council was not being asked to actually vote on these two people, only on a procedure.

Piltch did not adequately explain this fine line of distinction to the council members when he brought the issue before them. It appeared to most council members that they were being asked to ratify Piltch's two choices for the co-chairmen positions. Several council members raised objections to Scheye and Jackson. Two members asked Piltch if they could place other names in nomination. Piltch responded that they could only if they defeated the motion on the floor.

At that point in the procedure several council members were seriously confused. They seemed to assume that they could ratify the established process for naming co-chairmen and then nominate other people for these positions. When the vote was taken and the council overwhelmingly approved the procedural question, Scheye and Jackson were automatically appointed and the matter was closed. Several members then felt that the entire election had been railroaded.

Adding to this confusion was an assumption by some members that the Elections Committee had recommended Scheye and Jackson for approval. This misunderstanding stems from the fact that Piltch stated that vice-president Randy Sturges supported the appointment of Scheye and Jackson. Sturges is the chairman of the Elections Committee and his support led some members to believe that Scheye and Jackson were recommended by his committee. Sturges was absent from the meeting due to sickness and therefore could not clarify this confusion.

Question: How can the council expect to improve its communications with the campus when it has difficulty communicating with itself?

Political Potpourri

by Scott Hoot

The presidential election takes place six weeks from today. For those of you who have not registered and would like to vote there is only one real solution. Go home immediately. Most states require registration by October 2nd, and it must take place in person.

Williamstown remains a remote possibility. Unlike her Amherst colleague, our town clerk actually requires proof of residency. In other words if you own a car or valuable life insurance things could get sticky. But there are a handful of registered students, and if it's your only chance, give it a try. The Town Hall is located across Route 7 from Greylock.

Now, for everyone who is registered, it is time to apply for an absentee ballot. This can be a long process—absentee ballots are notorious for arriving on the Monday before the first Tuesday. To apply for an application write your local town or city halls (New York residents write your county Board of Election), or better yet have your parents call and cut down on the paperwork.

Last week was primary week in many states, including Massachusetts. Not surprisingly Ted Kennedy walloped his two Louise Day Hickish opponents and now faces rather insignificant Republican opposition in November. Michael Robertson, a Berkeley selectman, was literally the only state Republican willing to offer himself in sacrifice.

After November 2 Williamstown will remain unrepresented in either Washington or Boston. Republican Congressman Silvio Conte of Pittsfield faces stronger than usual opposition from Edward O'Brien of Easthampton. State Senator John Fitzpatrick, the owner of the Red Lion Inn in Stockbridge has opposition from Pittsfield Councilor Robert Jakubowicz. Democratic State Representative Tony McBride faces Vincent Zajac, both of Adams. McBride survived a very strong primary challenge from Dagmar Bubriski, a member of the Williamstown Democratic Committee. In a battle of the communities Williamstown lost because of some old-fashioned gerrymandering. Despite its small size, one-third of the town is in a district with North Adams. If this portion of the town had voted with the rest, Ms. Bubriski would have won. Even in Boston there seems to be distrust of college types.

The Great Presidential Bicentennial Debate begins Thursday night at 9:30 with a discussion of domestic issues. Watch closely for signs of a five o'clock shadow on either candidate.

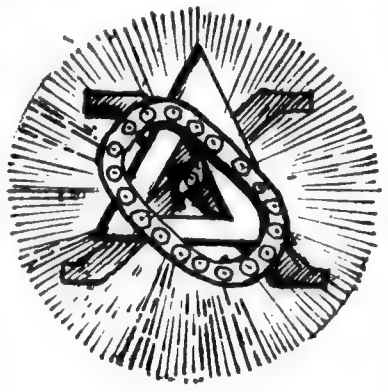
HODGE MARKGRAF: "There used to be a guaranteed ratio involving the quotas that each fraternity was allowed to pledge. Take, for instance, an incoming class of 300 students. Fifteen per cent would be lopped off of that, which would be 45, so that you would then take 255 freshmen and divide those by 15 social units and that figure was the figure that each fraternity was allowed to pledge. So you guaranteed in advance that there would be 45 freshman men who could not be pledged by fraternities—you didn't know who they would be but you guaranteed that there would be the bottom part of the iceberg that would always end up in the Garfield Club, and it was viewed that way, that it was a bottom, that they were the people that made the upper half feel superior . . .

. . . One of the first big flaps that was in my view the beginning of the end occurred in December of '51 when the Garfield Club voted to disband. They voted to go out of business and not be the place, as they viewed themselves, primarily, for the rejects from the fraternities. That was not part of the game—they were not behaving properly. Part of the game was that that was to exist for the rest of us to feel better, and occasionally we would dip down into the Garfield Club and tap someone in his sophomore or junior year when his true worth was finally perceived. The Garfield Club said in essence that they were not going to function in that capacity and just voted to disband. That caused quite a bit of consternation on campus . . . It was all smoothed over as I recall.—There was no physical change.—They still lived in Currier Hall primarily and ate their meals in the basement,—but I gather that that was a signal that all was not well . . .

You used to be rushed right after you got off the train, before you even had your first class. That was viewed as an inequitous feature, that you were split into 15 sub groups with no loyalty to the college. Your primary loyalty even before classes started was to a fraternity, and the analysis that came forth in the mid 50's was that that was a mistake in the—sense of loyalties and that hence we should have delayed rushing—they called it deferred rushing, to be conducted at the beginning of the sophomore year rather than freshman—which required the building of Baxter Hall.

This capacity to feed the freshman class (previously all freshmen ate their meals in their fraternity—there was no freshman dining hall) had an economic cost because you had only 3 classes paying the bill for what had normally been a four year group of men. That had the consequence of needing more men in the fraternities. If you had 4 classes of 15 men each in a 60 man fraternity you now needed 3 classes of 20 men and that started to whittle away at this concept of the guaranteed bottom percentage that you always lopped off before pledging started. So for economic reasons it was necessary to dip more and more into the Garfield Club, to deny them to have very many members so that the fraternities could remain solvent. Things now in the late 50's were working so close to total opportunity that to not make a fraternity in your sophomore year was doubly damning.

Kappa Alpha



The watershed to me was the second World War. Williams alumni who graduated in the 30's and before did not know by and large what the fraternities had come to in the 50s . . . This become evident in the testimony before the committee when you would get fraternity men together. All of them were for maintaining their fraternity, but when you asked them what they thought their fraternity was, and to describe it, sometimes it was very clear that they didn't approve of the fraternities that the people in the 50's were asking to maintain. There turned out to be quite a large divergence of what each man thought he was defending when he urged the preservation of fraternities. This was a revelation to me, that how the fraternities functioned in the 20s and 30s was so different from the 50s that you couldn't really call it the same kind of social system. Williams College was just a different place in the 50s.

R. R. R. BROOKS: The war had changed the role of fraternities quite a bit. Tyler Dennett had changed it somewhat. I don't think Phinney Baxter had in mind changing it at all. I think that he had other bourgeois things in view, but he soon found this thing thrust upon him by the sort of democratizing and egalitarian effects of the war. I don't think you can say it more specifically than that—the vague notion that the fraternity system was based on social snobbism, that in fact the old term the 'Greeks and the barbarians' back in the 1900s prevailed probably in an even more elaborate form in that the houses themselves had become typed as real blue bloods, and semi blue-bloods, and so on down to rock bottom houses that were no better, or not much better than the barbarians, than the non affiliates. The only attack that I know of that has been made on this problem was during the previous regime, which was to create the Garfield Club with the expectation that this would provide at least the social amenities for those who weren't invited to join the fraternities and at least take a little of the curse off being completely outside because it was quite clear that although the fundamental appeal of the fraternity system was snobbism, it really was a system of grading yourself in relation to your fellow man. It provided a pecking order so that you could kick around the man below you.

. . . It was my impression that the leadership in at least the first part of the anti-fraternity movement came from the faculty, perhaps only a minority of 30 per cent and probably not organized in any way as far as I could tell, but it was also clear that there was an anti fraternity sentiment growing strongly in the student body and that this centered in the Garfield Club . . . It seemed to me that very early the anti-fraternity movement took the form of going in for complete rushing. Complete rushing meant that you solved the fraternity problem by getting everyone into a fraternity, and since it was believed that the primary fault of the fraternity system was its selectivity and its artificial pecking order, that the way to cope with this was to get everyone in.

Insofar as I had any influence, and it was limited because I was not a Williams alumnus, I used it in that direction . . . I never even thought of the possibility of abolishing the fraternity system in toto. I think I thought it absolutely impossible to bring this about, and so the sensible, reasonable, and practical approach was the new wine in old skins routine which was complete rushing. . . . At least people would have the opportunity to go through the mummery of choice, and it seemed to me that the most important thing was to have a choice even if it became a mummery at its extremes—the individual ought to feel that he's had a chance to choose and the houses ought to do it. Otherwise, they would cease to have the core of their identity, which was selectivity. So my idea was to have the central idea of the fraternity in the form of selectivity, but to have it meaningless.

. . . Towards the end of the 50s I began to have some doubts as to the wisdom of this because as we approached success in bringing about complete rushing, that what was happening was that a pecking order was growing up among the fraternities that was just as severe in its social implications as the previous business of having a bunch of ins and a bunch of outs, that when you had a sort of discard basket, into which you could throw all the "undesirables" then the distinctions among the houses were less apparent. But as everyone got into the houses then this powerful drive towards the establishment of a pecking order began to become more apparent and consequently the houses were becoming typed and you had three or four at the bottom that were rapidly becoming Jewish houses because the top in terms of historical prestige continued to refuse the Jewish people.

Theta Delta Chi

. . . In the late 40s and early 50s it was still obvious that the anti Jewish bias was still powerful, not to speak of the anti-black bias. So much was this true that the Garfield Club was probably half Jewish and since the prestige and the physical amenities and the social life in the Garfield Club was not as pleasant as in the fraternities, the parents of the Jewish sons began to approach the college and particularly me and say you ought to allow Jewish fraternities—they're missing out—to which I replied that this is the last thing we should be doing, that what we should be doing is to get everybody in, or get rid of the fraternities, but not to institutionalize prejudice in bricks and mortar by creating structures which we can never get rid of.

. . . I wondered if I had any support for this view and so I went to Mr. Baxter. This was a very risky thing to do because he had an apopletic temper and if it didn't hit him just right he could become totally irrational. Three days later he would be very apologetic and you could go back and have it over again but I dreaded these experiences of tackling anything as sensitive as the fund raising impact of the fraternity business but I went to him one day and said this is what I'm doing and he said alright. He didn't sound very enthusiastic but he said I think that's the right step to take. That's about all the support I got, but it was enough and so perhaps the one contribution, if it is one, that I made to that decade was the fact that we held off the Jewish fraternities to a point when the whole situation suddenly became totally fluid with the appointment of Angevine Committee and the whole scene changed overnight.

. . . I was aware to a much larger degree I think, than most of the faculty of the values of the fraternity system . . . The houses were to a very, very interesting and significant degree the administrative agents of the dean's office, of the president's office and I don't think the faculty ever understood this or if they did understand it they didn't like it. They thought that it was a kind of travesty that this kind of responsibility that the college itself should be capable of undertaking and carrying on was given to the houses. This was a time, remember, when the parental functions of the college were much stronger than they are now.

. . . I was very nervous about what would happen if the fraternities lost a sense of their identity, an identity which they would want to associate with prestige, and a presitge which would be associated in turn with keeping order, keeping your drunks out of sight, and not having illegitimate babies too often. It really made me nervous to think how this institution could be run if these places became at best disinterested in the good name of the college and at worst hostile to it . . . Would they do it for themselves in sort of nameless, unidentifiable groups?

JOHN ENGLISH: There was a tendency, I'm afraid, on the campus not to talk about the problems fraternities were engendering . . . I don't think the college as a whole was letting the alumni know what was happening . . . The alumni did not appreciate the change that came after World War II—everybody thought of fraternity life as it occurred in his era . . . There was a lot of I'd say very legitimate misunderstanding based on the fact that the college itself hadn't in various ways let the problems leak out so that when the action was taken everyone could sort of say well I smelled this coming.

. . . My own feeling was that World War II was probably the biggest factor. A lot of students came back who had been through the war and couldn't go back to the mumbo jumbo of fraternity life . . . They became after awhile boarding houses over which the college had very little control. They were kind of a refuge from the college, really, right on campus, and Jack Sawyer had a very strong feeling that the college experience if it's going to be worth what it costs should be a 24 hour one.

. . . . (Upon returning to Williams in 1959) I would say I guess the most striking difference was what I call the absence of the best features of fraternity life . . . It was obvious that they weren't what they used to be, but it never occurred to me that the Board of Trustees would have the courage to take the action they did because there'd been several committees who had studied the situation and all backed away from it . . . I'm sure that while alumni knew this was going on that not more than one in a 100 thought it'd be any different from the Sterling Committee or its predecessors . . .

. . . Alumni support of fraternities was really eroding pretty heavily in that day, in my opinion . . . Many felt they no longer had the fraternity house to go to and they missed that link with the undergraduates. In the earlier days they had had it . . .

BRUCE GRINNELL: When I became familiar with the fraternity system and its operation and became actively involved in the running of a fraternity there were a number of things that led me to believe that it was not the best social system you could find in an educational institution . . . The fraternities were homogeneous groupings. There were 3 or 4 houses with predominantly athletes, 2 or 3 intellectual houses, and 1 or 2 Jewish houses and 1 or 2 "different" houses . . . There was the blackball system—no, I don't want to live with that guy, and some houses had the butter system—this guy's OK but I don't care to live with him, and if you had three butters, the student was out.

. . . I was completely disillusioned on the butter system in the fraternity I was in. Whether or not you made a particular fraternity sometimes depended on whether or not you possessed certain social amenities, sometimes ethnic and religious backgrounds, and of course racial backgrounds. When I was at Williams there were very few blacks. Some fraternities had to disassociate themselves from the national because the national maintained an anti-black provision and Williams forced the local chapters to make a policy statement that they wouldn't adhere to that but I'm not so sure it wasn't lip service for the Trustees . . . It was a social system run entirely by the students and supported by alumni—a lot of alumni gave more to their fraternity than they did to the college. The fraternities had gone as far as they could to create the ideal fraternity system . . .

. . . Sometime in February or March a member of my frat proposed a Korean student who was a social member of the house to become a full member. I must have been terribly naive because I thought it was a great idea and would fly right through, but two or three guys said that they didn't mind him being a social member but that they didn't know if they could live with him.

. . . I became terribly disillusioned—I couldn't believe that this could happen and I began to talk with other people in other fraternities. Through a series of discussions we began to find out that these things were not that uncommon and that this was one of the serious inequities in the fraternity system, together with the fact that the academic life and the social life of the college seemed to be totally separated. There was never an intermingling of the two. . . . Now maybe there wasn't a conscious effort to suppress it, but the feeling was that we had enough of class and studies at the library five days a week. There was no conscious effort to arouse any intellectual activity at many houses . . . The faculty I know were reluctant to come to our fraternity because they felt unwanted, they felt like they were intruding. The college also could exercise very little control over the fraternities.

For these two reasons and the one specific example I gave these meetings grew in number until finally—I was a JA at the time and it was during exam period—we met about 1 AM in the Physics building and some pro-frat people came. I think there was a pretty healthy exchange of what was wrong with the fraternities and whether or not it was possible to reform them without abolishing them. It was decided by those 50 people who signed the petition that there was really nothing that could be done within the system itself . . . The only reason it bore the name Grinnell petition was because I signed it first.

. . . President Baxter turned us off. His response was that I came with 16 fraternities and I'm leaving with 16. (Baxter was to retire that June) . . .

Alpha Delta Phi

. . . There were a number of alumni who would come back on football weekends and would attend social functions at their old house where everyone would booze it up and they'd think it was great . . .

. . . We hoped to bring what we considered serious inequities in the fraternity system itself to the attention of the President and the administration and perhaps the trustees with the hope that they would examine it thoroughly to our satisfaction and come up with some recommendations . . . Idealistically, we were thinking about abolishing the fraternity system and replacing it with a system with fewer inequities and something that was more consistent and compatible with the overall educational policy of Williams College. I think the latter was achieved and the fact that it moved as quickly as it did probably exceeded our expectations.

Performance inspired but confused

Keuter dancers leave audience ambivalent

by Nina Girvetz

There were wide variations in audience reaction to the Cliff Keuter Dance Company, at the AMT last Friday and Saturday nights. It seemed that most people found the humor and spirit of the dancers and choreography enjoyable, yet many left the theater confused and ambivalent. Although every piece included several undeniably striking, occasionally inspired segments, much of Keuter's choreography lacked a clear central idea that was carried through fully and coherently. All eight dancers are technically excellent, warm and personable, are generally tight in their ensemble work, and have the extraordinary stamina to make demanding movement, timing and pacing appear smooth and effortless. But the choreography itself is not so easily described or appraised, for its symbolism is often oblique and highly personal, despite explicit captions on the program.

Visit, a work performed by the four women of the company on both nights, alternated passages of fluid, lyrical, sensuous movement, often built on ballet line and positions which the dancers subtley bent or stretched, with tragi-comic gesture about the brief interactions of the women. They jog, then sink, mouth words grotesquely, and like the four furies, attack each other and flail in terror. The most striking moment is toward the end of the long piece, when one woman, (Karla Wolfangle) perhaps a Libation Bearer, moves across the upstage floor, slowly sprinkling glitter (water? light?), and then returns to dance with wonderfully sparkling hands and feet. Keuter often plays with the light motif—he uses props such as candles, flashlights, etc., but this one is particularly effective. The music blended beautifully with the movement and moods of the work.

On Friday night, the company performed Musette di Taverni, Sunday Papers and Field. The Musette was a favorite—a boisterous, hysterically funny bumpkin sailors stomp, done with incredible choreographic and vocal gusto, colorful costumes and joyous rapport with each other and the audience. The dance was consistent, Keuter's intention was truly and imaginatively fulfilled, and every moment was delightful. Sunday Papers, a more disjointed work of jolting mood and movement quality shifts, and strange props, a Field, a story-dance about a father (Keuter), son (Michael Tipton) and family, were both interesting, and each had several short moments that worked perfectly. The symbolism is Papers was often unclear, although the weird music, the tremendous dancing and such things as the comical clapping machine and tap dance, the "flashers" and the jumpy, rhythmic pas de deux redeemed the piece's entertainment value. Tipton was subtle, innocent and gentle in Field—his performance was excellent in an overly explicit choreography with many flaws.

The clumsy pantomime and trite religious images in The Murder of George Keuter, done Saturday, were irritating, although the four male dancers' ensemble work was sharp and skilled. The two world premieres were by definition a bit loose in both choreography and execution. Interlude fluttered from jazz to Hollywood to love scenes to ballet parody a little too flimsily, although there were some funny bits and pieces. Perhaps Keuter will cut down on the quick shifts and jolts, and carry through certain sections as he reworks the dance. Tetrad was symmetrical in form, and slightly clearer in purpose. Two men and two women began a square dance set of bows, then transformed the dance into an echo of a Pas de Quatre, complete with arabesque pose. Funny duet adagios and a nice polka section (Keuter is good with heavy rhythmic beats) give the work some substance, and again, the dancers themselves were tremendous. Both evenings with the Cliff Keuter Dance Company were worth attending. Keuter is bound to grow choreographically, and eventually blossom in time.

We're off to see the wizard—uninterrupted and on the big screen—this Friday evening in Bronfman, sponsored by the Williams Film Society.

creation of Manhattan's skyscrapers, admittedly objects of dubious emulation.

Quite simply, stick chairs on top of desks, desks on top of beds, beds on top of wardrobes, and top it all with whipped cream and a cherry. Serve over rice. You will have created tremendous amounts of space and a conversation piece as well. And if you're up after Constantine closes, there is always the whipped cream, cherry and rice. A clever chef can think up endless variations. The obvious drawback of this arrangement is that the usefulness of your furniture is reduced to nil. The search for lebensraum, however, must inevitably leave casualties in its wake.

It is often helpful just to get furniture out of the way by elevating it, thus creating the precious living space underneath. The most creative way to do this would be make a furniture mobile, using high tension steel cable to dangle stereo, desk and bed from the ceiling. And should the ceiling not be up to carrying the load, one has at least created a means for getting friends upstairs to drop in, even if their arrival would be accompanied by a reading of seven on the Richter scale.

Finally, one can work simply with the bed, which is laid out horizontally. If stood on its end, a significant saving of space could be achieved. This means sleeping on your feet like a horse with the probable development of horse sense and flat feet. It is not recommended that you tell a podiatrist that you got flat feet from sleeping standing up. He will think you are weird.

Enough concerning how to save space. To fill it, many people like using plants because it is often nice to have living things around. If you have more space than plants can fill, but still wish to enjoy the presence of living things, I would suggest a gorilla. Not only do gorillas fill a lot of space, but they can fill many different bare spots by simply moving around. And should a problem with house mascots arise, . . . the solution is self-evident.

For the decorating fanatics, there are the interior decorating magazines, such as Better Homes and Garden. But it is assumed that anyone seriously considering using one is completely out of his or her mind. No sane person would want to invest the kind of money that institutionally-sanctioned good taste requires.

Eusden addresses Chapel Board group

Williams College Chaplain John D. Eusden addressed the Chapel Board's Friday night discussion group on the topic of truth in religion. Eusden called truth seeking in religion a seeking of "integration and compassion" and proceeded to discuss it in the light of his personal ties to both Zen Buddhism and Christianity.

Eusden called for a "backing out of illusion" which he said meant "rigorous self-examination" and "to stop saying one religion is absolute and unique." "We should recognize with Gandhi that God's truth is so high and unattainable that there must be more than one path to it," he said.

Explaining "integration," Eusden said "it means to find your own personhood and to find an understanding that will give you some balance, harmony and inner worth."

Peer Health cuts back scheduled counseling

The Peer Health Counselors will not sponsor scheduled counseling hours in the Women's Center this year because of poor student response to last year's program. "People are hesitant about coming in", explained counselor Shirley Be. '77. Though these counseling sessions were not well attended, group members said they felt it was effective in reaching people through the gynecology clinic at the infirmary as well as through friends and acquaintances.

1976 counselors include Martha Constable '79, Beth Hubbell '77, Karen Leaf '77, Susan Lee '77, Liz Stell '79, Ann Weisman '77 and Be. These women were trained last year to provide counseling by Kristina Beatty, formerly affiliated with Family Planning in North Adams.

Despite the cutback in scheduled counseling, the group intends to take a more active role on campus this year, according to Hubbell. At least one Peer Health Counselor will be available during the gynecology clinic hours in the infirmary. In addition, the counselors plan to sponsor guest speakers and an informational film. They also intend to become a resource JAs can turn to when dealing with their entries.

The Peer Health Counselors are always available for counseling, and students should feel free to contact them at any time.

Kristina Beatty will continue to offer counseling from 3 to 5 p.m. every Friday in the Women's Center.

Runners outstrip opponents in opening tri-meet at RPI

by Frank Carr

The Williams men's varsity cross-country team opened its season Saturday and cruised to easy wins over Hamilton and R.P.I., thus setting down a solid base for an attempt at a second straight undefeated season. Williams took the tri-meet with 22 points, followed by Hamilton with 45 and R.P.I. with 61.

Before the race started, Hamilton's coach was overheard saying, "We've got first and second place wrapped up." Well, as expected, Hamilton's All-American, Jon Schmeyer was the individual winner, however, his coach was slightly surprised when four Williams runners crossed the finish line before his number two man.

Joe Kolb and Tom Schreck ran side by side over the hilly five-mile R.P.I. course and finished 2-3 respectively, both with a time of 26:45. Frank Carr and Dan Sullivan cruised along together in sixth and seventh place, until the last mile when they blew past a runner from R.P.I. and another one from Hamilton. Carr crossed the line in fourth place in 26:50 and Sullivan was one second behind in fifth.

Sophomore Steve Polasky grabbed eighth place and seniors Bert Saul, Chris Flavin and Ed Bacher finished 12th, 14th, and 22nd respectively. Jeff Magoon (24th) and Jon Miller (26th) rounded out the varsity contingent.

The junior varsity harriers also posted double victories and were led by freshmen Mike Behrman in first place and Garrick Leonard in the runner-up position. Junior transfer Hans Giesecke, powered his way to a fourth place finish, while Russ Anderson completed the 3.9 mile "Asphalt Tour Through Troy" in the no. seven spot. Larry Wu (13th) and Peter Winn (14th) both finished ahead of R.P.I.'s third man and juniors Larry Mitchell and Stew Read ended up in 17th and 29th respectively.

Saturday Williams will host the fourth annual "Aluminum Bowl" which pits the varsity and jayvee against the alumni. A year ago, the alumni meet was the narrowest victory of the season for the varsity. The '76 race, which starts at noon in the science quad could be just as close.

Joe Kolb (left) and Tom Schreck lead the pack in last Saturday's tri-meet against RPI and Hamilton. Kolb and Schreck led the Williams sweep of second through fifth places, with the Ephs easily winning the team competition. (Read)

Women's teams open seasons

Scrimmages indicate field hockey's strength

by Nancy Rhein

If preseason field hockey scrimmages are any indication of potential for success in regular season play, the Williams stickwomen can count on a winning season.

Despite the return of only five letterwomen from last year's 7-2-1 squad, the Ephwomen quickly got it all together, and with only a week of practice, trounced North Adams Thursday, 5-0.

Playing together for the first time the Williams defense, which includes freshman goalie Mimmie DuMouchel, surprised coach Linda Wilkins. "I was really pleased. We co-ordinated our defense. They were talking and really covering for each other."

Although DuMouchel had seven saves in the game, Wilkins feels the defense was not really tested. "We weren't challenged in the North Adams game, the entire defense has fine skills, but they need to get used to playing with each other."

The offense, on the other hand, is comprised of experienced players led by co-captains Shailah Stewart and Amy Kindwall. Adding depth to this balanced line is outstanding 1975 junior varsity scorer Sally Kraft, who Wilkins describes as possessing "great drive and push-up ability to get the rebounds."

This ability to score goals was evident in the team's play Saturday in a referee's tournament. Although the Ephwomen started slowly and were defeated 2-1 by Herkimer, they came back to win the consolation round with a pair of 8-0 victories over RPI and Vassar.

Leading the scoring were inners Stewart with six goals and Kraft with four.

Recognizing the strength of the forward line, Wilkins remarked that "This year's team looks even stronger than last years."

While the biggest challenges are posed by Middlebury, Mt. Holyoke, and Yale, Wilkins noted, "We are even with the league competition. The games could go either way."

She observed that "the team just gets better the more they play together." Despite the guarded optimism of Coach Wilkins, the Ephwomen seem assured of another winning season.

Tennis continues winning tradition

Winning may very well prove to be a way of life for the women's varsity tennis team again this year as they proved last Saturday in their first match by trouncing a good Tufts squad 8-1. Coach Curt Tong was pleased by his racketwomen's performance in a contest that saw five of the nine matches extended to three sets, with Williams victorious in all but one.

Freshwomen Rebecca Chase and Trudy tenBroeke and sophomores Amy Demorest and Barb Ernst have apparently been around the women's team long enough to pick up the magic touch of Williams tennis as they all won important singles matches. Demorest, Chase and tenBroeke dispatched with their opponents in two sets, while Ernst's succumbed in three.

Not to be outdone by their younger teammates, the senior-junior doubles combinations of Babe Kirk and Sally Kruse, Holly Prentice and Amy Sterling and Sue Guttman and Sherry Willcox all made the ride back to Boston a long one for their defeated opponents. Number two singles player Laura Carson took three sets to top her Tufts foe, while number one Jonnina Sadoff suffered the only loss of the day for the Ephwomen, a heart-breaking three set loss with a tie-breaker deciding the final set.

The team faces especially tough Trinity today and Mt. Holyoke Thursday.

Cross-country team cops second place

In their opening meet of the season, Williams' women's cross-country team posted a second-place finish in the University of Lowell Invitational. UMass placed first in the seven team event with 24 points followed by Williams with 63 and Brandeis with 79.

Junior Michelle Cutsforth led the Ephwomen by placing third among the field of over 40 runners. Mary Hakala also cracked the top ten with an eighth place effort.

Debbie Gregg, Lisa Capaldini and Lisa Greene finished fifteenth, seventeenth and nineteenth respectively, exemplifying the great depth of the '76 squad.

Gridders' victory convinces no one

by Tim Layden

Agreed, it wasn't Dartmouth, Williams' second scrimmage tuneup in each of the past two years, but the Ephs truly needed Friday's convincing 27-9 win over the Albany State jayvee squad on Weston Field.

"It was considerably better than the week before," sighed coach Bob Odell, "but we still have a long way to go." Perhaps Odell was simply pleased that for the first time in ten days, he sent his charges into contact and came out with no injuries.

Williams scored on their first possession of the afternoon, driving 58 yards in eight plays, with co-captain Tom Redden crashing over from the one for the first Williams tally of the year.

Albany St. is a school which has built a respectable varsity football program from its club beginnings only seven years ago, but the patchwork squad which the Great Danes sent to Weston Field was no match for the Ephmen.

Quarterbacks Don Wallace and Bill Whelan had little trouble picking apart the Albany secondary, throwing for nearly 200 yards and three touchdowns. The second Purple score of the afternoon came when sophomore tight end Kurt Anderson slipped beyond the white-shirted chinese fire drill posing as a pass defense and hauled in a 41-yard touchdown heave from Wallace.

Williams pounced across a pair of scores in the second half of the scrimmage, with Wallace and Whelan each throwing for a score. Wallace tossed an ad-lib 10 yarder to Ken Hollingsworth after an out-of-character scramble and Whelan hit a wide-open Ben Blakney with a 24-yard strike.

Albany St. picked up their tallies in the contest on a four yard run and a safety when Lew Kitchin sent a punt snap sailing over the head of Peter Unger and through the end zone.

If Williams were to have any hope of repeating last year's 7-0-1 record, a convincing win over such a foe as Albany St. was needed. Odell feels that "we needed the win for morale and confidence purposes. In that respect, it was a good scrimmage."

Other than a long run by Charlie Carrier in the first quarter, and Mark Gerry's hard-running in the third stanza, the Williams running game was slightly below par. But, it is unlikely that Tom Redden will repeat his infrequent bad day during the eight-game season, and Scott Harrington's absence from the lineup hurt the outside game.

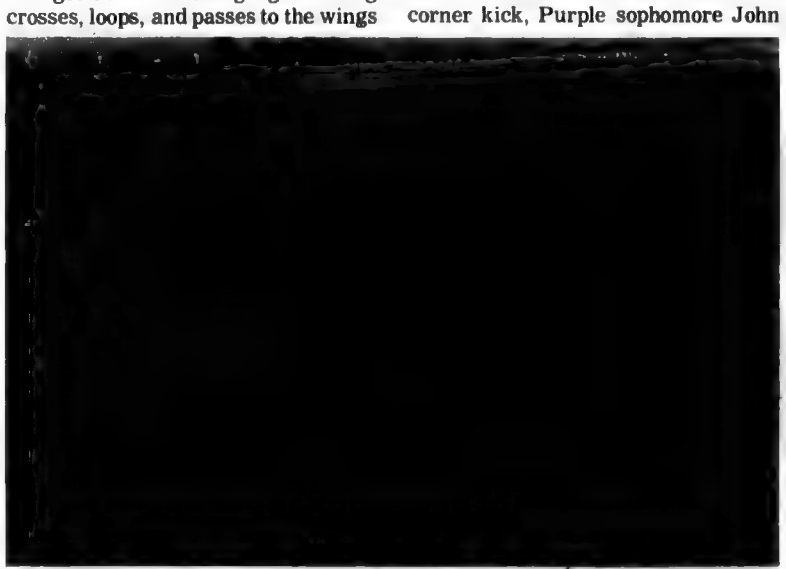
Junior center Kitchin, once thought to be lost for the season, played nearly the entire game, certainly a pleasant sight for offensive line coach Joe Dailey.

Perhaps most evident in the scrimmage was the outstanding play of the younger players on the squad. Sophomore receivers Hollingsworth and Anderson snared seven passes between them and cornerback Mark Eckert may have nailed down a starting spot.

Junior Mike Masi, given his first chance to start, has earned a starting job at one of the questionable defensive end positions, while the other is still up in the air.

Now Odell and company must head back to the grindstone for another week of preparation, with one major difference, this one counts. "We found out a lot of things Friday, and we still have a long way to go," said Odell.

Soccer team manhandles preseason schedule



by Mark Pogue

Williams' varsity soccer team continued its steamroller approach to the regular season last week, leveling Wooster College on Monday, RPI on Wednesday, and a surprised club from UMass on Saturday. In the course of the three wins Williams outscored its opponents 10-2, hiked its pre-season mark to 4-1-1, and served further notice to Division 1 clubs that the Purple will not be easy to beat in 1976.

Williams played three 30-minute periods against Wooster (of Ohio) College on Monday, enough to let Coach Jeff Vennell play both his second and third teams. Wooster, having brought along only 15 players on its Eastern swing, was a little more limited in substitution possibilities, yet still managed to show the Ephs some excellent individual skills. Williams posted a 4-0 shutout win.

On Wednesday night the squad journeyed to Troy for a duel with the RPI Engineers. Vennell went with his first unit in the first half, but this group missed several good scoring opportunities and could only manage a 0-0 standoff. "We were moving the ball much too slowly, trying to control it too much," Vennell commented. "After two or three short passes we'd end up losing it."

In the last half Williams' second string changed the pace of the attack and got the ball rolling again. Long crosses, loops, and passes to the wings were used, allowing the team to exploit its outstanding front-line speed and open up the middle. Midway through the half a shot by forward Perry Nelson put the Ephs up 1-0 and after RPI came back with a score off a corner kick, Purple sophomore John Ballan scored again to hand the Engineers their fifth consecutive preseason breakdown.

The men from UMass came to town on Saturday, a team which had awed the Ephs when the two played last year. This time around, though, both in terms of uniforms and play, Williams was easily the sharper team. The Purple quickly learned to capitalize on UMass' refusal to challenge for the ball, and by the time the first team came out in the second half Williams had a 4-0 bulge on goals by John Friborg, Ray Powell, Steve Smith, and Henry Osborne. Vennell praised the entire team for its play on Saturday, adding that senior wing Powell "played his best half ever for Williams."

Are the Ephs good enough to beat the likes of Harvard, UConn, and Dartmouth this fall? Perhaps the best indication will come tomorrow afternoon, when a top-flight English amateur team visits Williamstown for the final game of its American tour. Already this group of businessmen has whipped Amherst and Harvard on the way to compiling a 7-2 mark against the Yankees.

Kickoff is 4 p.m.

Committee selections refused

Council reconsiders finances

The College Council voted Tuesday night to reconsider its selection of Lilli Scheye and Cathy Jackson as co-chairmen of the Housing Committee. The council's original vote last week was judged improper because the Elections Committee had not met to consider a procedure for filling the positions. Following the vote to reconsider, council vice-president Randy Sturges announced that the Elections Committee would now be accepting self-nominations for the two co-chairmen spots.

Treasurer Clarence Otis outlined a problem that the Finance Committee currently faces in its budget review. Otis stated that the Finance Committee wanted to achieve a sense of consistency in its recommendations, but was severely handicapped by the guidelines under which it now operates. Committeeman Ross Cheit appealed to the Council to establish a new set of guidelines to make the funding process fairer. The council then voted to permit the Finance Committee to establish their own guidelines, but reserved the right to reconsider any of them.

Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad outlined a new restrictive policy on campus parties. Roosenraad stated that beer-mixers would no longer be permitted in carpeted or wood floor areas of the major dining halls.

According to the dean damages resulting from the parties strained the Food Services budget. He added that the administration was willing to reconsider this policy if an effective alternative could be found.

The Athletic Committee, Winter Study Committee, and Committee on Undergraduate Life submitted reports to the council. CUL representative Peter Sheil noted that his committee was preparing a final report on the status of the housing system.

The council also voted to establish a 10:30 curfew on future sessions.

Admissions promotes common application

Williams recently joined 82 colleges in using a common admissions application. Designed to make the application process less complicated and time-consuming for students and counselors, the common form can be photocopied and submitted to any of the participating schools.

The Admissions Office has also changed application deadlines. The final deadline will be Jan. 15 instead of Feb. 1. Early decision applications must be in by Nov. 15; the deadline in the past was Nov. 1.

According to Director of Admissions Philip F. Smith, 300 American high schools made common applications available.

This year, the Admissions Office will accept both the common application and a Williams College application printed before the common form was finalized. In the future, Smith said, the College will send out common forms.

Smith said the only additional material Williams will require will be a teacher evaluation and a peer reference. These forms will be mailed to the applicant after the office receives the common application.

The common form differs only slightly from the old Williams application. Williams asked whether the applicant had relatives who attended Williams; the common application does not. An optional section of the common application asks for the applicant's height, weight and ethnic description.

Replacing Williams' specifically worded essay section is a "personal statement," which may be a description of one's "interest, experience, or achievement or anything else you would like us to know about you." Essays on personal, local or national issues or samples of creative work are also allowed.

The new system costs the college nothing. A small foundation grant covers the cost of printing the common forms.

Last year, the first year the common application was used, ten colleges participated on an experimental basis. This year an open invitation was made to US colleges and secondary schools to join in the use of the common form.

Smith said the deadline changes were made for reasons of "internal convenience." The later fall deadline will give the admissions staff more time to travel to secondary schools, and the earlier January date will give them more time to consider the applications.

Sawyer sees increased popularity

by Chip Buckner

At the opening of Sawyer Library, campus discussion dealt primarily with its physical appearance. A year later there is less talk about aesthetics and more about the library as a place to study. The word is: Sawyer works.

The library at Williams is being used as never before. According to the Annual Report of the Librarian the number of students in the library at a given hour has more than doubled from the Stetson years. The late night hours from 11 p.m. to 2 a.m. are a new feature which add an average of 115 students to the total each night. Circulation of library materials stopped its downward turn and rose for the first year since 1972.

Louise Miller, Supervisor of Circulation, suggests that the increase in usage is because of the fine library staff, but then concedes that the improved facilities might have contributed, too. "Our job is to be friendly and help people," she says, noting that the more students who come in, the more the library can meet this goal.

The reserve room, run by JoAnn Irace, has felt the most dramatic surge. Irace reports that the number of reserve books and articles being circulated jumped from 53 thousand the last year in Stetson to 72 thousand the next year in Sawyer. The move to Sawyer was difficult, and included a change in the art and record reserve systems. As a result the department moves more slowly, but this does not deter the demand for material. "It used to be, if the book's not there, 'Good.' Now the students say 'Why not'—or 'Let's call the professor!' The attitude is completely different." In response to student demands the reserve room fines were raised to insure prompt return of books and to allow wider distribution of a limited number of readings.

The reference librarians are delighted to be in the middle of the main floor. From there, it is easy to "reach out and grab" anyone who wanders around looking lost. They estimate five or six times as many students see them now as in their old room in Stetson.

Perhaps more important are the reactions of the people who work there. Most students consider Sawyer the place to study. "It's a quiet place to get away from a noisy roommate," and "You can't party in the library—you can't study in your room," were typical reactions. There were exceptions, however, who complain of the social atmosphere, and the distractions of students wandering up and down the rows of carrels. A significant number of students say they study in Bronfman, coming to Sawyer only for reserve readings, or between classes. The majority of library users, though, like the open, well-lit spaces, the multiple study areas ("there's one for whatever mood you're in"), the number of students ("you don't feel you're the only one studying"), the vending machines in the basement and the new late hours.

$2 million law may renovate campus

Proposed federal regulations by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare to eliminate discrimination against the handicapped could cost the College up to $2 million in renovation costs, Business Manager Shane Riorden claimed.

The proposed regulations are intended to implement Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, outlawing discrimination against the handicapped. They could require the College to renovate at least twenty buildings at a cost of $75-100,000 each if free access by the handicapped to all important buildings is required, said Riorden. Only the Sawyer Library is presently completely accessible.

Section 504 states that "no otherwise qualified handicapped individual in the United States . . . shall, solely by reason of his handicap, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance."

An initial draft of the regulations were distributed for comment last May and caused "quite a storm," said Riorden. The government "backed off a little," he said, and is now re-examining the regulations. Riorden does not expect a new proposal for "six months to a year," at which time he anticipates the formation of a committee of Williams students, faculty, and administrators to study the situation.

According to Donald McLearn of the Office of Civil Rights of the Department of HEW, which would be responsible for enforcing the regulations, the final regulations should be released for comment by early 1977. Comments on the draft released in May "will definitely be considered," said McLearn.

Riorden accused the government of "shooting from the hip" and "raising false expectations" on the part of the handicapped, since he claimed no college could strictly comply with the draft regulations with substantial subsidy. He said the regulations "taken literally, ask absurd things" and will cause "problems without end" unless modified.

Riorden's description of the results of a strict interpretation of the draft regulations is "not fair" according to McLearn. He would not describe the general reaction to the draft regulations or predict the extent to which they would be modified, but expected they would seek "a middle ground." The regulations will probably reflect "concern for both the handicapped individual and for practicality," he said. Their enforcement "would depend on the individual situation," according to McLearn.

According to Riorden, the College could accommodate "a few" handicapped students by rescheduling

Housing chairs respond

Lilli Scheye and Cathy Jackson, former co-chairmen of Housing Committee, said they would not reapply after being removed from office at Tuesday night's College Council meeting. Jackson '79 commented, "The whole procedure was wrong in the first place, but it is going to disrupt motions already begun." She plans to retain her position on the committee as a CC representative.

Scheye '78 said, "I think the CC acted very irresponsibly, and I'm not going to reapply. There may be unfortunate consequences CC has not foreseen." Scheye said she accepts what the CC did because it had a "sticky problem." Jackson said she feels the committee will lose something very valuable if it loses Scheye.

The committee met once under Scheye and Jackson; previously the committee has convened in the spring. Scheye, last year's chairman, said she was asked by CC President Steve Piltch to stay on. The consequences of the decision will depend on the new chairmen, said Scheye, for it they "come in cold," it will take longer to get the committee back in motion.

House votes exemption

The Massachusetts House of Representatives passed a bill Monday exempting private colleges and universities from the state's 8 per cent meal tax. The resolution must be passed by the Senate and signed by Governor Michael Dukakis before becoming law.

College business manager Shane Riorden, who stated last week that his hopes for the bill's approval "are not very great," commented, "Quite a few people must have done their homework and got to their representatives."

The House approved the exemption by a voice vote. "When something goes through that way there isn't much opposition." Riorden said that lobbyists for the Association of Independent Colleges and Universities in Massachusetts (AICUM) were greatly encouraged by the vote.

"Until it is signed, sealed and delivered," the business manager cautioned, "we're still worried about it."

The 25-year old tax, first levied against colleges and universities in 1975, costs each Williams student on board $99 annually.

Viewpoint

Should freshmen react to apathy?

Apathy. Political Apathy. How is the freshman supposed to react to it when arriving at Williams? Thrust from a world where Walter Cronkite spoon feeds the news at dinner to a world of "is it worth it to go get a paper?", the freshman is often adrift without anchor in his battle to keep up with the news. And adrift at a time when a new voice has been added to the repertoire, a vote and a chance to get INVOLVED.

Involved in what? Relevant issues on campus are often few and far between. The purple valley just doesn't contain a passage for the busy political stream of events in the outside world. The on-campus political groups want commitment. But how to get committed to an issue of which one is not a part? We freshmen are sitting at the crossroads of our years of citizenship. What today is commitment tomorrow is realized as mere curiosity.

Where at Williams can we turn? We seek involvement, but occasional involvement; issues, but issues in which we have a stake; and most of all, we seek information. For we come to this campus to learn.

Apathy can be dealt with. People can be made to realize that each role that they play, no matter how small, is an important contribution. That political reaction is just as healthy as political action. And that relevancy is just as important in an issue as constant involvement. Political groups on this campus need to act to stay active, but do the students? Perhaps with awareness as a base, we can learn to react when needed. We can vote. We can protest.

What we need is a new type of group on campus. A group which does not need a constant stream of activity to be a group. A group that can approach the minds of students when there is something to be said, rather than looking around for something to say. When relevant issues and events surface, the independent or mildly involved student would have a voice for his interest.

Such a voice could be found if we were Williams independents.

NEWS BRIEFS

Keller unperturbed by meal lines

According to Ross Keller, Director of Food Services, "It's still too early in the year for great concern about food lines. People are still getting their schedules and daily routines worked out."

The Baxter meal lines, while thinning out markedly at breakfast and dinner, remain long and slow throughout most of the lunch hour. Nevertheless, Keller said that rumors about impending restriction of upperclassmen from the freshman-oriented Baxter Hall are unfounded. "There is no evidence from the count that many upperclassmen are eating at Baxter," he explained. "If there are lines, it's simply because people are all arriving at the same time."

Except for a few minor "adjustments in food distribution in the early days," Keller said that the Baxter kitchen is working smoothly and efficiently.

Reaction to the new food service has thus far been favorable. Upperclassmen who have eaten at Baxter this fall are impressed by, as one of them put it, "the quantum leap in quality" of the meals. Robert Rickert, Baxter's Unit Manager, said he thought that "students like what the kitchens are doing and appreciate the new services", such as "any style eggs" at breakfast, three different desserts and ice cream at lunch and dinner and fresh fruit.

Reserve carrels still available

Carrels are still available for reservation according to Ray Lee who is in charge of carrel assignments in Sawyer Library. "I have yet to turn anyone down," Lee said, adding that he had assigned only 150 of the 240 carrels at the beginning of the week.

Students may reserve carrels for only one semester at a time with the exception of seniors writing theses who may make year-long reservations.

"Seniors and juniors in Tyler House or living off-campus are given high priority," Lee explained. In general, students are considered by class and according to their need for storing research materials. A number of sophomores have been assigned carrels, however, and at least ten freshmen applied, Lee said.

CUL publishes interim report

The Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) will circulate copies of its interim report on College housing and social problems next week, chairman Earl L. McFarland Jr., announced recently. The issues covered in the report include integration of women and Blacks into the social life, house transfers, fraternities, alcohol, alternatives to the current housing system and food services.

McFarland said he expects subcommittees of the CUL to prepare sections of the final draft by the end of October. He predicted the final report would be released in mid-November.

"We want to circulate copies of the in-term report among house officers and organizations and in the library," McFarland commented.

The CUL will meet with house officers to discuss the first draft. "A lot of problems we came across can only be handled by students," he said.

Fellowships provide travel opportunities

Williams College will nominate four candidates for the Watson Travelling Fellowship and three for the Luce Foundation Fellowship. Nominations for these fellowships will be made by faculty selection committees.

Williams seniors are eligible to apply for the Watson which provides a year of travel and independent study abroad, "an opportunity for a focused and disciplined Wanderjahr of their own devising—a break in which they might explore with thoroughness a particular interest, test their aspirations and abilities, view their lives and American society in greater perspective and, concomitantly, develop a more informed sense of international concern." The Williams deadline is October 1.

The Luce candidates, on the other hand, may include Williams seniors, graduate students, recent graduates or junior faculty. The Fellowship is intended to provide internships and job placements in East and Southeast Asia (excluding India) for candidates with defined career interests other than Asian studies and international relations. Candidates must exhibit motivation and potential for the particular career, and high academic achievement and leadership potential. The Williams deadline will be October 15.

Students interested in applying for the Watson or the Luce should see Dean McIntire.

Letters: explanation, condemnation

Athletic committee

To the editor:

As chairman of the Faculty Committee on Athletics, I appreciate the opportunity Mr. O'Shea's recent column (9-17-76) grants me to clarify its nature and role. Composed of four students as well as five faculty plus the Director of Athletics ex-officio, it serves—within guidelines established by the Faculty and personnel and budgetary decisions made by the Administrative Officers of the College—as a formal and informal channel between those three parties on, as Mr. O'Shea noted, "matters of general policy concerning intercollegiate athletics." Faculty membership for the present year includes Professors Jeansonne, Klos, and Koepnick and Dean McIntire as well as myself. Student members (appointed by the College Council) are Dawn Bedrosian ('79), Timothy Dunn ('77), John Jones ('77), and Ronald Long ('77).

I will direct my comments to each of the questions Mr. O'Shea raised in turn with the exception of one minor query whose answer he is in a better position to know than I.

Williams College, together with a number of other institutions of a similar nature, sponsored legislation which exempted them from the squad size limitations established over the past year or so by the NCAA. This was done with the full knowledge of the Department's personnel and the College Administrative Officers and was supported informally by the Athletic Committee.

The Athletic Committee's guidelines make no provision for involvement in the Department's hiring procedures.

"Club sports" is a perennial subject before the Committee—with policies regarding crew but at the head of a long list.

The physical education requirement is a matter of educational policy and thus falls within the competence of the elected Faculty Committee charged with that duty. The membership of the Athletic Committee is not elected nor granted such responsibility.

Policy regarding post-season competition was established by the Faculty a number of years ago. It has been discussed by the Committee a number of times since, but that Committee has seen no reason to recommend a change by the Faculty.

Coach's viewpoints have been routinely solicited by the Committee when it faced issues for which their substantive knowledge was deemed necessary.

Admissions policy is the province of a separate Faculty Standing Committee.

The Faculty also has a separate Committee dealing with measures for faculty evaluation. If the Athletic Committee feels that it is in a privileged position to make recommendations to that Committee, it will do so.

Robert W. Friedrichs, Chair
Athletic Committee (9-21-76)

Water-fights

To the editor:

A growing problem has thrust itself upon the Williams community. The issue which we must come to grips with is, of course, the water-fight. We, the students of Lehman, must bear the load of other people's misguided animosity, as these students see fit to relieve themselves of their animal aggressions by wantonly attacking us in the late night hours.

I think we would all agree this is a college disgrace. That the actions of a few, so-called "short" individuals who get their kicks through senseless, mindless destruction, can hold us all in a state of gibbering terror is mute testimony to their guerilla tactics. We at Lehman East are quiet by nature, and do not know any of these two-bit hoodlums personally, but we do know that there is work to be done every night, including Fridays and Saturdays, and that these acts of undiluted immaturity prevent us from serious study.

We at Lehman call for school unity: let brotherhood and sisterhood reign among you and your fellow 'burgers, and once again harmony will rule over the Purple Valley.

Angevine Report: frats role too large

by Andy O'Donnell and Vernon Kirk '75

The Angevine Report was published during the summer of 1962 and produced an immediate uproar. The committee, comprised of three trustees (including Angevine), two students, and seven other alumni representing all decades from 1911-1962, had unanimously decided that fraternities had come to exercise a disproportionate role in the undergraduate life of the College and instructed the College to assume full responsibility for the housing, eating, and social accommodations of its students. President Sawyer's next step was to establish the Standing Committee under the leadership of Talcott Banks '28. "The task of my committee," Banks said, "is to effect the transition with the least possible dislocation and to provide for Williams the most effective social organization possible."

From 1963-1968 fraternities coexisted with the burgeoning residential house system at Williams. By 1968 all but 6 of the 15 fraternities had technically ceased to house and feed their members and had made arrangements to turn their houses over to the College. In the fall of 1968 the college trustees instructed the 6 remaining fraternities to "take the necessary steps to wind up fraternal activity here as soon as possible" by discontinuing all rushing, pledging, and initiating activities. The trustees again expressed their desire for a campus "open to all members of the college community" and emphasized their intention to end once and for all the continuing friction between the college and the remaining fraternities which they said stemmed from the fraternities' "unwillingness or inability to live within the stated College policies governing their operation".

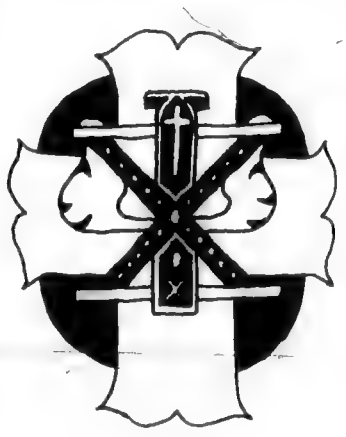
Part 2 of the RECORD series exploring fraternities at Williams focuses on the Angevine Committee, its report, and the dual existence of fraternities and the residential house system on campus from 1963-1968. This last item is particularly intriguing in light of the present fraternity situation at Williams and its possible ramifications. Excerpts presented are taken from interviews conducted by Andy O'Donnell and Vernon Kirk '75 for a 1974 Winter Study project entitled "An Oral and Archival History of Williams College."

Those appearing in Part 2 include Bruce Grinnell '62, former president of Alpha Delta Phi and quarterback of the football team who lent his name to the Grinnell petition; Hodge Markgraf '52, non-voting secretary of the Angevine Committee and currently professor of chemistry; Benjamin Labaree, Dean of the College from 1963-1967, member of the Standing Committee, and presently professor of History at Williams; and Charles Karelis '67, an undergraduate during the transition period and assistant professor of Philosophy

BRUCE GRINNELL: In July of 1961 I met in Williamstown with President Sawyer. It was obvious that he and the Administration had done a good deal of thinking about the problem. He indicated to me at that time even though it hadn't been announced that he had appointed the Angevine Committee. There were only 2 undergraduates on it, myself and a fellow named Rob Durham ('61). We were both a little skeptical. It seemed to us that the committee was loaded with pre-second world war alumni. Even after our second or third meeting we had our reservations because they were very much committed to the social system, but as it turned out they were also very open minded. The more meetings we had the more impressed I became of how open minded they were, irregardless of what era they came from . . .

Angevine was an excellent chairman. He had a great ability for condensing a great deal of material and preparing a most comprehensive report based on lots of hours put in, and lots of interviewing . . .

If I had to characterize the group that was appointed, I'd say they were very strong fraternity men, but they were stronger Williams men.



HODGE MARKGRAF: As a result of a meeting with John Hyde, Fred Rudolph, and myself in the summer of 1961 President Chandler asked me to be non-voting secretary to the Angevine Committee. Technically there was only one faculty member on the committee, Mr. Gates. I think that was by design and that it was a very deliberate and very intelligent design on President Sawyer's part.

The faculty input into the thing was very minimal. We had so low a profile that we practically didn't show. Again, I think that was purposeful and strategic. The faculty's opinion in the matter was fairly well known from previous votes of sentiment and things in the late '50's. I think that had faculty input been any higher it would have raised the anxiety coefficient on the part of the alumni. . . . At no point was Mr. Gates ever asked to give a progress report to the faculty, for example. The faculty never voted as to whether or not they approved of the Angevine Report. It really was viewed I think on Mr. Sawyer's part as an administrative decision between himself and the trustees.

I felt we had real autonomy, and that this in turn was a measure of the leadership ability of our chairman. Mr. Sawyer's input came from his selection of the members of the committee, and having once selected it and convened it he really didn't have to keep a hand in or steer it . . .

There was real genuine movement of ideas within the committee as well as people undergoing changes of perspectives. One of the most impressive things was the growth which people, some of whom came to that committee with fairly definite ideas showed on their own capacity to decide what was important and what should be maintained . . .

I think there was clearly a body of evidence that just became overwhelmingly persuasive, that there were better ways to organize a social system here that avoided the nasty distinctions of who was the sheep and who were the goats. People were making these distinctions on each other at a time in life when they were very ill equipped or ill prepared to do so—that is, after one year at Williams you were voting thumbs up or thumbs down. I don't think anyone objected to the idea of a group of people 40-50—in number living together and having joint intramural and social gatherings. It was that invidious distinction, the fact that you were making rather superficial but terribly permanent judgments on your peers, in terms of social acceptance, as well as the underlying problem with the nationals which involved aspects of race and religion.

I think eventual acceptance of the report was due to leadership and the capacity of Williams alumni to—I'd like to say to be reasonable—to be loyal. Part of it was the leadership of Jack Sawyer. The summer the report came out he immediately appointed the Standing Committee. They immediately moved to implement the Angevine Report so there quickly was forward movement—there wasn't stasis where we all sat around and debated it. The older alumni and the more influential alumni saw the kind of people involved in the committee and their qualifications and there was just little argument you could give people of the quality of Geniesse, Debeviosse, Nathan, and Osborne and others. If these kind of guys were unanimous in favor of the report, which they were, it's very hard to say that they're all a bunch of nuts. That's where Sawyer's careful selection at the beginning proved so important. So I think the reason it was accepted was first, there was willingness on the part of the alumni to say that these men were reasonable men to begin with, that if they felt that deeply then even though it may appear to be an upsetting decision it couldn't be that wrong. The second thing was the moving forward, the immediate appoint of the standing committee to implement the decision, again staffed with men of distinction and fairness. A third reason it was accepted was that an awful lot of alumni would not turn their back on their college.

BENJAMIN LABAREE: My primary task after my appointment in the summer of 1963 as dean was to work out a new residential house system. Virtually all of the members of the student body when I came were members of fraternities, though I suspect that until the Angevine Report they were lukewarm members of fraternities, but under psychological circumstances which I'm sure we would experience if we were under the same circumstances they became very enthusiastic fraternity members as the system was running out of time. It became the thing to do during the mid 1960's to join a fraternity and thus thumb your nose at the establishment which was trying to keep them down. Many of the natural leaders of the college community, however, had either gotten out of their fraternities and seen the strengths or perhaps just the inevitability of the future . . .

My most pressing problem in the short run centered around 4 or 5 fraternities which went all out to defy the college, aided and abetted by groups of alumni willing to bankroll any kind of opposition, even beyond reason. . . . Mr. Banks, as a good lawyer, had a standard agreement, and that was what we'd start out with each time, but by the time we added the therefore's and the but-never-the-lesses, and settled various battles over certain exceptions, each fraternity agreement turned out somewhat different from the others. They did fall into somewhat basic patterns, however. There were the extreme groups, who absolutely refused to let the college have the house under any circumstances, then there were the people who held out for such a long time that the value of the house to us was marginal when we needed it most, and then in the other direction there were fraternities who turned their houses over for whatever would help the college . . .

There was still rushing in the fall of '66—that would be the class of 1969. I think in those last years—fall of '65 and '66—maybe 30 per cent of the sophomores joined fraternities. Of course, everyone was convinced that what we (the Standing Committee) was going to do was abolish fraternities and this became a sort of self-fulfilling prophecy. The more they believed it the more ornery they were and the more they refused to abide by the ground rules. Consequently, the more they did this the more it became too necessary to abolish them to solve the problem . . .

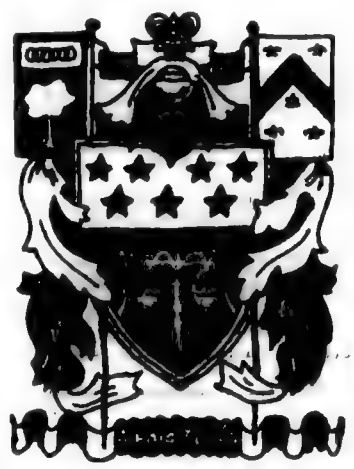
The houses for a time served as both residential houses and fraternities. There were two possiblities if you belonged to a fraternity: You could be a member of Prospect House and a Saint (now the Center for Developmental Economics) or you could be a member of Perry House and an AD (the same building). The frats made an effort to accomplish the latter and one year AD succeeded in getting a large number of AD's in Perry House so it continued to be in the eyes of most students an AD house. This hurt, and we hassled them, no doubt about it

I think the purpose of the residential house was to be a part of the whole rather than something separate that had ties with houses at other colleges and with the national. Fraternities were a centrifical force on campus and we were looking for a centripetal one where the faculty would also feel more comfortable . . .

I'd say the high point of the residential house in terms of its positive functions on campus would be '66, '67, '68, right around in there. They succeeded in bringing the campus together in ways that had not happened before . . .

I think the transition was handled as well as any matter could have been. Mr. Sawyer's patience far outreached mine. I think the entire squabble bothered this school only seriously for one year—1963 to 1964. By the fall of '64, or at least part way through it, the battle was essentially over and it was simply a matter of bringing around some recalcitrants or waiting for them to graduate. To me the end of fraternities was a critical decision because it made possible a number of other moves—parietal hours and coeducation for instance—and it definitely opened up relationships between faculty and students.

CHARLES KARELIS: I wasn't too conscious of what the fraternity situation was when I applied to Williams. People had said Williams had a reputation as a party school, and that sounded very jolly to me, so I was kind of pro fraternity. I remember a particular conversation with a kid I knew who was a sophomore and who had been rushed by AD Phi, which was at that time the most prestigious and zoo-like of all the fraternities. I said I was distressed to see that so many of the upperclassmen were so uniform with each other—everyone seemed so similar—and I said yea, people really seem to be quite typed. He looked at me with utter incomprehension and said yea, but what a great type. To me, when I think of the old Williams, the social Williams which was in the process of falling apart while I was going through here, I always think of that story ...



Rushing for my class didn't have the pressing, urgent quality it once had because it wasn't now essential for the allocation of housing people. The housing process was random—you could choose six of your friends and apply to the specific house where you wanted to be put, then according to what number you drew in a big lottery conducted in the student union, you got your first choice or second choice or whatever. There was still rushing of the old kind for actual membership in a fraternity but because this no longer could determine housing. The brothers who were resident in the houses still wanted to get as many of the people they wanted in their fraternity in the house as possible, though. They wanted to make it as much like the old system as possible. They wanted to defeat the randomizing process which the college had set up.

The way they did this was when the various groups went around to look at the houses, and the brothers saw a group they wanted in the house, they'd take you upstairs, introduce you to the football captain, and serve you the maximum of the allowed food and whatever the allowed beverage was. If they didn't want you there were various techniques known as negative rushing. In no uncertain terms they made it clear to you that you wouldn't like the house or be welcome there.

I remember the guys I went in with. One was a very smooth character, a nice, nice guy and just the type they wanted at AD Phi. The other guy eventually turned out to be the valedictorian of the class and not the type they wanted, especially since he spent most of his time in the library. Then there was me, and I was more like the second then the first except without the academic excellence. Anyhow, we got over to AD and the first guy, the one they wanted, was taken upstairs to meet the football captain, while we, other guy and I, were taken through the house. We were shown the basement, and there was a lot of emphasis on the wild and obscene things that went on down there, and then we were taken to the house library. In the library they had put various weights, indian clubs, and medicine balls and they told us that since you couldn't study for more than 40 minutes at a stretch anyway, they liked to work out during breaks . . .

In the dorms which did not have a historical association with a fraternity, such as Fitch and Prospect, there was some shadow fraternity activity, almost like an imitation of the fraternities. Within these non-affiliate houses it wasn't like there was a group of people who wanted to make it into a fraternity and another group who had some other social ideal, though. The first group was able to take over because the other people didn't see the house as a focus of their social life at all. They didn't think in terms of the house. They were more individualistic and spent most of their time roadtripping to Bennington . . .

People fought the end of fraternities. There was the famous Homecoming weekend in which bumperstickers were put on cars saying "Hit the road, Jack" after the Ray Charles hit of that year. I perceived the strongest opposition to Sawyer's move among the people with the least firm hold, the people who were not the most popular, the people for whom the fraternity system really was a source of identity and which provided an indispensable social life for them. The really popular guys on campus, the natural leaders, didn't oppose Sawyer as much because they probably figured they could be just as successful in a campus without fraternities . . .

Some people said that Prospect House itself was a PR campaign for the new system, that it was an expensive, modern thing that was supposed to sweeten the new system a bit. To some extent I think Greylock was meant to do that too. Most of the opposition to Greylock was not architectural but ideological, that it represented the new system . . .

Sawyer wanted to achieve his ends with the least possible hassle so he didn't make any of the fraternities swallow too much at once. He presented it as a step by step thing but there was no question where he was going and there was some bitterness because people wanted to read his moderate steps as being a real compromise between fraternities and the other system he had in mind. Ultimately I don't think he ever thought of compromising. He just wanted a smooth transition, but people thought that they would really be able to work out some arrangement whereby fraternities would continue and Sawyer would be satisfied too . . .

I felt that this conflict between fraternities and whatever you want to call what we have now dramatized something that was happening in the country and made it very vivid—the dawning of a new consciousness that I would characterize as individualistic, alienated, a little more hip, into drugs—all things which were happening nationally. The Vietnam war was getting people excited about politics. SDS was on campus. Everybody went to SDS meetings. Few joined but everybody went. So here in this clash between two institutions on campus was a microcosm, or an analogue of a national change.

Pipe Band to present 'ceilidh'

by Gail Hupper

The traditions of the Scottish highlands come to life this weekend as the Williams College Pipe Band begins its second year of performances in the Williamstown area. Tomorrow at 8:00 p.m. the band will present a ceilidh in the Weston Language Center. Admission is free.

A ceilidh (pronounced say-lee), "the Gaelic word for 'a visit'", has come to mean an informal gathering at which traditional Scottish music, dances, and poetry are performed." Pipers Jim Nail, Doug Goralski, Ed Need, Alison Morgan, and Williamstown resident Bruce Peters, join drummers John Gilbert, Andy Masetti, and Bron Fargo in group and solo pieces which include marches, airs, dances, and ballads. Piping instructor Donald F. Lindsay of the Invermark College of Piping in Petersburg, N.Y., and drumming instructor Norman McLeod of Pittsfield will also appear with the band.

Most of the members of the band underwent the fairly complicated process of learning to play the pipes last fall and during last year's Winter Study project. The pipes themselves are composed of an air bag, three drone pipes, a pipe through which air is blown into the air bag, and a chanter through which air emerges from the bag. In the fall, students learn fingering and several tunes on a "practice chanter", an instrument resembling the recorder but with the finger holes of the actual chanter. Students graduate to the pipes during Winter Study.

This graduation process involves two steps. First the piper must learn to coordinate his breathing and squeezing the air bag with his arm in order to insure a constant air flow through the pipes; then he learns to coordinate the breathing-squeezing process with the fingerings on the chanter. At the end of last year's Winter Study, new pipers joined drummers and the few pipers that had played before to form the present band.

In keeping with Scottish tradition, there is a hierarchy of authority within the band. Pipe Major Nail is musical leader and coordinator of the band, while Pipe Sergeant Goralski handles as second-in-command the groups administrative affairs. Drum Sergeant and senior drummer Gilbert leads the drum corps. Fargo as Bass Drummer wears a traditional leopard skin over his white shirt, in addition to the knee socks and kilt which the rest of the band also wears. Each piper owns his own pipes; the kilts, which cost about $80, must be borrowed.

The band's plans for this year are ambitious. In addition to the ceilidh the group also expects to play for a class agents dinner at Mount Hope Farm tomorrow. Other performances include an October 3rd march in the North Adams fall foliage parade and in several area churches and schools. Some six or eight new students have begun to learn on the practice chanter this fall. Nail says that he hopes to offer another bagpipe Winter Study this year but describes the present status of such a program as "only tentative". The band is also looking to the College Council for funds to buy uniforms and drums.

Juilliard dazzles Chapin

by Stephen Bernheim

A professor of harmony at Williams who retired just last year, told his class one morning that he could not understand why people at concerts complained of being unable to see performers on stage. He announced that he went to listen to music, and not to watch a performance. The Monday night concert at Chapin Hall given by the Juilliard String Quartet may have changed, his mind. The group practically hopped, skipped and jumped their way through Bartok and Beethoven, making for a thoroughly enjoyable evening.

The concert opened with the Mozart D Minor Quartet, a later work which is considerably more somber than much of his customary light-hearted material. It was a solid performance of a solid piece of music, though the first violin got a little out of hand in the last movement, sliding around notes instead of hitting them accurately. The cello in the second movement was particularly outstanding. Had the concert ended here, however, the entire event would not have been terribly noteworthy.

But along came Bartok and something quite different was in the air. Only moments after the final chords of the classical Mozart, the bom-bom-bom-ba-da-dum of the Bartok 4th Quartet, with its screeching violins, scraping bows and plucked strings filled Chapin Hall. Here was a superb performance, especially the pizzicato 4th movement and the frantic finale. Again, for his performance in the 3rd movement, the cellist deserves special praise.

The Beethoven opus 130 Quartet closed the program, and again the contrast in performance was achieved. Where Bartok had been played with fervor and strain, Beethoven was approached with love and tenderness. The all too brief second movement sparkled like a gemstone, and Robert Mann, the first violinist seemed to make his instrument whimper in the cavatina. The allegro finale had all the performers stomping their feet and bouncing up and down, not unlike a country hoe-down: a spirited conclusion to a wonderful performance.

Improvisationalist Clarke to give organ recital

A unique and intriguing recital of organ music will be given by Andrew Clarke, in Thompson Memorial Chapel on Tuesday, September 28th, at 8:30 P.M. Besides being a celebrated performer of great organ works, Clarke is a dextrous and exciting in-concert improvisationalist. He promises this particular recital will be no exception as it will conclude with an improvisation on a submitted theme.

Clarke's program will include works by J. S. Bach, Buxtehude, Franck, Mendelssohn, and his own composition "Partita on 'Ein feste Burg' ", a series of eight variations on the popular hymn tune "A Mighty Fortress is Our God" by Martin Luther. He composed the piece last spring when a Williams voice teacher, Deborah Beardsley, commissioned it in honor of her husband Peter's thirtieth birthday.

A graduate of Yale University and the New England Conservatory, Clarke is organist and choirmaster at South Congregational Church in Pittsfield.

10) All four of Williams' road opponents will hold their homecoming on the date of the Williams game.

11) Union will role into town in late October with a 1-4 record and lose 116-3, and Coach Tom Cahill will remark astutely, "It was never like this at the Point."

12) No matter how many people show up for the home Wesleyan game this year, the press will report "a capacity crowd of 9,000."

13) The Williams rambling, scrambling, ... etc., moo cow marching band will miss juggler Dick Rhodes more than expected and barely break even in winning halftime performances.

14) New York Yankees fans won't even know that Williams is fielding a football team this fall until the World Series (or maybe the A.L. playoffs) are over.

15) Dave Libardi will very seldom get beat deep, but will be arrested late in the season for headhunting and inciting to scalp.

16) On any Saturday where there's a little nip in the air, there will be a big nip in most pockets.

17) Williams will win its sixth straight Little Three crown, and may or may not match last year's 7-0-1 record. (The crystal ball's a little cloudy, check with me after Middlebury, or maybe Trinity.)

18) The Ephs will beat Hamilton Saturday, 29-12.

Well, now I know how the game is played, I guess it's just time to sit back and see if I'm ready to trade in my tea leaves and Tarot cards or go into business. See you Saturday.

classes to accessible rooms and "counting on help from others" for the handicapped student. Large numbers of handicapped students would be more difficult to accommodate, he said. There are presently no handicapped students at Williams who have been unable to manage their situations, said Riorden.

The Department of HEW defines a handicapped person as "any person who has a physical or mental impairment which substantially limits one or more major life activities" and defines a qualified handicapped person as one "who, meets the academic or technical standards requisite to admission or participation in the (federal aid) recipient's education program or activity."

Jim Spaulding and sophomore John Theil will handle the linebacking chores, while Dave Libardi and Todd Nelp are returning to safety positions. Junior Charlie Sanders and sophomore Mark Eckert are expected to start at cornerback, but Odell hopes to use soph Greg MacAleenan at one corner eventually.

Game time is 2:00 p.m. on Weston Field, with WCFM broadcasting the game.

Those who are ready and willing to bury the era of Odell, come down and catch the head-knocking, but hold the tar and feathers, tradition dies hard, especially with talent around.

Ephs anticipate victory

by Tim Layden

"We've been a little bit embarrassed up to this point and I think it's time for us to show something." Well, maybe not really embarrassed, but Coach Bob Odell's words illustrate just how successful a team has to be to keep the fans happy after losing only five times in the past five years.

Odell and his hungry varsity football team will get a chance to quell any thoughts which may be floating around campus with regard to a weaker team than usual taking the field. The Ephs host Hamilton on Weston Field in the 1976 season opener for both teams.

The meeting will be the first ever between the two teams, although Williams did meet the Continentals in a preseason scrimmage three years ago.

Hamilton is a school whose football program had hit rock bottom two years ago, having completed a second consecutive 0-8 season. The Continentals, however, rebounded strongly last year to post a 4-4 mark and climb back into the ranks of respectability.

Under Coach Don Jones, Hamilton lost its only preseason scrimmage, 22-20 to R.I.T., on three fourth-quarter touchdowns. Hamilton, however, is not a team to be overlooked. "They've got a lot of people returning," notes Odell, "and they're awfully excited about the possibility of beating Williams."

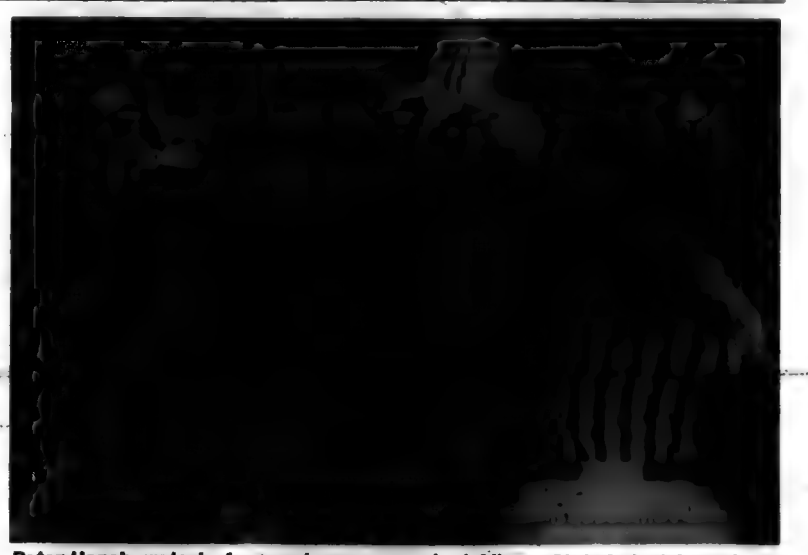
Hamilton is a wide-open football team, which likes to put points on the scoreboard and will take its chances about giving them up. "They play a gambling, attacking defense which might catch us once in awhile, but we hope to catch them off guard too," says Odell.

The visitors will line up in a 5-2-4, and has been known to blitz their linebackers on nearly every down, a potential problem for the partially green Williams offensive line.

Defensively, Hamilton will count on junior linebacker Sam Tarantino, middleguard Don Oyer, tackle Stancil Scott, and end John Cunningham to contain the Williams attack.

The Continentals treat the ball like a greased pig on offense and throw it around like a rugby team, fumbling 24 times in eight games a year ago, and throwing 13 interceptions. Yet, when things go right, Hamilton can put points on the board. Veteran quarterback Mark LaFountain looks for ends George Gramaglia and Dave Pisanelli, while Bill Romaine is the squad's leading ball carrier, rambling for nearly 700 yards as a freshman.

Williams, thus, finds itself heading into the regular season against the most unpredictable opponent it will face this year. Odell does not seem worried about his forces: "Most of the guys are starting to taste the first win of the year. Even I'm excited."



Williams will start basically the same team as took the field against Albany St. Friday. Offensively, Lew Kitchin, injured shoulder and all, will get the nod at center, flanked by junior Brian Fales and sophomore Bruce Wilson at the guards. Veteran Tim Dunn and soph Dave Maltzan will be the tackles.

Herb McCormick will make his regular season debut at the split end spot, a position manned capably for the last three years by McCormick's high school teammate, Dave Parker. Sophomore Kurt Anderson, despite a broken thumb, will start at tight end.

Don Wallace will make his inaugural opening-day start at quarterback, while veterans Charlie Carrier and co-captain Tom Redden will go behind him. Pete Hansbury, a gritty senior who missed the first week of practice, will start in place of the injured Scott Harrington at wingback. Mark Gerry should see some backfield action, as well.

Defensively, Odell is still left with one hole to fill. One of the defensive end slots will be held down by Mike Masi, but Bob Staiger and Steve Rogers are still battling for the other. Pete Tuttle, co-captain Emmett Creahan, and Mike Powers will open

Holyoke stickers outrun Ephwomen, secure 4-1 victory

The Williams' Field hockey team, opening regular season play earlier this week with a 4-0 victory against Trinity, were defeated yesterday 4-1 by a strong Mt. Holyoke team.

Following an easy win Tuesday over Trinity, the Ephwomen seemed unprepared to handle the quick stickwork and aggressive play of the Holyoke squad.

Taking control of the game early in the first half, Holyoke repeatedly challenged the Williams' defense, scoring three goals in the first quarter of play. Holyoke's use of long flicks and their intelligent play enabled them to dominate the half despite the efforts of Williams' goalie Mimmie DuMouchel.

Unable to generate any offense early in the game, Williams finally opened up and began to penetrate the Holyoke defense once they were over what coach Linda Wilkins termed the "initial shock" at the excellence of the visiting team.

Although the second half saw longer passes and a greater aggressiveness by the Williams' squad, the change in play did not result in goals. Taking twice as many shots on goal as Holyoke, Williams was constantly stopped because as Wilkins observed, "everytime we got by someone, someone else was there."

Explaining Williams' inability to score co-captain Amy Kindwall noted that as a result of the speed of the Holyoke squad "we didn't have as much time to get our shots off, so Holyoke would just take them away."

Stealing the ball from the Williams offense late in the second half Holyoke scored their fourth goal before Williams finally got on the scoreboard following a shot by wing Liza Olsen.

Earlier this week the Ephwomen exhibited some of the skills of the Holyoke squad as they shut-out Trinity, 4-0.

The speed and good stickwork of the Williams offense enabled them to secure an early lead when forward Sally Kraft took advantage of Trinity's sloppy stickwork to score two minutes into the game.

Williams continued to dominate the game as repeated Trinity fouls set up corners and scoring opportunities for the stickwomen. Getting the rebound on one corner, left halfback Lee Wilson tallied to put Williams ahead 2-0.

Posing little challenge to Eph's defense, Trinity's second half shots were easily cleared, allowing Williams to score twice, on goals by Kraft and Olsen.

The team, now 1-1, will meet Wesleyan at Middletown tomorrow following which the team will have a week's practice to prepare for a tough Yale match October 2.

British squad tops Purple kickers

"I couldn't be more pleased," said coach Jeff Vennell following the soccer team's encounter with a poised British amateur team last Wednesday. "It was a hard game, typically English, very hard tackling, but we adjusted to it well. "I'd say we played them at least even with our first group."

The English team, playing its eighth game in 10 days and showing little affects from the travelling and a long and boisterous Tuesday evening at the Log, came back from a 3-1 deficit to defeat the Ephs. It was the sixth victory for the British against two defeats, with one game remaining.

Vennell, still tuning his squad for next Wednesday's opener against Union, substituted freely in the final 20 minutes, when the British tied the score and went ahead.

The British tended to downplay the affects of their carousing. "We're trying to get a balance between playing and social activities," said one player. "After all, this is our vacation." Nevertheless, they were determined to play the game hard. Although they brought 24 players, they only dress 15 for each game, and try to play with 11 as they must in England.

The Ephs' aggressive, run-run style worked fairly well against the Britishers' conservative, defensive stance. Purple forwards broke free for several scoring chances, and finally capitalized when Jim Hield and Perry Nelson tallied within a three minute span midway through the first half.

The red-clad British got one back before the intermission, Ray Green sending a header past Williams goaltender Skip Grossman. It was the only goal Grossman allowed during his 50 minutes of action.

In the second half, Hank Osborne upped the Williams lead to 3-1 with a penalty kick before the more experienced visitors began to assert control.

Random notes: During pre-game introductions, the Williams starters presented their counterparts with Williams mugs wrapped in miniature Williams pennants.

Babson and UMass were the only two teams to defeat the British. Wesleyan and Amherst both lost by identical 4-2 scores.

The British team was not a collection of all-stars. "They are very ordinary players by our standards," said one team official. Although all the players are starters on their respective "elevens," they were chosen on the basis of availability.

Halfback Rick Zeller, held out of the starting lineup with an injured knee, played the final 22 minutes and felt no pain, according to Vennell. He should be ready for Union.

John Friborg fights a Dartmouth defender for the ball in last year's contest, while Bruce Camilleri prepares to assist. The Ephs dropped a 4-3 decision to the Southern Amateur Football League from Great Britain. (McClelland)

Racketwomen slip past Trinity, 5-4

Having survived a close call earlier in the week with a 5-4 victory over Trinity, the women's varsity tennis team roared back in a manner even Tony the Tiger would have been proud of with a convincing 8-1 thrashing of Mt. Holyoke yesterday. The two wins raise the women's mark to 3-0 and give them considerable momentum to carry into the middle of the season.

The Trinity players could not be blamed if they experienced a feeling of deja vu as Williams eked out a nail-biting triumph for the third year running. This year's victory was managed despite the Ephwomen's surprising loss of the first four singles matches.

Demonstrating what Coach Curt Tong termed "the best tennis they've played since they've been here," Amy Demorest and Barb Ernst both overwhelmed their foes. In what at times appeared to be a contest to see who would drop the fewest games, number five Demorest eased to a 6-0, 6-2 win while Ernst breezed 6-0, 6-3. The doubles teams routed their Trinity foes with equal mercilessness, Sally Kruse and Babe Kirk winning 6-1, 6-1, Amy Sterling and Holly Prentice and Sue Guttman and Sherry Willcox scoring identical 6-2, 6-1 triumphs.

Number one Jonnina Sadoff, in the midst of a two match slump, lost 6-4, 6-4. Laura Carson had a very off day in losing 6-0, 6-3, as did number three Rebecca Chase whose attempted comeback fell well short in a 6-2, 7-6 loss. In a match that would apparently make her wish that the tie-breaker had never come into existence, number four Trudy tenBroeke fell 7-6, 7-6.

Mt. Holyoke was hopelessly overmatched against the Ephwomen's considerable talent. Williams won all six singles matches.

Ending her slump in a convincing manner, Sadoff won 6-0, 6-4. Carson bounced back after the loss of the first set, 1-6, 6-4, 6-2, while Chase also got a good deal of playing time in winning 6-2, 4-6, 6-2. tenBroeke, Demorest and Ernst all hardly worked up a sweat in easy victories.

Layden on Sports

Predictions

by Tim Layden

The early days of the fall represent countless traditions, not the least prevalent of which is predicting football scores, standings, and other strange occurrences. Most of the campus, in fact, flocks to the TV room every Sunday to check out the pro scores in hopes of winning some points on their "cards."

But, for the most part, predicting is left to the soothsayers of the sports world. Street and Smith's football guide put their resident Carnac to work last summer and he discerned that Williams will finish third in the Little Three this year, mainly because of the loss of 46 lettermen or some such absurdity. We'll check with them in November.

Jeff Sagarin, gridiron sage of the Boston Globe, picks Williams to top Hamilton by a meager 26 points. Probably not realistic, but even if it is, how can any Williams fan make a bet on the game now? I mean, 26 points is a lot to shell out, even for Michigan over Ball St.

Anyway, if these "experts" can throw around predictions, why can't I, huh? At least, I live around here. So, having successfully escaped from my Mission Park closet with both ears tied behind my back, thus proving my supernatural powers, I'll start with a few obvious ones.

1) Williams' outstanding tight end Dave Mielcarz will get through his senior without an injury. (He's already out for the season).

2) It will snow at least once before the end of the football season, and at least one November game will be played in bright sunshine and 60-degree temperatures. (Yet most Williams faithful will show up in down vests.)

3) Bob Odell will guarantee each opponent is a tough one, and beat most by several touchdowns.

Hell, this is too easy, I guess I'll have to make it a little tougher for myself.

4) Amherst's boast of lopsided scrimmage wins (30-6 over Middlebury and 54-0 over Union) will far outclass their season record of around 4-4.

5) Yo-yo will run out on the field at least once during the season, prompting several Williams fans to marvel at the influx of Skidmore co-eds on the campus that weekend.

6) Don Wallace will consistently complete pinpoint passes in heavy traffic, giving Odell and Jeff Sagarin grey hairs.

7) At least one newspaper and radio station will call Todd Nelp "Scott Nelp," for obvious reasons.

8) Either Roy Heffernan (Middlebury), Jim Soule (Bowdoin), or Tim Whelan (Tufts) will make up for a sorry performance against Williams a year ago and run slightly wild. (Hopefully, it won't be Heffernan.)

9) Odell will become paranoid before facing Middlebury and contemplate using every imaginable offense from the single wing to the four-corner before finally resorting to the usual attack, putting on a good show for all fans.

The Water Polo Club opens its fall season and kicks off Hamilton football weekend as it hosts the Continentals tonight at 8:00 p.m. in the Muir Pool. The contest will be the Ephs' only formal tuneup for next weekend's home tournament and the opening of the New England League season.

The Williams Record

VOL. 90, NO. 7 WILLIAMS COLLEGE SEPTEMBER 28, 1976

Lighting conditions in several campus locations have prompted concern over the danger of assault.

Investigation shows rape panic on campus unjustified

Should Williams women worry about rape?

A two week investigation of rape at Williams found that panic is unjustified; however, the few ascertainable facts—shrouded by rumors, unconfirmable reports, and "off the record" and retracted statements—suggest that women should be aware of dangerous situations and courses of action in case of rape.

Asserting that two college students have been raped in the Williamstown-North Adams area this month, North Adams Women's Center Coordinator Beverly Russell emphasized, "I don't want to alarm people and put them in a panic. I just want women to know that rape occurs in the Berkshires and that they should conduct their lives with common sense and caution."

According to Dean Nancy McIntyre, "As far as the Administration knows, there has never been a rape on Williams College campus." Dean Peter Berek elaborated, "We would not in the remotest sense deny a rape occurred if it had." Both security and the infirmary added that no rapes have ever been brought to their attention. Security officer Bill Steuer said that a number of women reported they were molested.

No rapes have been reported to the Williamstown Police in the last seven years, according to Joseph Zoito, Jr., Chief of Police. "It is possible that rapes have occurred in the area," he conceded, "but unless we receive information that a rape has taken place there is nothing we can do."

One year and a half ago, the North Adams Women's Center established a Rape Crisis Center. The center, located at 31 Eagle Street, can be reached by calling the Women's Center (663-3931) during the day or Help Line (664-6391) during the evening.

Three Williams students, sophomores David Wood, Melinda Ballou, and Greg Campbell, currently work with Russell to provide medical, psychological, and legal counseling. Last year the Center handled between 13 and 16 rape cases from the North Adams, Williamstown, Pownal, and Bennington area. Russell said three of these were college students.

Russell later informed the RECORD that she wishes to "retract everything I said" in RECORD interviews. Asked if her statements were false, she replied, "I didn't say they were false; I said I wanted to retract them."

(Ballou and Wood refused to confirm or deny the figures cited by Russell.)

Notifying Police

The Center notifies the police only upon the victim's request. Berek reiterated, "It is very important that students understand that going to the infirmary or security does not imply legal action." This apparently contradicts the "Rape Protocol" statement issued by Dr. Robert A. Goddell, Director of Health. Item 2 of this statement reads: "Doctor should question patient and if, in his opinion, the allegation is reasonable, police should be notified." Russell said the one-page "Rape Protocol" statement

Other schools keep tighter security

by Kiki Spencer

While other colleges have more elaborate security procedures for preventing rape and assault than Williams, rapes do occur and recognition of the problem is not as widespread as it could be.

The University of Massachusetts, according to its statistics, has one rape a month, a fact which is not openly admitted. In order to deal with the problem, a cooperative group of 15 students and staff members have formed a Rape Task Force which has been in existence since October, 1974, and which relies solely on contributions.

The group, in coordination with the University infirmary, the campus police, and the Everywomen Center, distributes information to women on campus concerning self-defense and assertiveness in the event of rape. The group also trains dormitory resident assistants in counseling victims of assault and has provided better lighting on campus.

The difficulty in communication, according to Theresa Hanafin, a reporter for the UMass newspaper, is that the police never release any information about rapes on campus. Therefore, students are not completely aware of the danger, and more rapes could occur.

The security system, however, is relatively rigid. All students have two keys: a room key, and a dorm key. The dorms are locked at eight o'clock on weekdays, and at nine o'clock on weekends. In addition, police cars and security guards on foot are always on patrol.

In contrast to large universities are the smaller women's colleges which are more likely to "attract problems" according to Susan Suss, an exchange student from Wheaton College.

Of the various schools investigated, Wellesley College has the most open attitude toward rape. It also has very specific preventive measures that are outlined in a three page leaflet given to all students.

The leaflet describes four steps that should be taken if one is assaulted. These steps cover preventive techniques, police help, medical services through the college infirmary, and legal procedures.

Students are advised to walk in groups, stay in lighted areas, and report suspicious persons to the police, giving detailed descriptions if possible. At least five or six times a year, composite drawings of reported rapists or would-be attackers are circulated within all the dorms so students can be on their guard.

Security measures at Wellesley are thought to include "one of the most elaborate systems of any school" in regards to dorm control, according to a security officer at the college. A computerized card system automatically opens dormitory doors to residents of that dorm carrying a specific ID card. A buzzer goes off if the door is held open for a long time, and a Wellesley student must close the door again.

In comparison to the security systems at their other schools, exchange students to Williams have found the system here quite different. Elissa Mintz from Wellesley commented that there is a "big difference in security" and Suss stated that "the Trustees to review Hope plan

The College trustees will review a plan for disposing of Mt. Hope Farm properties when meetings convene Oct. 7-9. The proposal, submitted by a person College Treasurer Francis H. Dewey III referred to as "an anonymous friend," calls for the formation of a partnership of fifty individuals, each contributing $20,000 towards purchase of the 900-acre farm.

The plan is consistent with conservationist attitude of the Mt. Hope Study Committee of two years ago, which called for the disposal of the property by spring 1977. The title to 700 acres of the land would be turned over to one of several available land trusts designed to maintain and preserve the land against development and exploitation. The fifty partners who originally bought the land would each receive a four-acre lot which they would be free to develop on a limited basis. According to Dewey, the College hopes to retain a voice in all future development and uses of all plots.

Dewey said the partners would also further benefit in that contributions to the land trust would be tax deductible. In addition, the land trust, a non-profit organization, would be exempt from any real estate taxes on the property.

The disposal of Mt. Hope Farm in this manner, according to Dewey, would save the college at least $100,000 in maintenance costs, as well as preserve the open space and agricultural character of South Williamstown from large-scale development. Presently, local farms rent and work on sections of the land.

The farm, acquired by the College in 1963, is proving too costly a burden, Dewey said. While the study committee felt it would be desirable to utilize the recreational opportunities available at the farm, the additional costs made the idea unfeasible. Dewey expressed the hope that arrangements could be made to continue using the farm for the few annual functions currently inducted there.

The study committee, headed by Dewey and including students and faculty, saw it as "a responsibility of the College to try and protect the general character of the area."

The Committee on Undergraduate Life has concluded the atmosphere in many houses (and perhaps even balconies) puts undue pressure on students to drink.

Most houses spend $2000

Alcohol use excessive?

Alcoholism may be "a serious problem" on the Williams campus, according to a recently published report of the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL).

The findings of the interim report are based upon discussions with officers and members of all residential houses, as well as 450 responses to a lengthy questionnaire distributed last spring. The report also discussed the committee's findings concerning house transfers, violation of rights to privacy and quiet, and the integration of women into the social and cultural life on campus.

The report stated that "at best the atmosphere in many Houses is one that encourages and even pressures students to become social drinkers. At worst a small but growing number of students may have passed beyond the social drinking stage and be well on their way to becoming alcoholics."

Most houses spend $2,000 or more on alcohol, according to the report. It continued that 20 per cent of the respondents to the questionnaire strongly agreed that their house, "spends too much on alcoholic beverages", while 23 per cent strongly disagreed with the statement. Some houses have adopted a practice of charging lower social dues for their non-drinking members to help alleviate the feeling among non-drinkers that they are subsidizing other members of the house. The report continued, "so many of the housing problems are related, and

by Jim Cohen

College Security evacuated Mark Hopkins House at 11 p.m. last night, approximately ten minutes after receiving a bomb threat. Students re-entered the building at 12:30 a.m. following an unproductive search by two Security officers and two Williams policemen.

According to Assistant Director of Security Willard Busl, officer Bill Wilson received a telephone call at about 10:50 p.m. reporting that a bomb had been placed in Mark Hopkins. Wilson contacted Busl, who "went to evacuate immediately, room by room and floor by floor."

Busl estimated that all students were out of the building by "a few minutes after 11." The search took between 30 and 45 minutes.

"I'll say for sure that this hasn't happened in my 13 years here," the assistant director commented. He said Security's only lead was that the caller was a male.

A bomb scare was also reported yesterday morning at Hunter Outdoor Products in North Adams. A fire department source said that two calls were received, the first at 9:47 a.m. The building was evacuated and employees were given the rest of the day off.

About 72 students live in Hopkins.

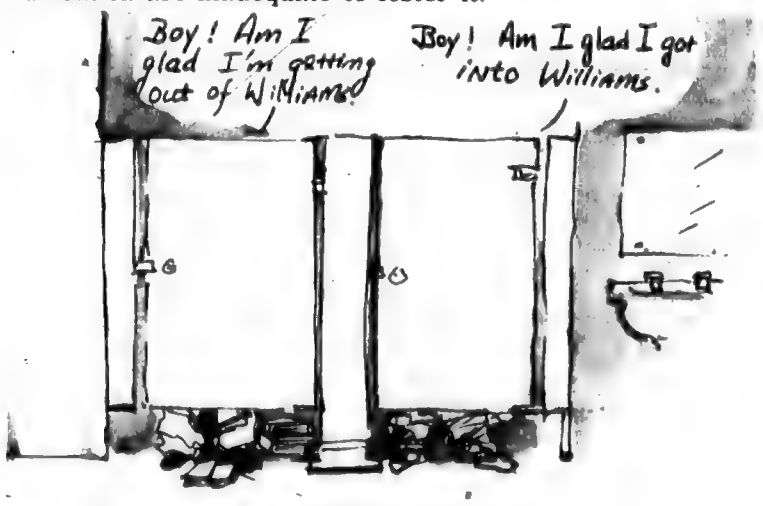
The Rape Rumor

Rarely in this small college environment do unsubstantiated rumors spread at the rate rumors on rape have spread in recent weeks. At the root of the problem is the fact that no one person knows for sure how many rapes of Williams students have occurred on or off campus in 1976. Figures ranging from zero to sixteen have traveled through the rumor mills, but none of these figures can be confirmed. Although College officials and Williamstown police claim no rapes have been reported to them, some students will tell questioners that they know someone who knows someone who talked to someone who said she was raped.

The ability of rape rumors to spread is a result of student awareness that no one knows for sure if any rapes have occurred on campus. It reflects a feeling among students that a student who is raped may not be willing to report the rape to the College or the police and it probably also reflects a feeling that the campus environment is conducive to rapes.



While the campus environment may not have signs welcoming rapes, there seems to be little question that some areas of the campus are inadequately lit. Stories of security officers taking long times to respond to complaints are too commonplace for a feeling of total security. Students know all too well that there is only one security car roaming campus at night. In fact, it is not improbable that students have encouraged the spread of these rumors in order to encourage college action in these areas.

Assertions by administrators that to the best of their knowledge no rapes have occurred are going to do little toward quelling rumors on rape. Time would be better spent addressing some of the problems which allow rumors to float.

Specifically, students' perceptions of security as inadequate encourage an atmosphere in which unsubstantiated rumors abound and substantially diminish security's effectiveness in dealing with campus crime. Although this may be largely a public relations problem, it will also require reforms in security's organizational and operational methods.

Both the procedure and student knowledge of the procedure for reporting rapes are inadequate. There are so many obstacles between the victim and confidential medical attention that contacting the infirmary becomes a trauma in itself. College officials may be underestimating the difficulties involved with students contacting them concerning sensitive issues.

In the final analysis, action by College officials will not end the possibility of rape at Williams. Increased lighting, more patrols, locked doors, house monitors and guard dogs may make people feel more secure, but it is a false security. Security comes from the realization of every member of the community that they are members of that community and that their concerns are the concerns of others. The spread of fuzzy, frightening rumors on campus indicates that this sense of community is unfulfilled and that existing lines of communication are inadequate to foster it.

Chinese fire drill

To the editor:

In your Sept. 21 article on the football team's victory over Albany State, reference is made to a "white-shirted chinese fire drill posing as a pass defense." This is an expression I have not previously encountered, but in the context of the article it seems to imply a state of great disorder. If that is indeed the implied meaning, then the author's remark represents a variety of stereotypical racism that should have no place in society in general, much less in a publication of an enlightened academic institution.

Textbook prices

To the editor:

I want to respond to Jeff Boscamp's letter on Book Prices.

When I say "we receive text books at a price 20 per cent below that at which we sell them" I mean the publisher gives us a discount of 20 per cent. I don't see how you can interpret that as a 25 per cent mark-up. For example: a $5.00 text book is billed to us at $4.00, a $10.00 at $8.00, a $15.00 at $12.00. That is what we call a 20 per cent discount, and that is what we get. Before we even sell the book we must pay the freight and handling out of that!

As for salaries, which are indeed part of the overhead cost, I'll be frank: the people here are working at the minimum wage level. As for myself, I have not been able to draw one for a long time.

Sincerely,
Joe Dewey '52

Closing Up Shop

Ken O'Neil leaned against the doorway of his market on a busy Friday afternoon, a meat-stained apron covering his familiar red jacket.

"It's been a good 31 years," he said in between glances to the meat counter. "The store's been awfully good to us. It's just that we've decided that it's time to call it quits and start to do some of the things we've been planning over the years."

His eyes darted once again to the counter that's been his private niche since he bought the store in 1946. "That counter's been his pride and joy," explained his wife Thelma. "There aren't too many stores left where the butcher will cut your meat to order. Ken's always prided himself on the fact that he still does it."

For over 30 years Ken's has been fighting and winning the battle against the mammoth food museums that have been sprouting up in neighboring North Adams, places with more aisles than a Gothic cathedral and enough cash registers to fill a Vegas casino. Stressing personalized service, offering a friendly atmosphere, and providing quality goods, he's been able to increase his business while other neighborhood grocery stores have found themselves forced out of existence.

"Business has been up every year since we've been here," explained Thelma, who handles the bookkeeping as well as the checkout counter chores." "And when we tell people this they say why retire now, or why not train someone to take over. But it wouldn't be Ken's Market without Ken here. When we used to take our vacation, for instance, Ken would always close up the market rather than let someone else run it and have to worry about poor service.

Ken purchased the market in February of 1946 from a Colonel H. H. Starbuck, who had owned the building containing the store. In October of that year Ken and Mary were married. "Ken had worked there since he was a teenager, when the store used to be called Christy's," explained Thelma. "While we were courting I kept urging him to buy the place when the opportunity came. Once he did, we made plans to marry. I told him that he could be the boss in the market but I would run the house. I tell people that's how we've gotten along so well all this time."

"It's been a demanding business, though," she continued. "Ken's in the store at 7:30 every day and doesn't get home till 6:30. For 26 years we'd only take a week's vacation during the summer.

She paused to point out some newspaper clippings of the market during the early '40's when it was still Christy's. "Ken didn't change it that much, just added some new refrigerators and changed the shelving arrangements. He's going to miss it though, no doubt about that. It's been his life since he was a teenager. But we've both decided that it's about time we start enjoying the things Williams College has to offer to the community. Ken loves football and basketball, for example, but he hasn't had a chance to attend any games because he's always had to work."

He'll soon have every opportunity. On October 4th Ken will cut his last side of beef, ring his last order through the register, and close up shop, another Spring Street landmark claimed by the passing years. Until then, however, he continues behind his counter, trading small talk with his customers and receiving best wishes for the future. As Stan Los, cook at Perry House for 23 years, said upon retiring last year: "I've no regrets. I started well and I finished well. That's all a man can ask for."

Finance Reform

by Larry Sanders

Over the past three years, the College Council has been charged with being arbitrary and inconsistent in its allocation of the Student Activities Tax. Last Tuesday evening, the Finance Committee asked the council to correct this chronic problem by establishing a firm set of guidelines that the Committee could follow in its budgetary review. The council voted to pass the buck and delegate this responsibility to the Finance Committee.

The council action was unfortunate but understandable. Tuesday's meeting was long and exhausting. The Finance Committee report was begun at 10:30, one and one-half hours into the meeting. Council members were obviously tired and restless and were in no mood to begin considering lengthy guidelines for a process that few were familiar with. The resolution that the Council eventually passed in effect said: "Yes we recognize the need for a new set of guidelines for the SAT, but let's have someone else set those guidelines."

Will this action make the funding procedure more consistent? Probably not. By reserving the right to reconsider any guideline that the Finance Committee establishes, the council has opened the door for exceptions and inconsistencies. Council President Steve Poltch conceded that "It is doubtful that the procedure will be much different this year than it has been in the past".

The Finance Committee's appeal, however, can yield constructive results. According to Treasurer Clarence Otis, "At least we now have the option of setting some sensible guidelines". The Committee's action demonstrates its earnest desire to bring a sense of order to this process.

Guidelines are certainly needed and the Finance Committee deserves praise for seeking their establishment. But the real responsibility for their codification and implementation rests with the council. Ironically, it is already too late in this school year for the council to act on this issue in time for the beginning of the SAT allocation. The time for action was last spring. This council can, however, still effect a meaningful change in the procedure.

Reform must begin after the allocation is completed. Council members will be then familiar with the budgetary process and will understand exactly what guidelines are needed. It is easy to become lackadaisical after the exhaustive funding procedure is concluded. This year's council members can not permit themselves this luxury.

Record staff relocates office

After a temporary layover in the old Outing Club reading room, the Record's staff will relocate in three locations in Baxter Hall. The business office will be located in the storeroom beneath the north stairwell and the remaining departments will move into the old student mailroom with storage facilities in the Mass. PIRG room.

The second relocation of the Record offices followed insistence by Outing Club members, that they return to their former location. George Schutzer, Editor-in-chief of the Record, said that he foresees no great problem with the new rooms, other than a space shortage. The Record telephone number will remain the same (2400) despite the move.

Rape discussion speaker replaced

Sophomores Melinda Ballou and David Wood will replace Beverly Russell as speaker at tonight's discussion on "Rape and Battered Women," according to Valerie Anderson '78, co-chairman of Williams Women.

Russell was engaged to lead the discussion as rape crisis counselor and coordinator of the North Adams Women's Center but is no longer associated with the organization.

Ballou and Wood, both members of the North Adams rape crisis center, will speak in the Makepeace Room in Greylock at 7 p.m.

Alumni plan fund drive

Representatives from about 45 of 60 Williams alumni classes met Saturday to officially commence the annual fund raising campaign at Mount Hope Farms. In what was essentially a social meeting, College President John W. Chandler and Andrew D. Heineman '50, Chairman of the Alumni Fund, made anticipatory speeches to thank the agents for their future labor.

James R. Briggs, Director of Annual Giving, met with the 13 new class agents, counciling the group on the strategy needed to collect funds which constitute ten per cent of the school budget.

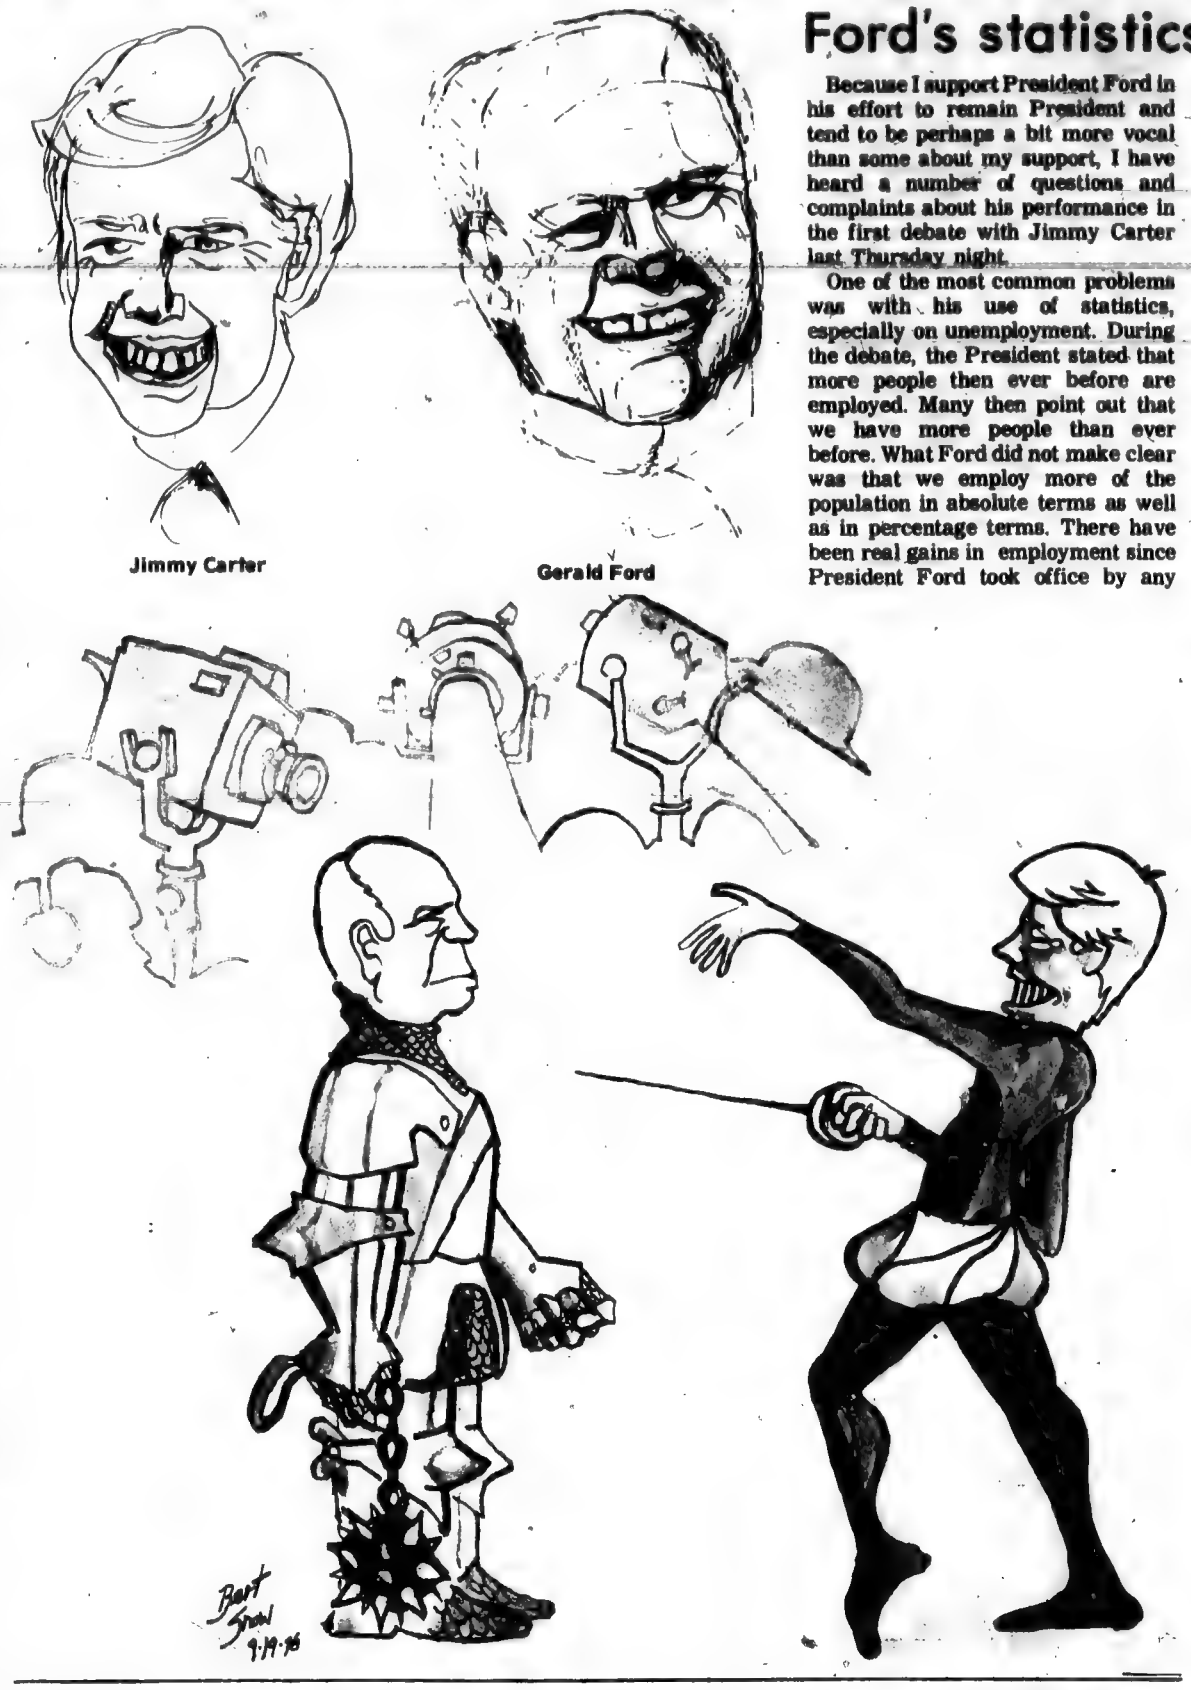
A total of some 160 class presidents, vice-presidents, agents and their spouses, attended the meeting.

First debate of '76 ends in split decision

Carter hailed as leader that nation needs

I now feel even stronger about the need to elect Governor Carter. I feel this way, not because of how Carter looked on the screen, but because of what he said. We need to find out who is the stronger of the two candidates. Their goals and programs must be compared.

In the debate, Jimmy Carter laid out specific goals that will get America back on its feet, whereas Gerald Ford gave us the same Republican philosophy that has caused us to drift for the last couple of years.



To deal with the highest unemployment rate since World War II, Carter proposed several specific programs. He said that aid should be given to the depressed housing industry, that a CCC type program be set up to deal with a 40 per cent unemployment rate among inner city blacks, and that the tax burden be shifted to those making above $50,000 a year. These measures would bring unemployment down to 4.5 per cent. President Ford's solution for the recession is to cut taxes and spending, a move that any economics student knows will further depress the economy.

In the area of energy, Carter again laid out precise goals while Mr. Ford gave a review of the failures of his energy "policy." Carter said that the United States should shift its emphasis to coal and solar energy while instituting mandatory conservation measures. He proposed strict safety standards for nuclear power plants. All President Ford could do was rehash his energy proposals that have let our dependence on foreign oil increase by 25 per cent.

One interesting contrast between the two candidates was that while Gerald Ford was neatly reciting the statistics that he had been memorizing for weeks, Carter reminded us that numbers like 7.9 per cent unemployment are not just figures but are people suffering. It was reassuring to see a compassionate vein in at least one of the candidates.

It is true that Jimmy Carter got off to a slow start in the debates but he quickly settled down and showed himself as the stronger candidate. On the whole, both men handled themselves well and showed the voters what the real choice is this fall. That being, are we going to drift for another four years under a Republican administration, or are we going to have leadership for a change?

Joel Smith is a member of the Williamstown Democratic Committee and an early supporter of Carter.

Ford's statistics defended

Because I support President Ford in his effort to remain President and tend to be perhaps a bit more vocal than some about my support, I have heard a number of questions and complaints about his performance in the first debate with Jimmy Carter last Thursday night.

One of the most common problems was with his use of statistics, especially on unemployment. During the debate, the President stated that more people then ever before are employed. Many then point out that we have more people than ever before. What Ford did not make clear was that we employ more of the population in absolute terms as well as in percentage terms. There have been real gains in employment since President Ford took office by any measure I know of.

Yet at the same time the unemployment rate has remained at high levels. One reason for this is the growth of the labor force has been quite rapid outstripping population growth. If the labor force had grown at the same rate as the population, employment today would be near 2.5 per cent—an extremely low figure. So the high unemployment rate is due at least in part to demographic shifts which cannot fairly be attributed to the President.

Unemployment is high in the cities and thus among blacks. The President proposed shifts in the tax laws making cities more advantageous places to employ people last January.

The construction industry is even worse off. Again, the President proposed aid months ago and at the same time, his policies of keeping inflation low have prompted business to increase capital expenditure plans 12 per cent this year, meaning construction jobs with industry are already being formed.

So we see real programs and plans to provide real jobs for those specific groups that are in trouble. The President was not playing fast and loose with the statistics but was pointing out some very important trends in our employment scene today for which he must get credit if he is to be blamed for the dark spots.

The President showed the same sort of attention to other problems, especially the problem of high taxation during the debate. His figures were hard figures, based on realistic expectations of the economy's growth rather than on the pie in the sky figures Governor Carter seemed to use. I refer here to a $60 billion bonus Carter thinks we can manufacture—maybe I'm too pessimistic but $60 billion is a lot of money.

Perhaps the debate accomplished little. It was quite dull. Both men looked like tight-assed WASP Sunday school teachers and were understandably very uncomfortable. The answers were programmed and the whole effect was theatrical. But I think the President put on a strong showing, pointing out the very real differences in the two men's philosophies of government. President Ford put his policies of less government, keeping dollars and responsibility firmly in the hands of the individual, in vivid contrast to Carter's Washington bonanza. I was and am prejudiced—in favor of individuals rather than income taxes. Many Americans are undecided in this race, but increasingly they are convinced as I am by President Ford.

CUL suggests alcoholism problem

alcohol is one common thread linking them."

"We suspect that excessive use of alcohol is responsible for many of the instances where students' rights to privacy and quiet are violated," stated the committee. Only 6 per cent of the respondents indicated that students in their house generally respect the rights of other house members.

The CUL's report also dealt with the integration of women in to the social and cultural life at Williams.

Only 1 per cent of the women respondents indicated that they felt that women are not becoming an integral part of the community. In addition, the results of the questionnaire showed that "there is no indication that women are any less satisfied (with the social life) than the men."

The survey showed little support among female respondents for an all-female house, and only 7 per cent of these would like to be affiliated with a house in which women were in a majority. Yet the committee concluded that "while a very small proportion of our students would prefer a single-sex social house, the number of such students is probably large enough that such units would be feasible. Whether we would want to honor such preferences is another issue, since doing so would create special interest housing that runs counter to the College's desire to promote diversity of interests within each House."

The diversity of interests within each house remains a concern of the CUL. In its report it added that "allowing as many transfers as were allowed (last) year, clearly threatens the diversity originally established by the random house draw". The committee agreed with the goal of diversity in each house, and felt that "it would be desirable to reduce the number of transfers granted each year."

Security tighter at other schools

security was tougher at Wheaton."

An exchange from Smith College, Virginia Miner, said she believes that since Northampton is comparatively larger than Williamstown, "the need for security is greater at Smith." She continued that she feels "less concerned here than at Smith; it doesn't bother me here."

Cathy Burke from Mount Holyoke listed a diffuse lighting system, more visible security personnel, and three emergency telephones placed in isolated spots on campus, as definite advantages in Holyoke security. In regards to rape, Burke said that the administration and infirmary maintain that no rapes have occurred on campus. She added, however, "It is common knowledge among the students that rapes have occasionally occurred" at Holyoke. This belief is substantiated by the fact that an anonymous victim came forward in the college newspaper last year "to warn others of the danger."

Seven couples hold College positions; nepotism denied

by Anne McCabe

Williams College currently employ seven married couples who hold various faculty, staff, and administrative positions, according to Neil Grabois, Dean of the Faculty.

Of the seven faculty couples, three have been married since their arrival and only one couple was hired simultaneously, Grabois added.

Grabois explained that the College maintains a policy of hiring on an individual basis. Business manager Shane Riorden explained that Williams would lose its federal aid if it were to violate the Civil Rights Act and Equal Opportunity Act by promoting nepotism in its hiring practices. Employees have always been "hired or dismissed on individual merit," said Riorden.

Husbands and wives are usually employed in different areas of the College, according to Riorden. He added that the College tries to discourage situations in which one spouse will be working over another in order to maintain "distance between employer and employee." The College also refuses to accept couples as teaching or research teams.

Riorden elaborated on college policy saying that due to the method of hiring, one spouse could conceivably receive tenure while the other did not.

For instance, children of full-time faculty enrolled in accredited four-year undergraduate programs are entitled to scholarships covering tuition up to one-half the prevailing Williams tuition for up to four years. The maximum number of eligible children for any faculty member or couple is four.

There are "slim pickings" for a spouse of either sex who comes to Williams to join the spouse already employed, said Riorden. "It is hard to get jobs of equal status—a problem the younger generation is struggling with now." He also said that Williamstown was once domestic to attract young, single professors, but this too has changed.

Ideas colloquia

A series of History of Ideas colloquia scheduled for the coming year will center on the theme, "The Idea of an Educated Person: the search for a Usable Ideal." The series will examine the topic from a historical perspective, tracing the development of man's concept of education.

Internationally renowned classicist William Arrowsmith of Boston University, spoke today on the "Greek Notion of Education", opening the four part series.

An as yet unnamed historian, will preside over the second discussion on Renaissance Humanism as it relates to the general theme of the series.

The third colloquium, planned for February, will deal with the enlightenment, with reference to the philosophy of Kant. Daniel O'Connor, chairman of the philosophy department will speak on the topic.

The final part of the series, featuring history professor Frederick Rudolf will be a survey of the development of American higher education.

Variety of mediums featured

Winslow Homer views USA

by Mimi David

What one associates with Winslow Homer is probably not what one will find in the special exhibition at the Clark Art Institute continuing through October. From violent oceans, drowning people and ominous skies, the scenes shift to young girls whispering together at the seashore, hunters in the forest, and civil war soldiers dancing with their sweethearts. The wide variety of mediums lends to the thematic confusion of the show. In fact, to best appreciate the exhibition, it should be seen as one artist's view of American life in the second half of the nineteenth century.

Homer's view of society is at times alarming, at times comforting, yet always quite insightful. His concern with social commentary is most clearly revealed in the lithograph entitled, "Thanksgiving Day, 1869: The Two Great Classes of Society." It depicts the different ways in which the poor and the rich celebrate this holiday. Many other works point to this class division. From "The Origin of Christmas" portraying the festivities on 5th Avenue and 59th Street and the scenes of skating at Central Park, the subject changes to the poor in "The Station-house Lodgers." Just as abrupt is the shift from Southern society in "The Cadet Hop at West Point," to "Husking Corn in New England."

From an aesthetic point of view, some of the most beautiful works in the collection are the watercolors. "Children on a Fence," "Shepherdess of Houghton Farm," and "Woman Peeling a Lemon" are all sweet, delicate works reassuring in their perception of man.

Certain of Homer's works are as terrifying as those watercolors are uplifting. "Undertow," a massive oil painting, depicts the frightening scene of two drowning people being rescued from a turbulent sea. "Undertow" is well presented in the exhibition because it is accompanied by two pencil sketches and two etchings done as studies in preparation for the painting. Such a worthwhile presentation is all too rare. The drawing for the famous "Snap-the-Whip" painting is displayed, but the painting, previously seen in the Clark, is conspicuously absent.

Though not a lesson in the art of Winslow Homer, the exhibition is an interesting collection of some of Homer's lesser known works and certainly worth a visit to the Clark.

Leverett Craftsmen present Northeast arts and crafts

Leverett Craftsmen and Artists, Inc. will hold its 11th Annual Fall Show from October 3rd through the 31st. This invitational show and sale will draw together the recent work of over 100 artists and craftspeople from the Northeast including sculptors, painters, weavers, metalworkers, silverworkers, blacksmiths, batikists, woodworkers, glass-blowers, photographers, and potters. Nancy Hazard, Fall Show chairperson, is "confident that this show will be excellent in the variety and quality of the handcrafted work."

The public is invited to the opening night festivities on Saturday, October 2 from 7-10 p.m. The opening will provide a special opportunity to view and purchase art works and also to enjoy a social gathering of artists and craftspeople.

Leverett Craftsmen and Artists is located off Route 63 just north of Amherst in Leverett Center, Mass. Exhibitions at LCA are made possible with support from the Mass. Council on the Arts and Humanities.

'Music' holds pops concert

by Valerie A. Sarantos

A first-ever concert of surprises and musical humor in addition to popular light classics, will be given by the Music in the Round chamber music ensemble this Friday at 8:30 in Thompson Memorial Chapel. Julius Hegyi, founder and director of the series, has chosen this twenty-fifth anniversary year to present a pops program including both serious and amusing works by P.D.Q. Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Strauss, Kern, Nero, and Hindemith.

"One never knows what's going to happen," said a grinning Douglas Moore, cellist for the ensemble. Other cohorts in performance and antics will include Julius Hegyi and Janet Rowe, violin; Susan St. Amour, viola; David Cobb, bass; Peter Knott, horn; Charlotte Hegyi and Stephen Dankner, piano; and Deborah Beardsley, soprano.

The program will open with four songs written by Jerome Kern; a Broadway tunesmith of the thirties and forties. Arranged in 1942 for a string quartet, these pieces include favorites such as "Once in a Blue Moon", "Smoke Gets in Your Eyes", "All the Things You Are", and "The Way You Look Tonight". Following this group will be the Hindemith "Froggy Variations". Written for cello and piano, the piece is comprised of variations on an old poem and tune called "A Frog, He Went A-Courtin". It has been described as a "mildly humorous" compositions.

Mozart's "A Musical Joke" is also known as "The Village Musicians". The piece was originally written for an evening of humor, as a parody of bumbling amateur musicians trying to play a serenade with great passion and virtuosity. Since Mozart was known for his sardonic humor, this work promises to surprise, entertain, and amuse.

Equally unusual and absurd is P.D.Q. Bach's (1807-1742?) "Sonata for Viola, 4 Hands". The performers guarantee an enlightening description of the composition and its controversial creator prior to its performance.

On a more serious note will be Beethoven's "Scotch and Irish Songs", sung by Deborah Beardsley, a voice instructor at Williams. An ensemble adaptation of Strauss' well-known "Beautiful Blue Danube" will be performed by string quartet, bass, and piano. Nero's "Pizzicats", an amusing, jazzy piece written entirely for string instruments playing pizzicato, will follow the waltz. Finally, the Hegyis will play "Variations on 'Let Simon's Beard Alone' ", based on an old English round and composed some twenty years ago by Hegyi for her husband.

CALENDAR

Professor Robert Solow, the main American economic theorist on long term growth, will address "The Future of the U.S. Economy: Have We Come to the Bottom of the Barrel?" Thursday, Sept. 20 in Jesup Hall Auditorium, 8 p.m. Solow is the author of many books and articles on the growth process and will talk about how a capitalist system reacts to exhaustion of natural resources. Two years ago when he spoke on a fall convocation panel, seniors remembered him as being one of the best speakers of the year and requested his return.

On Saturday, Issac Asimov, author of 164 books, will present his lecture "The Future of the Communal Idea." Asimov has long since branched out of his doctoral field of biochemistry. Probably best known for his textbooks, the prolific author feels the need to continuously research and teach others.

Tracy Schwartz and Burt Porter play old-time fiddle and banjo at the Chelsea House, Rt. 9 at Sunset Lake Road, West Brattleboro, Vt. Concerts are at 8 and 10 p.m., Friday and Saturday, $2.00.

Cap and Bells will hold auditions for Strindberg's The Father, directed by Peter Bergethon '77, tonight until 7:30 (beginning at 4:00) in the Makepeace Room of the Greylock dining hall. Students are heartily encouraged to try out as many parts are available; no experience is necessary.

Campus interviews say rape fears exaggerated

"is terrible; the burden of proof lies with the victim to convince both the nurse and doctor that she has been raped. And if she does so, the police are notified."

Zoito said he didn't understand why rape victims hesitate to come to the police. "We provide trained counselors and do the only thorough job of investigation and apprehension. State law also requires that all records be kept confidential, which they are," he said. He explained, "Once a description of the rapist goes out over our county radio network we immediately reduce the risk that he will try again."

"We like to put out a description of the rapist as soon as possible," said Zoito, "but our only immediate concern is the victim's condition." If medical attention is required the victim is sent to a local hospital, said Zoito. Regardless of her condition, though, a call is promptly placed to the state police asking for the services of a policewoman. Zoito said these matrons are specially trained in rape counseling and handle the questioning of the victim.

Attackers known

Statistics show that most rape victims know their attacker. Russell added that this makes women very vulnerable. "More women are raped in places they feel secure than in the streets. They are not aware, they are in a compromising situation."

One woman confronted with a potential rape situation in her room last year also noted a false sense of security many women have here.

Discussing attitudes at Williams, Wood commented, "Males at Williams are encouraged to be macho, to drink a lot, and to be destructive. Women here are encouraged to guard their sexuality as a prize to be won, and men are encouraged to win it." President John Chandler noted, "I would be surprised if some boozed-up men did not present social problems." Dean McIntyre also recognized that "interactions in and among students can lead to coercive situations".

Lighting Problem

Several women expressed concern about poor lighting on campus. Areas mentioned included behind Perry House on Stetson Court, between Mission Park and Sawyer Library, the path between Park Street and the Greylock parking lot, and between Hopkins Hall and the back of the Congregational Church. Both President Chandler and Security said they would welcome suggestions from students concerning lighting problems.

Jane Adams, Carl Bettinger, Brad Caine and Jim Cohen conducted the investigation and composed sections of the article.

Kolb sets course record as harriers top alums

by Frank Carr

Last Saturday's fourth annual "Aluminum Bowl" brought seventeen alumni runners back to the Purple Valley for a head to head battle with the current varsity squad. Junior Joe Kolb led the varsity to a convincing 17 to 44 victory over the veterans and the perfect weather produced a record field of 40 past and present Ephmen.

Kolb is the first undergraduate to win the event and he added a touch of class to his victory, shattering the course record by 18 seconds. The fleet-footed junior led a group of four runners on to the Taconic Golf Course and then pulled away from the pack to finish the 3.8 mile A loop in a record time of 18:52.

Varsity captain Ken Leinbach and junior Frank Carr followed Kolb for a 1-2-3 varsity sweep. Leinbach was also under the course record, finishing second in 19:00. Carr battled with Peter Farwell '73 in the last mile and sprinted across the line in third place at 19:10, tying the old record held by Jay Haug '73. Farwell was one second behind in fourth place.

Senior Gary James ran an excellent race and placed fifth followed by junior Dan Sullivan in sixth. Mark Sisson '75 broke out with the leaders in the early going, but a wipe out on the golf course forced him back into seventh place overall.

Steve Polasky and Tom Schreck rounded out the varsity scoring as they joined with last year's captain, Bob Gifford in a three-way tie for eighth. The freshmen were unable to field a full team, but Garrick Leonard gave a fine individual performance with a 15th place effort.

Tomorrow, Coach Tony Plansky's runners take on Middlebury at 4 p.m. in the Williams science quad. A year ago the Ephs shutout the Panthers and tomorrow's contest will likely be very similar.

Open season against Union

Booters outlast alumni, 5-2

by Mark Pogue

Passes to no one, players colliding, open shots missed—for a while it was a sight to make strong soccer coaches weep. For the opening two-thirds of its two-hour duel with the alumni Saturday, Williams' varsity soccer team looked disturbingly flat and lifeless. In fact, it was only in the final 45 minutes that the Purple found its groove, pressured the tiring alums, and poured through four goals to win the contest, 5-2.

"I was disappointed that they didn't play well at the beginning," admitted coach Jeffrey Vennell, "but then I never expect players to get superhigh for an alumni game." Vennell added that his team's performance—coming on the eve of tomorrow's regular season opener against Union—was definitely not cause for alarm. "They were easily the best alumni team we've ever played," he said.

Williams forward Henry Osborne eluded a fullback and banged the ball into the corner of the goal to give the youngsters an early 1-0 lead, but 15 minutes later the alums tied it when former All-New Englander Tom Geissler '73 lofted a free kick into the nets. The score remained deadlocked until late in the second 40-minute stanza, when Vennell's second and third teams gradually gained control and finally scored on Cam Ferrante's shot to the left corner. By the time the first team went back in the undergrads owned the game, and three more scores were notched on beautiful shots by John Friborg and Pete Barra (two).

The Dutchmen of Union College, led by Pittsfield's own George Garivalitis, invade Williamstown tomorrow to kick off the regular season for both squads. Few things please Union fans more than victories over Williams; the fact Union booters get so high for Williams games, Vennell concedes, is "what worries us more than anything else."

Kickoff is 4 o'clock on Cole Field.

Women runners top Wesleyan 22-33 in first dual meet

The Williams' women's cross-country team made a strong showing in their first dual meet, defeating Wesleyan 22-23, Saturday in Middletown. Despite the absence of two of William's best harriers who were resting up for the Fall Foliage race on Sunday, Williams' first five finishers grabbed 2, 3, 4, 6, and 7th places.

Debbie Gregg was the first Eph to complete the relatively flat but traffic-congested 3.2 mile course. Lisa Capaldini, Corrie Johnson, Toni Ceckler, Anne Eldridge, Linda D'Ablis, and Paula Wyatt rounded out the Williams scoring.

The team's first home meet promises to be an exciting one, as the Ephwomen challenge a perennially strong Middlebury squad this Wednesday. Starting time is in the Science Quad.

Ephs hold off Hamilton 14-6, defense grabs 6 interceptions

by Tim Layden

If Williams' 14-6 win over Hamilton on Weston Field Saturday can be considered a reliable indicator, the old adage about history repeating itself can be considered true.

For the second consecutive year, prognosticators from east and west forecast another good season for Williams and Coach Bob Odell, but only on the wings of a high-powered offense. The defense had simply lost too many starters.

Well, in 1975, the Williams defense literally carried the offense to an unbeaten season, silencing its critics and garnering bushels of post-season honors. Saturday's win must have found Williams fans pinching themselves to make sure they weren't dreaming their way through a rerun of last year.

Sophomore linebacker John Theil gave the Ephs their first break of the afternoon with six minutes remaining in the first quarter. The 6' 2", 190-pounder led a calvary charge through the Hamilton offensive line to block a Burt Fisher punt on the Continental 21. The ball bounced wildly down to the one yard line, where co-captain Emmett Creahan pounced on it, narrowly missing his second career touchdown.

Fellow co-captain Tom Redden got the first Williams touchdown of the year on the third play following the block, plunging over from the one. Kevin Cramer's conversion made it 7-0, Williams.

Theil's linebacking mate, senior Jim Spaulding was impressive throughout the afternoon, seeming to have a hand in every tackle the Purple defense made.

Hamilton quarterback Bill Glenn, who replaced starter Tom LaFountain in the second quarter, is likely to see Williams defensive backs in his nightmares for the rest of the fall, after seeing five of his underthrown aerials pilfered. LaFountain also tossed up an interception.

Sophomore cornerback Greg McAleenan, though, was the true defensive star of the afternoon, playing only about twenty-five minutes of the game, all in the second half, and picking off three passes. Each of the converted quarterback's thefts came while in man-to-man coverage on Hamilton co-captain Dave Pisanelli. Theil and Mark Eckert each picked off one pass, as did junior Charlie Sanders.

The Williams defensive performance is best summarized by a quick glance at the shell-shocked Hamilton passing statistics: 25 attempts, four completions, and six interceptions for only 35 yards.

"The defense did an excellent job; the secondary played especially well," remarked Coach Odell, "there was a lot of good hitting out there." The Continentals were held to only 142 yards total offense.

Hamilton maintained only one substantial drive in the game, marching 64 yards in 15 plays midway through the third quarter, before a Dan Waldron fumble ended the threat on the Williams 16. "We let up a little on the one drive," said Odell, "but got tough again later in the game." Hamilton, however, got the touchdown two plays later as fullback Mark Annunziata capitalized on Don Wallace's fumble with a one-yard plunge.

The Williams offense, despite all the pre-season expectations, was spotty throughout the game. Taking a 7-0 lead into the second quarter, Don Wallace took the Ephs on their only substantial drive of the game.

Wallace uncharacteristically kept the ball on the ground for eight straight plays, moving 54 yards to the Hamilton six. Here, the lanky senior hit sophomore halfback Mark Gerry with a touchdown pass in the front corner of the end zone.

The key to the Williams drive was the running of junior Scott Harrington, who carried four times for 38 yards. Harrington, still nursing a shoulder injury, was not expected to play unless needed, and according to Odell, "We needed him, and he did a heckuva job."

The second half of the opening game was enough to put Sominex out of business, with neither team moving the ball effectively, and only Hamilton's one drive providing any interest whatsoever. Glenn's lack of a strong throwing arm quelled any hopes of the Continentals scoring in the waning moments of the game, as Williams picked off four passes in the fourth quarter.

The crowd of 3,500 was rudely awakened in the closing seconds of the contest when Wallace, rather than keep the ball on the ground on a bootleg play, tossed a rare floater which was nearly intercepted. Odell is reportedly still recovering.

So, what was originally thought to be the first-ever clash between Hamilton and Williams, but was really the fourteenth after a 37-year hiatus is now a matter of record. It's time for Williams to look ahead to next week's foe always tough Middlebury on their home field for the second straight year.

"Any time you win, it's a good game," says Odell, "but I'm afraid our next two opponents are a little tougher than Hamilton." Probably true coach, Middlebury whipped Colby Saturday, 28-13, while Trinity crushed Bowdoin, 30-14.

TRIPLE DOTS—Charlie Carrier (43 yards on 14 tries) top rusher for Williams; split end Herb McCormick grabbed four aerials and was tops in that department . . . Hamilton coach Don Jones disappointed in the inability of qb's to hit open receivers . . . hardest hit of the afternoon came when Dave Libardi ran into teammate Bill Couch while returning punt . . . injuries suffered in game by Gerry, Eckert, and Mike Masi, none believed to be serious . . . highly-touted Wesleyan upset by Tufts in season opener, 13-12, while Amherst lost to Springfield . . . Face Yale on Saturday

by Nancy Rhein

In their strongest showing this season, the Williams field hockey team defeated Wesleyan Saturday, 8-0.

Dominating the entire game, the Williams's offense took advantage of their ability to rebound and score to shut-out the Wesleyan squad. The Ephwomen jumped out to an early lead on a goal by forward Sally Kraft and were unstoppable as their speed and good stickwork overwhelmed the Cardinals.

Wesleyan, playing their first game, did not have the speed to force a play by the Williams offense, allowing the team to take time to execute each play. This situation enabled the offense to add four more first half goals, two by Kraft and two by co-captain Shailah Stewart.

Commenting on the offensive play, Kraft noted, "We were able to look around and plan our plays–we had the time. We really used each other and played well together."

This team play was a result of what Kraft termed an "outstanding job" by the Williams's defense. Although the defense was not challenged (less than ten shots on goal) Kraft remarked that the "defense really sent up the ball" permitting the offense to continue the play and score. "The momentum of the game was forward-forward," said Kraft.

Continuing to test the Wesleyan goalie in the second half Kraft and Stewart added three goals to bring their game totals to five and three, respectively.

The Ephwomen next take the field Saturday afternoon, facing Yale in New Haven, Conn.

Polomen lose 12-11

by Ray Porfilio

Water Polo Club President Dennis O'Shea called it "definitely the best opening game we've played yet." Co-captain John Farmakis, eliminating the qualification, termed a 12-11 overtime loss to Hamilton Friday night the "best we've ever played."

Quality of play aside, it was without doubt one of the most exciting matches played by the young Williams club. A small crowd witnessed five lead changes. The third period, with a four goal Williams outbreak, ended in an 8-8 deadlock. A scoreless, tightly played fourth period ensued, setting the stage for a pair of two-minute overtimes.

In the first overtime, Williams burst to an 11-8 margin on quick goals by Farmakis, Dave Preiss and Mike Feltes. Williams dominated not only offensively but defensively, containing the Hamilton attack. With the start of the second overtime, though, the momentum had shifted. The Continentals started aggressively, obtaining two penalty shots, and rapidly cut the lead. The final goal came with but ten seconds remaining in overtime.

Inexperience hurt the Williams club, especially at the end of the second period and in the second overtime. The squad was unable to score and began pressing. The net result was ill-advised shots, poor defense and Hamilton domination. In the second overtime, the team was unable to protect a three goal lead.

Co-captain Guy Hoelzer was pleased with the overall performance. He discounted the mistakes, explaining that the team had had only three practices prior to Friday's contest. To gain more competitive experience, Williams will host a round robin tourney October 1-3. Amherst, Boston College, RPI, Wesleyan and UNH are the invitees to the tournament at Muir Pool.

Netwomen thrash Wesleyan

by Evan Bash

The Wesleyan women's tennis team still probably doesn't know what hit it. Williams' racketwomen, tuning up for an important encounter with Dartmouth today, brushed aside the Cardinals 9-0 on Saturday. The win improved the Ephwomen's season record to 4-0.

Showing as much mercy as the Indians did toward Custer, Coach Curt Tong's squad didn't drop a set, and didn't lose more than four games in any one match.

Jonnina Sadoff and Laura Carson easily disposed of two Cardinals, winning 6-2, 6-2 and 6-0, 6-3 respectively. Williams' frosh Rebecca Chase and Trudy tenBroeke, matched each other in giving up only two games with victories of 6-2, 6-0 and 6-1, 6-1. Amy Demorest left her opponent crying "uncle" with a 6-0, 6-0 victory, while Sue Guttman made her first attempt at singles this year a success with a 6-1, 6-1 win.

A strong point of the team this year is the doubles teams, who in four matches have suffered only one loss among them. Wesleyan quickly discovered this strength as Sally Kruse and Babe Kirk won 6-1, 6-3, while the new combinations of Holly Prentice and Barb Ernst and Sherry Wilcox and Marion Sherman breezed by identical 6-1, 6-0 scores.

If any team is going to stop Williams this season, Dartmouth might be it. The Big Green managed to win a scrimmage between the two squads last spring, and would like nothing more than to repeat that victory now that it really counts.

Freshman Rebecca Chase returns volley in Williams' win over Tufts last week. Ephs also beat Wesleyan 9-0 Saturday to run their season record to 4-0. (photo by Kong)

CEP vote bars Record

by Chip Buckner

Monday afternoon the Committee on Educational Policy voted, 9-2, to exclude the Record from its meetings. Six of the seven faculty members and three of the five student representatives voted not to allow coverage. Chairman George Goethals did not vote.

Larry Mitchell '78, College Council representative to the committee, explained that the members had developed a rapport facilitating an open exchange of ideas. There are certain instances, he said, "when a reporter might misunderstand what we mean." He said he is satisfied with the present reporting mechanisms, where the College Council representative tells the Council and the press what occurred. "Nothing of substance will be denied the Record," he concluded.

CEP chairman George Goethals

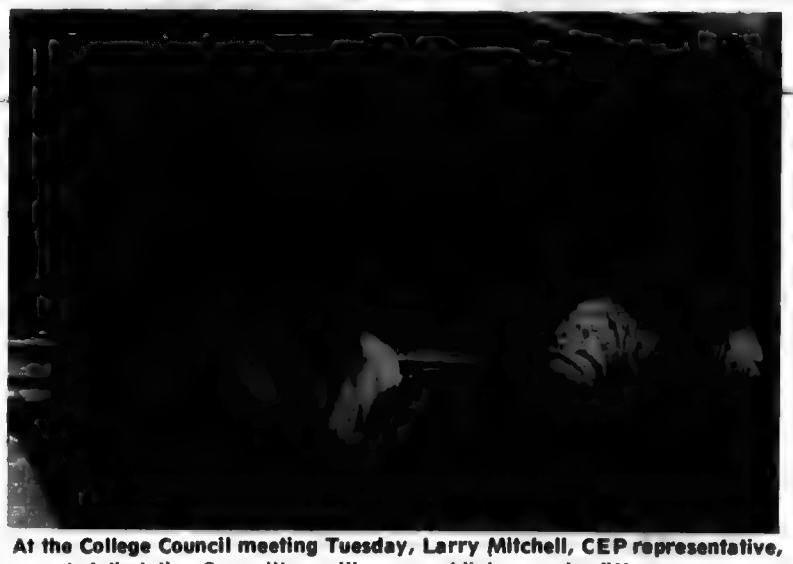
Division I representative, Jane Garvey, also voting to bar the newspaper, concurred with Mitchell's reasoning, adding that if anything inhibits the "free exchange of ideas" on a student-faculty committee "the students would lose."

Tom Ebling '77 (Div. III) admitted that the exclusion rationale "was justified, but not good enough." Ebling voted to allow press coverage "as a matter of principle." He saw "little chance" of reconsideration by the committee.

The other two student representatives, Clayton Spencer '77 (Div. II) and Shailah Stewart '77 (at-large), voting respectively "No" and "Yes" to Record inclusion, could not be reached for comment. All six faculty members voting, Edson Chick, John Crigler, John Lathrop, Mark Taylor, Gordon Winston and Reinhard Wobus, voted to exclude the Record.

Last year CEP chairman William Fox told news editor Jim Cohen that he could send a reporter to cover the meetings. When questioned Fox said he "couldn't imagine" what issues before the Committee would cause it to change its mind.

George Goethals, the present chairman, said he does not object to news coverage, but added that he remembers no such decision from the committee last year. Ex-Secretary Lee Drickamer did not remember a vote, either, and the minutes do not include any mention of a vote, although they do record that Cohen had attended a CEP meeting last spring.



The Record, Drickamer recalled, was to send a reporter to the meeting at which the committee discussed PE credit for the band and team managers.

Cohen said he is "very disappointed" with the decision and expressed concern that the CEP has forgotten past episodes, such as the recommendation to discontinue PE credit for the band and team managers. "Sending a reporter would prevent such bombshells," Cohen said. To the charge that communication exists, Cohen replied that a report to the College Council and a copy of the minutes are insufficient. They are not "objective, informative, or of journalistic caliber," he said.

Committee members seem most concerned about "irresponsible reporting." Cohen said he sees these fears as unfounded. He pointed to past CEP coverage as proof of his contention. "Any reporter with a minimum sense of judgment realizes that personal comments and light banter among CEP members is not his concern. He will not report it," he finished.

After Mitchell's report to the Council, President Steve Piltch stated that he believed "the decision on whether to open up a meeting to reporters is entirely up to the committee." He said he felt the present communication channels were adequate, but would reconsider the issue if problems developed, as they did last year.

Letter states reasons

ALS disbands

The Adelphic Literary Society has formally disbanded itself as a "secret society . . . on or off the Williams Campus," according to a letter received by the Record Wednesday (see page 2). Sources close to the organization confirmed the authenticity of the letter.

The letter states that the ALS "recognizes the College's position on fraternities and therefore has no interest in continuing its existence . . ."

Dean of the College Peter Berek said that he was pleased to hear of the decision of the students involved. He added, "I hope that the kind of personal relationships among these guys can continue—without the trappings of a fraternal organization."

Berek had noted the existence of the ALS at a faculty meeting on Sept. 15 as violating the College's prohibition against undergraduate participation in fraternities.

A major concern of College officials was the apparent ties of the ALS to the Alph Delta Phi International, and fraternity. In an article in the Sept. 17 Record, a College official indicated that some ADP alumni received a mailing requesting funds for the support of the society.

Robert S. Price, President of the Alph Delta Phi International, and Christopher H. Smith '60, chairmen of a group of alumni "organized to advise and consult with" the ALS, denied that any funds were raised from alumni for the support of the society. Sources close to the ALS noted that no funds had been made available to the undergraduate members.

President John W. Chandler cited a general fund raising letter for the Alpha Delta Phi International and a letter from an ALS member to some Williams alumni requesting advice and support. He noted that while there was no explicit request for funds, "I suppose one can read it in that light."

Housing Committee co-chairman picked but CC still slow

The College Council elected Jamie Barickman and Sally Coney co-chairmen of the Housing Committee Tuesday night after rejecting the Election Committee recommendation to accept Linda Smith along with Coney.

Dodd House President Dominic DiBicarro representing several house presidents appealed for a co-chairman with previous experience on the committee and recalled the controversial stand that Smith took against the Housing Committee last spring on the transfer issue.

During Monday night's Housing Committee meeting the house presidents unanimously adopted a statement of support for last year's co-chairman, Lilli Scheye. The committee attempted to persuade Scheye to submit a late self-nomination to the Elections Committee but Scheye declined. Scheye told the Record that she thanked the Housing Committee for their support, but refused further comment.

Larry Mitchell, the CC representative to the CEP, reported that the CEP had voted 9-2 to bar Record reporters from its meetings. Mitchell stated that the committee members felt that the relaxed atmosphere of the meetings might be threatened by the presence of a reporter. He added that the committee believed that other channels of communication, published minutes and Mitchell's reports to the council, were adequate means of reporting the committee's affairs to the student body.

Included in Mitchell's CEP presentation was a report that the committee considered the problem of grade inflation beyond their control. The CEP will soon publicize the alleged disparity in grading among the various departments on campus. The committee will also examine the content and objectives of the 101 course offerings.

The council failed to consider three major issues before its 10:30 curfew. Following the meeting, council vice-president Randy Sturges stated that "There is too much b.s. going down at

Dean promises to notify students in case of rape

The Dean's Office announced this week that the Record and WCFM would be contacted immediately if a rape occurs on campus. Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad stated, "If anything is potentially threatening to students it will be made public." He added that house presidents and JA's should become part of the communication system in cases of rape.

Roosenraad, who outlined his ideas to the housing committee Monday night, maintained that this was a clarification in policy rather than a change. Reiterating a position taken by the administration last week, he claimed "We will not make any false statements. We will respond to inquiries truthfully."

According to Dean Peter Berek, the administration will draft a protocol for handling rape cases.

Responding to the assertion by Women's Center Coordinator Beverly Russell that two college women in the Northern Berkshires were raped in September, Roosenraad repeated, "All of our knowledge is that nothing has occurred involving students on our campus. It seems when we get close to the source of a rumor we find it totally unsubstantiated."

Two WSP inquiry courses offered to frosh as discipline introduction

by Ray DeMeo

Freshmen this year will have the option of choosing either of two "Inquiry Courses" to be offered as part of the 1977 Winter Study Program. The courses will introduce students to varied means of learning in several disciplines.

Professor Daniel D. O'Connor teaches one of the two Inquiry Courses. His course, entitled, "Facts and Values," is a four-part seminar investigating the philosophical and scientific backgrounds of facts and values. Classes will meet three times a week for a four-week period. The first three weeks will feature guest lectures by faculty representatives of three distinct disciplines: a physical scientist, a social scientist, and a literary critic. During the fourth week, students will write a paper based on the lectures. According to O'Connor, the course will give students "a broad overview" of disciplines in all three divisions.

The second Inquiry Course, entitled "Understanding and Explanation: The Common Venture," will be taught jointly by Professors Crampton, Oakley, Reichert and Winston. According to John Reichert, the course will "explore similarities and differences among the way questions are answered and facts explained." The course will meet 12 times during the Winter Study period, and feature four lectures, seven discussion periods, and one large panel discussion.

Michael D. Bell heads the Freshman Curriculum Committee, charged with overseeing the implementation of Inquiry Courses. According to Bell, "the courses seek to make freshmen self-conscious about the ways in which disciplines are approached." Last year's Committee on the Freshman Year brought up the concept of Inquiry Courses that would "introduce students to scholarly disciplines by helping them perceive why such disciplines are valuable and meaningful." According to the committee's report, the courses would provide an alternative to the traditional "101" series by concentrating on "modes of understanding rather than on subject matter understood."

The Freshman Curriculum Committee will institute the two Inquiry Courses as part of the 1977 and 1978 Winter Study programs. According to Bell, the courses are strictly experimental. Last year, the faculty rejected a proposal from the Committee on the Freshman Year to make the courses mandatory for all freshmen and to incorporate them into the regular term-time curriculum, rather than into the Winter Study period. "Many faculty members were, and to an extent still are, a little bit uncertain about what an Inquiry Course was," Bell commented.

Meal tax exemption bill could pass next session

The Massachusetts Senate "probably" won't consider a meals tax exemption for private college and university students this session, according to Senator John W. Fitzpatrick. He said he will vote for the exemption and is "optimistic" that it will be passed next session.

The Meal Tax, which Fitzpatrick described as "a great injustice to students," charges each student on board 8 per cent of each meal over a dollar, or about $99 per semester.

Fitzpatrick said, "a major obstacle" to the passage of the exemption will be removed with the retirement of Senator Frederic Schlosstein, Jr., chairman of the Senate Committee on Taxation and a strong opponent of the exemption.

If it is passed in the next session, the exemption would either be retroactive to September or take effect January 1, 1977.

On September 20, the state house of representatives voted in favor of the exemption, passing the bill on to the senate.

CC Curfew

The College Council's decision to automatically adjourn at 10:30 unless an extension resolution receives a two-thirds vote may make life easier for beleaguered CC member, but after only two weeks of operation the policy has seriously inhibited the CC's ability to handle the business before it. For example, the CC was unable to get through "old business" before the 10:30 p.m. deadline Tuesday evening.

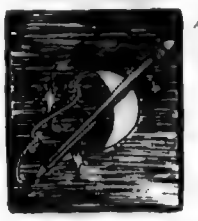
If the College Council is to be an effective organization, it should be able to address new business at all meetings. It cannot, because of a curfew, continue to postpone consideration of issues which may be important and of substantial time value.

Although we understand and respect the College Council members' desire to limit their time commitment, we believe an hour and a half is an unreasonably short period of time in which to expect the CC to be able to complete its business. A curfew should force the CC to move through its business more quickly. Indeed, the CC officers deserve full support in their efforts to speed up business.

If the CC members believe a curfew is necessary, they should establish one at a time which better allows them to complete the business which is their responsibility. It is not unreasonable to ask a Council member to devote two or two and a half hours a week to his responsibility if that is what is required for the CC to give a fair airing to all issues it should be considering.

Let the Sunshine In

The Committee on Educational Policy's 9-2 vote to exclude a Record reporter from its meetings reflects a secretive approach which too many campus committees are taking. Committees making decisions which are likely to have strong ramifications for students' lives and education should be willing to allow all members of the student body to view their deliberations except under special circumstances. While a few committees which deal with personalities rather than ideas (The Committee on Appointments and Promotions, the Honorary Degrees Committee and the Discipline Committee) have valid reasons for exclusion of students as the rule rather than the exception, most committees have no such justification.



Persons who support closed meetings suggest that the opening of meetings would limit the nature of the dialogue and restrict ideas from flowing from one person to another. Such persons must know that those meetings are not totally secretive, their comments can be brought to the attention of the whole College community by another member of that committee. CC representatives report back to the CC regularly.

Some committees already have a policy of occasional open meetings in which students are invited to participate. This is fine. Yet, in endorsing the opening of most committee meetings, the Record is not so much endorsing the right of students to participate in the meetings (representational democracy requires that the committee remain small enough to be workable) but rather their right to see their representatives in action and hold them accountable. Students have plenty of opportunities to talk to their representatives after meetings.

Decisions made in relative secrecy, such as the CEP's physical education requirement proposal last spring, generate unnecessary uproar. The only value of secrecy in many cases is to enhance the club atmosphere and self-importance many committees exude.

College committees cannot continue to operate behind closed doors in the name of "free discussion." "Free discussion" means the involvement of the entire campus.

In endorsing the opening of committee meetings, the Record is not endorsing the right to the viewer to participate in such meeting whether it be by speaking, laughing or sending notes. Such participation slows the action of the committee. Rarely do committees take important actions after only one day of consideration. Thus, audience members who desire to participate may do so by speaking with their representatives after the meeting.

Homecoming Concert

In an announcement which generally surprised the college community and delighted many, the triumvirate of the All College Entertainment Committee (ACEC) announced that the main group at the Homecoming Weekend concert would be The Beatles. Backing up this group will be Peter Frampton and his group, and Bruce Springsteen and the E Street Band. These last groups are two of the hottest bands of the seventies.

Many have questioned the ACEC's ability to finance these high-priced groups. Their budget has never been particularly high, and attendance at rock concerts has been traditionally poor. The ACEC put forth the following explanation: "Listen, how many concerts can you recall in the past four years? Remember Maggie Bell? How much do you think we paid her? All the beer she could drink, that's all! The fact is, we have provided such little entertainment for the past decade and what entertainment we have provided has been so inexpensive, that we have saved up enough money to finance these three groups in the fall, and still have enough money for Elton John, Frank Sinatra, and the Evel Knieval show (in Chapin Hall) for spring weekend. We expect good attendance at most of these events."

The tentative schedule for Homecoming Weekend is as follows: Thursday, Nov. 5: Peter Frampton, Dodd House Living room. Friday, Nov. 6: Bruce Springsteen, Fitch Prospect Lounge. Saturday, Nov. 7: The Beatles, Freshman Quad. Traditional refreshments will be served. Each group will hold an open rehearsal and master class the afternoon of their performances.

SPECIAL BULLETIN: As we were going to press the ACEC issued a further announcement:

"We regret to inform the college community that our main acts for Homecoming Weekend have all unexpectedly cancelled. A member of the Peter Frampton group has, uh, hurt himself and just can't get it together. Bruce Springsteen has to visit some relatives that day so he can't make it either. And the Beatles have been cancelled because of lack of interest by the College community. We tried to book Joni Mitchell, Earth, Wind & Fire, and the Beach Boys, but they can't come, although they wanted to very badly. So Homecoming Weekend will feature the popular group Iron Butterfly, singer-songwriter Oliver ("Good Morning Starshine") and singer-actress-personality Lulu ("To Sir with Love"). Further details to follow."

Kershaw to head N.Y. commission

Joseph A. Kershaw, recently-retired College economics professor, has been appointed director of the temporary State Commission on the Future of Post-Secondary Education in New York. Nils Y. Wessell, chairman of the commission, made the announcement today.

The commission, appointed last month by Gov. Hugh L. Carey, was formed to study the financing and structure of post-secondary education in the state. Its offices will be in both Albany and New York City.

Kershaw retired as Herbert H. Lehman Professor of Economics at Williams this June and was named a professor emeritus. He is now serving part-time as comptroller of the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute in Williamstown. Kershaw joined the Williams faculty in 1962 after 14 years with the Rand Corporation as researcher, administrator and head of its economic division. He has also served as Provost of the College.

Sale of Pizza House finalized

The final papers will be signed this week in the sale of the Pizza House on Spring Street to Constantine Anagnos, the current owner of Colonial Pizza. Low profits at Pizza House prompted the sale according to Anagnos who said he was buying the restaurant because he wanted more space. Both establishments will continue to operate with an identical menu.

Grabois and Oakley appointments

Dean of the Faculty Neil R. Grabois has been appointed Provost of the College, President John W. Chandler announced recently. Professor Francis C. Oakley will succeed Grabois as Dean of the Faculty, said Chandler. Both appointments are effective January 1, 1977.

Grabois will replace Stephen R. Lewis, who will become the economic consultant to the Ministry of Finance and Development Planning of Botswana.

As Provost, Grabois will assist Chandler in College-wide executive decisions regarding budgets and long-range planning.

CALENDAR

The Republican Club and ADA are co-sponsoring a Candidates' Night Monday, Oct. 4 at 7 pm in 111 TBL. Bruce McElvein will speak for Ford, Joel Smith for Carter, and Ken Bertsch for McCarthy. Speeches will be 8 minutes long; after all have spoken there will be questions from the audience.

The Nickelodeon presents another evening with Hitchcock Friday and Saturday at 7:30. "The Lady Vanishes" stars Margaret Lockwood and Michael Redgrave in search of a missing companion. In "The 39 Steps", a young Canadian unwittingly becomes involved in a murder and must run from police until vindicated.

Roman Polanski directs and acts in "The Tenant," an encounter with madness. Upon leasing an apartment the young tenant discovers his predecessor was driven to suicide by the peculiar neighbors. The film (1976) co-stars Shelley Winters, Isabelle Adjani and Melvyn Douglas, 7:00 and 9:15 pm, Sunday through Tuesday.

On Saturday, Andrew Sarris' adaptation of Phillip Barry's "Holiday" shows at 7:30 pm at Bennington College's Tishman Hall. Cary Grant and Katherine Hepburn star in what is considered one of the 30's most intelligent and witty films and one of director George Cukor's finest works.

ALS letter

To whom it may concern:

Those students having formerly participated in the activities of an organization known as the Adelphic Literary Society wish to inform and assure the College that the group has dissolved itself and that its members have disbanded. While the Adelphic Literary Society never achieved the status of a fraternity, it recognizes the College's position on fraternities and therefore has no interest in continuing its existence as an underground or secret society.

The Adelphic Literary Society was a student initiated organization which later sought the support of the national fraternity chapter of Alpha Delta Phi. We have informed the national organization that our society will cease to exist on or off the Williams College campus. The Adelphic Literary Society never received a charter as an Alpha Delta Phi fraternity. Additionally, none of its present undergraduate members were ever initiated into the fraternity.

Finally, the members of the Adelphic Literary Society came together for the purpose of formalizing and enriching the friendships among its members. To the extent that our friendships were strengthened by this common bond, our experience can be termed worthwhile.

The Adelphic Literary Society never sought to interfere in the affairs of Williams College. We informed the College of our existence out of respect for College policy and our desire to function as an "above ground" organization. We will maintain our bonds of friendship and adhere to the rules of the College.

Dean Berek reveals nature of administrator's odyssey

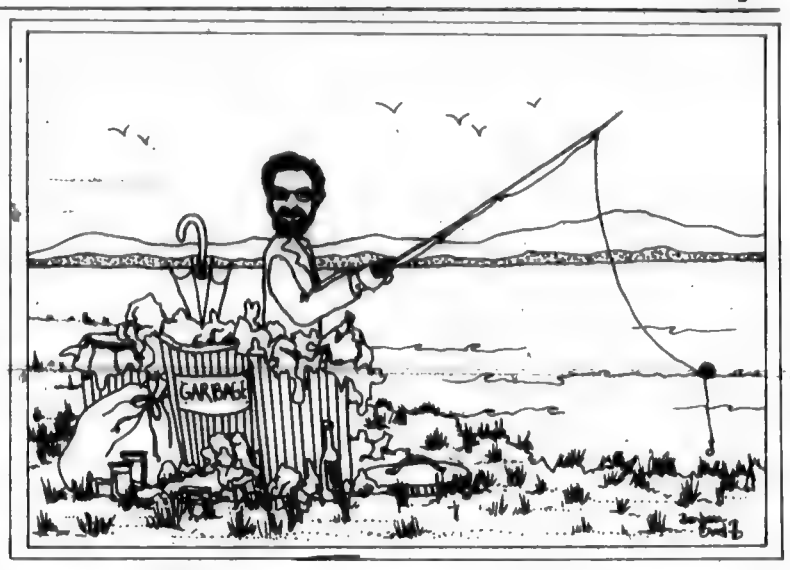
This is the first in a series of articles presenting administration and faculty members in a somewhat personal light. Hopefully, the articles will help bring them down from their pedestals to a human—and more interesting—level.

by Michael Golden

"I always wanted to be the guy with the paper bags over his feet who stood on the back of the garbage truck and caught the trash cans that were thrown up to him and who dumped the trash into the truck," reminisces Peter Berek, the amiable Dean of the College, who resembles a bearded Shakespearean actor.

As presumed, garbage inspection was just a passing fancy and his interests shifted to scientific biological research. By the beginning of his college career, however, the summers in a bio lab in Maine were all behind him. He had decided to teach English in a small New England college.

Popping in and out of his office on the first floor of Hopkins Hall, Berek has only a second to gasp for air between appointments. But once inside his office, complete with a couch for casualness, the tempo slows, the mood changes, and a transformation takes place. The busy administrator becomes a cordial and interested friend, ready to discuss anything from decisions about a major field of study to psychological and very personal problems.



This is by no means the full extent of his duties as dean, however, which he describes as "complicated" and "very varied." While advising students takes some of his time, he also deals with curriculum planning, parents of students, residential housing and dining hall problems, faculty, administrators, and everything else that has anything to do with the students here on campus. The position is an all-encompassing one, but he relishes this valuable experience that was an "interesting surprise for me."

When offered the position of dean, he had "megatons of qualms." "I didn't know what the job entailed," he explains, "if I'd be able to accomplish it, or if able, if I'd like it."

Now in his second year as a dean, he finds the job most appealing. "It gives me a different perspective on how the college works, as an administrator rather than a faculty member. It also gives me a different relationship with students." The most fascinating part of the job, he enthusiastically remarks, "isn't working with the faculty or on curricular planning, but with students who come in for help." He delights in the extent to which he has become involved in their lives.

When not being ubiquitous or omnipotent as dean, and when not reviewing a book or writing an article as an English professor and PhD., Peter Berek is a family man. One of his favorite pastimes is fishing, at which he considers himself "the world's worst fly fisherman."

Since the job of dean is so demanding, after a few years he will return to teaching English for relief from it. Until then, he will be situated in Hopkins Hall, a smiling and energetic man. Although he will not have time to go ichthyosaur fishing with you, he can be someone to talk with when yours is not quite the best of all possible worlds.

Voters challenge denial

by Brad Caine

The League of Women Voters of Williamstown has challenged the town's voter registration policies which prevent some students from registering.

According to Corrine Bellingham, Chairman of Voter Services for the league, students are being denied their legal right to register. The law states that anyone who claims residency in a town may register to vote in that town.

"Our interpretation of the law, which has the support of the Election Practices Department of the office of the Secretary of State, is that residency is determined by where one votes," she said.

Town Clerk Marilyn Head maintained that a claim of residency must be backed up by some tangible evidence. "I can't just take a student's word that he or she is a resident of Williamstown. The minimum I require is a driver's license issued by the state of Massachusetts."

Head disagreed with the league's interpretation of the law, stating registration doesn't establish residency, but rather once residency is established the privilege to register to vote is granted. She emphasized that voting is a responsibility and registration in Williamstown can't be seen as a convenience.

Bellingham cited a recent court decision upholding students' rights to register where they go to school without being subjected to the arbitrary requirements of local officials.

Both Bellingham and Head agreed that a student who registers here rather than in his home state is required to obtain a Massachusetts drivers license register their cars with the state, and pay the automobile excise tax and file Massachusetts state income tax forms. A Student also forfeits scholarships granted by the home state and is no longer covered by a parents' homeowners' policy.

Bill brings back returnable bottle and deposit

by Sarah Thorne

If you consume close to 300 cans or bottles of beer and soft drinks per year you needn't flaunt your thirst or drinking capacity because that is the current intake for the average American. The volume of our empties lurches upward at a rate of 8 per cent per year (doubling since 1966) and with it the proliferation of litter, energy and resource consumption, taxes allocated to litter pick up, and demand for scarce landfill space. Although not as explosive an issue as gun control or the ERA, other referendums on the November ballot, the problem of beverage container disposal, question 6, has ignited controversy among environmentalists, unions, retailers, consumers, and the bottling industry.

The Massachusetts Bottle Bill would require a refundable deposit of at least 5c on all beer and soft drink containers sold in the state. In addition it would outlaw sale of cans with detachable flip tops. Consumers would collect their deposit upon returning their empty containers at a collection center or their retailer. These would be picked up when the distributor makes his next delivery. In this manner containers can be reused 10-15 times.

The campaign to reinstitute the returnable bottle is being advanced by the Committee for a Massachusetts Bottle Bill, which was organized by Rep. Lois Pines (D-Newton), and has 8,000 dollars in funds. The committee is supported by the Sierra Club, L.W.V. Mass. PIRG, Mass. Association of Selectmen, Mass. Federation of Women's Clubs, Mass. Audubon Society, and Mass. Forests and Parks. In conjunction with these organizations, the group has gathered the 56,000 signatures necessary according to Massachusetts law to force consideration of the bill by the legislature. This summer the required 10,000 additional signatures were collected (120,000 total) to bypass the indecisive legislature and place the Bottle Bill on the November 1976 ballot. A similar bill will appear on the Maine, Colorado, and Michigan ballots.

In Williamstown the Democratic Town Committee and the Williams Americans for Democratic Action have overwhelmingly endorsed the ballot question and the A.D.A. is working for its passage. Some local retailers are distributing literature opposing the bill.

Industry opposition, fueled by the Committee for the Protection of Jobs and Convenience Containers, claims that the Bottle Bill does not effectively or economically address the litter problem. The Committee, which has raised $5,000,000 (67 per cent from out of state contributors) contends that the bill attacks their bottling industries unfairly, pointing to the unregulated wine, hard liquor, and uncarbonated beverage industries. A 1972 EPA study disputes this logic by revealing that litter containers are 71.3 per cent beer, 25.7 per cent soft drinks, and 3 per cent hard liquor and miscellaneous.

Before jumping passionately onto the environmentalist band wagon or crusading for the opulent American Dream, priorities must be ordered on question 6. Litter, energy, resources, taxes, waste disposal, and jobs are all issues close to the American heart when expressed in tangible economic terms.

Jettisoned beverage containers comprise 50 per cent of roadside litter in Mass. and cost state taxpayers $3 million per year for removal. Oregon and Vermont, where similar legislation has been enacted, have respectively experienced an 88 per cent and 67 per cent decline in littered bottles and cans.

The EPA estimates that a national Bottle Bill would cut industry energy consumption by 55 per cent and resource consumption ten fold. Proponents argue that alternatives such as recycling, resource recovery, sanitary landfills, and a container tax are inefficient means of conserving resources.

Perhaps the most intense debate surrounds the sacred issue of jobs. From each source eminates a conflicting set of figures. In Oregon and Vermont there has been a narrow increase in jobs. According to a Federal Reserve Bank of Boston study, Massachusetts would gain 187-1380 jobs, however a recent Boston Glove article predicted a net loss of 300 jobs.

In addition, the bottling industry attests that the bill will necessitate an escalation in beverage prices and a concomitant reduction in sales and profits. Oregon reported no decline in soft drink sales, an increase in beer sales, and a slight drop in price for some of the affected beverages. Vermont, however, experienced an initial price rise.

Local art gallery opens

by Steve Davidson

For many people, Williamstown means art and each year the College and the renowned Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute draw thousands of visitors to the area. With these attractions, it is remarkable that no gallery existed in town until this fall.

"It's the only shop like it in the area," says Robin Altman, jewelry designer and silversmith. "There are not many places around here where you can buy art." The shop is the Gallery, a simple yellow house in Williamstown and the latest addition to the Spring Street line. Owned and operated by Mrs. Robert Davis, the Gallery offers a wide variety of art items ranging in price from $5 to $500.

Although the shop opened only three weeks ago, Davis has been working on it since March, when she began collecting lithographs. Since then, she has been tapping young talent to occupy her two floors of paintings and sculpture.

Davis, interested in promoting new, young artists' work, is giving them a start through the Gallery. To find these aspiring artists, Davis frequently goes to art shows in Vermont, New York, and Washington, D.C.

The paintings, sculpture, photographs, prints and artifacts which Mrs. Davis has selected are all in good taste. She has acquired an array of handmade furniture by Thomas Moser, photography by Mrs. William Tague, landscapes by Virginia Davis, pastels by Susan Felock, and abstracts by Emily Johnson. She will soon feature works by the noted sculptor and painter, Sidney Loeb.

When asked if the Gallery will go the way of many Spring Street establishments, Davis replied, "When you fill a need, and then provide quality, concern, and care, you're not going to lose." Why is Davis doing this? "I enjoy living vicariously through other people's success."

CC members suggested the meetings would move faster if Piltch would read over or post the agenda at the beginning of each meeting so that the members will be aware of the number of issues on the docket. Piltch agreed that this was a good idea and promised to implement it at the next meeting.

Students off board diminish

The number of students on campus but off the College board plan dropped significantly following the addition of vegetarian meals in all major dining halls. "Only a dozen of the 155 students off board live on campus," Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad said, adding that this is a considerably smaller percentage than last year.

In line with the College's belief that the experience of communal eating has educational value, all students living on campus are required to pay College board. The College grants occasional exceptions in cases where medical problems require a special diet.

"In the past, many vegetarians have argued that there was insufficient vegetarian food available to maintain a healthy vegetarian diet," Roosenraad said. "With the expanded vegetarian service and a larger salad bar, fewer students have applied for a medical excuse."

A change in exemptions procedures has also contributed to the decline in waivers granted, Roosenraad added. Director of Health Robert A. Goodell now determines the validity of a medical request to go off board, a job performed by the Dean's office in the past.

Although only one board plan exists for on campus students, those who live off campus are offered two alternative plans. These students may contract for a dinner only plan, or one which provides for weekday lunches and Thursday night dinners.

The College has studied the feasibility at offering optional plans to all students, particularly the possibility of a no breakfast option. These involved in the study concluded that savings to students who don't eat breakfast would not warrant the extra work that would be involved, such as marking id's.

Wednesday afternoon Larry Mitchell told the Record that many committee members had considered the vote "inconsequential." "It means more to students than I originally anticipated." Mitchell reiterated that he did not see the necessity of a reporter at the meetings but told the Record "I am willing to reconsider my vote." "I'm sure the committee would reconsider," he concluded.

Print show to open Sunday at College, Jim Dine featured

"Jim Dine: Prints: 1970-76," a major retrospectice, will open at the Williams College Museum of Art this Sunday. This is the first major recent print retrospective, and will remain on view through the sixth of November.

Jim Dine has been a notable figure on the modern art scene for the last 15 years. He established himself as an avant-garde painter in New York in the early 1960's, and was associated with the pop art movement later in that decade. In recent years, he has moved away from pop art toward the print medium, away from abstract art into using the human figure and concentrating on draftsmanship. He has had exhibits all over the world, including a major one in the Whitney Museum in New York.

The show will be hung in the rotunda and several adjoining rooms of the Williams College Museum, abutted by Medieval sculpture and paintings—a rather unusual setting for Dine's work. The show will have a catalogue illustrating about 200 of his prints.

Dine himself will be on the Williams campus for the month of October as artist-in-residence. The show and the catalogue are associated with his stay. While he is at Williams, he will be working on a number of prints and will be interacting with students on a non-classroom basis.

Dine's residency is the first of three artist-in-residencies at the college: Robert Morris will be in residency the month of January, and Michelle Stewart will spend a month working at Williams in the spring. The new program was initiated and coordinated by Williams art professor Tom Krens.

The show will move from Williamstown to MIT in November, and then possibly to Princeton, Berkeley and the Jerusalem Museum in Israel.

Women harriers lose 24-32 to Middlebury

The Williams women's cross-country team suffered their first dual meet loss of the year Wednesday, dropping a 24-32 decision to Middlebury. The Panthers' Moo Thrope was the individual winner in the meet, covering the 2.75 mile loop in 15:55.

The first Williams finisher was sophomore Mary Hakala, third in 16:06. Michelle Cutaforth, stepping down from longer distances, took fifth in 16:31.

Rounding out the Williams scoring were Debbie Gregg, Lisa Capaldini, and Corrie Johnson, in 7th, 8th, and 9th spots. The harriers face Brandeis and Tufts on the road Sunday.

rest of the defense should remain intact.

Defensively, Middlebury is somewhat untested, giving up 13 first-half points to Colby last week before shotting the Mules out after intermission. Odell plans to "go with everything we've got, even a few trick plays," to beat the Panther defenders.

In the cold and rain a year ago, Williams had great success running the football against the Panthers, and Odell hopes to do the same thing once again: We're going to try and run the ball right down their throat."

Don Wallace will once again open at quarterback, but Odell indicated that he wouldn't hesitate to go with backup Bill Whelan if any troubles arise. Tom Redden will man his usual fullback position, backed up by freshman Gus Nuzzolese. Scott Harrinton moves back into the starting lineup at one halfback spot, while either Pete Hansbury or Charlie Carrier, contingent upon the latter's ankle injury, will round out the backfield.

Middlebury coach Heinecken has called his 1976 team "The best I've ever had in five years here." The Panthers are hungry to put an end to the fourteen-game Williams winning streak. They are the last squad to beat Williams. Head-knocking commences on Porter Field at 2:00 p.m. Anyone who's keyed up to say "I told you so" to Eph rooters best be there, 'cause this could be the last chance. Middlebury is a cut above the rest of the Williams schedule this year.

Following Osborne's goal Vennell continued to substitute with surprising freedom—in all a total of 18 Williams players got into the game—and this policy soon paid dividends when junior Bill Kister put the Purple up 3-1 on his first career goal. The rejoicing following Kister's score was brought up short, though, when Williams' wing Ray Powell was thrown out of the game about ten seconds later. Powell had taken a jolt to the head from Kekucki immediately preceding Kister's goal, and was ejected for protesting the play too vehemently.

The Fighting Dutchmen, inspired by the Troy faithful on hand, did not give up. With 15 minutes to play a series of precision Union passes culminated in a kick and score by forward Parker Antin. Minutes later Antin got one last good scoring chance, but boomed the ball down by the rugby field.

Vennell praised Osborne, Bruce Camilleri, and Pete Barra for their work against the Dutchmen, adding that "when you're not at your best and still win, it's a good sign." Listening, Middlebury?

Runners cruise past Panthers; stay unbeaten

by Chris Flavin

The varsity cross country team grabbed an easy 22-33 win Wednesday over a weak Middlebury College team. Leading the way was captain Ken Leinbach who pulled away from the pack in the first mile, and managed to stay out of the reach of Middlebury's number one Chris Baldwin. Leinbach's teammates followed him in with the third through fifth spots to clinch the race, which was run on Williams' home course.

This second meet of the season was unimpressive in terms of score and times—except when you consider that Williams ran without four members of the varsity team, including three of the top five. Joe Kolb, Frank Carr, Tom Shreck, and Chris Flavin were all missing from the starting team as they rested up for tomorrow's meet against Albany and Vermont.

Despite the fact that half the team was acting as cheerleaders aboard Stu Read's fire engine rather than competing, the race was still never in doubt. Leinbach, along with Baldwin and skiier Gary James broke from the pack early, and stayed well ahead of the other harriers throughout the race. Leinbach maintained a lead of from ten to twenty yards, and pulled away to win in 25:50, a relatively slow winning time for the five-mile course. James, running his first regular varsity meet this season looked very strong throughout, gradually gaining ground on Baldwin, but not quite catching him at the end.

Further back, Frank Carr, Steve Polasky, Ed Bacher, and Burt Saul ran together from the start with a group of Middlebury runners. Carr moved easily over the course, working only the hills. He finished fourth in 27:01 with Polasky cruising in behind him seven seconds later.

Bacher ran perhaps the best race of his career, starting off fast, and maintaining a strong pace to the finish line. Though just beaten by a group of three Middlebury harriers, Bacher was only twenty seconds behind Polasky at the finish.

Sixth and seventh for Williams were Burt Saul and Hans Giesecke who finished out of the scoring in eleventh and thirteenth. Behind them were Jeff Magoon, Larry Wu, and Cleve Thayer who battled the remaining Middlebury runners.

Tomorrow is the big one for the Eph harriers who will go against Albany State and the University of Vermont on the Albany home course. With a well-rested squad, the Ephmen are hopeful of repeating last year's crucial win over these two teams, which gained Coach Plansky's squad recognition as a top New England cross-country team. This year both Albany and Vermont will be gunning for Williams, and a victory is far from assured.

Middlebury to test Ephs

by Tim Layden

Middlebury College football coach Mickey Heinecken has been having a recurring nightmare for the past twelve months. He sees his 1975 squad losing to Williams 22-0. But, much worse, he sees the Williams offense hold the ball for the entire fourth quarter, marching up the field in 18 plays, all on the ground in the cold and mud and scoring the rub-salt-in-the-wounds touchdown that seals a 22-0 win.

The picture isn't a pretty to the fifth-year Panther mentor, as the loss was his first to Williams after three straight wins. Heinecken and his club have been chafing at the bit to get back at Williams for a year. Saturday afternoon, they get their chance, and right in their own den.

"It's going to be a very tough game," says head coach Bob Odell, "but we'll fight like hell." Middlebury is the only school which Odell doesn't show a winning record against in his five years at Williams.

Three years ago, Middlebury handed Williams their second loss in three games at Porter Field in Vermont, posting an easy 35-21 win on the [illegible]. Two years ago, sophomore quarterback Don Wallace's fourth-quarter aerial show fell just short of miraculous as Williams fell, 25-20.

This year, Williams travels to Middlebury for the second year in a row, to face a squad which represents one of the hungriest and most talented teams they will face this season. The Panthers, according to Odell, "Will field veterans at almost every position."

Leading the Middlebury attack will be a pair of gifted and hard-running backs. Roy Heffernan, a 6', 190 pound junior ran roughshod through seven opponents last season, but was held to just 86 yards on 27 carries against Williams. The Needham, Massachusetts native runs with the finesse of a bulldozer and about as much strength.

Joining Heffernan in the backfield is much-improved fellow junior John Dobek, who came on strong at the end of 1975 to finish with 483 yards, more than anyone on the Williams squad. Senior Ken Chase is expected to get the starting nod at fullback.

Middlebury's weak spot last season was passing the ball. The return of tri-captain Rex Martin would have helped rectify the situation, but he still hasn't fully recovered from a knee injury. Sophomore Mike Miles, a Cornelius Greene type, is expected to open at qb, and will likely throw little and run often.

Odell hopes to contain the Middlebury running game by utilizing different types of slants in the defensive line, but is somewhat worried about the size of the Panthers, "We're a little worried about getting out-physicaled," said Odell.

In the still-questionable defensive end spots for Williams, Bob Staiger will start, along with either Mike Masi or Steve Rogers.

Greg McAleenan will start at one corner back, along with Mark Eckert. Junior Charlie Sanders has been benched in favor of the soph duo. The

Booters smash Union

by Mark Pogue

In a game enlivened by 39 fouls, two ejections, and several near-scuffles, Williams' varsity soccer squad subdued a fired-up team from Union College Wednesday, 3-2. The triumph got the Purple off to a 1-0 start on its regular season slate, and left Union with only its second loss in the last 12 games. Both losses have come at the hands of the Ephmen.

Although the rough and wild action onfield sometimes hid the fact, both teams entered the contest with definite plans of attack. The Ephs' strategy, brainchild of Coach Jeff Vennell, was to exploit the slowness of Union's fullbacks either by using the long ball or by letting the Purple's speedy wings dribble around the defense. Dutchmen Coach Bob Magee, meanwhile, instructed his charges always to look for dangerous forwards George Garivaltis and John Kovacs.

For most of the first half, though, neither squad developed much of a consistent attack. "Pre-season jitters was part of our problem, and that's understandable," said Vennell. "But what bothered me was our failure to adjust—to hit long or go around the defense. It left us making some very difficult plays in the middle of the field."

The Purple finally did get on the board with 16:19 gone, when John Friborg scored off a Steve Smith assist. Friborg caught up to the ball just inside the penalty area and rolled it by Dutchmen goalie Mark Rekucki, who stood frozen in his tracks five yards outside the goal mouth.

At this point Williams gained control of the action and seemed ready to increase its lead by halftime. Union, though, gladly accepted the tying goal when a cross from forward Ira Sutton smacked Purple fullback John Lanier in the thigh and hopped into the net.

Passing and shotmaking continued to improve for both sides in the second

Greg McAleenan, sophomore defensive back for Bob Odell's 1-0 varsity football team has been named the Record's initial Athlete of the Week for the 1976-77 academic year. McAleenan, sidelined for ten days with a groin pull, came on in the second half of last week's 14-6 win over Hamilton to intercept three passes.

The converted quarterback also blocked a punt in the first quarter, setting up the first Williams score. He received ECAC recognition as an honorable mention player of the week, and has earned a starting job for this week's key clash with Middlebury.

HONORABLE MENTION—

Sally Kraft—a member of the women's varsity field hockey team, she netted seven of Williams' thirteen goals in last week's action, leading the Ephwomen to a 4-1 season record.

Joe Kolb—junior leader of the unbeaten cross-country team, Kolb set a 3.8 mile course record in leading the squad to an easy win over the alumni. Kolb also tied with teammate Tom Schreck for second place in pacing Williams to season opening wins over Hamilton and RPI.

SPORTS

by Dennis O'Shea

Maybe it's just a poli-ec major's efficiency bias, but I just can't see trying to fix the leaky faucet before going after the busted water main. Such a reasonable ordering of priorities, though, seems beyond the abilities of America's answer to the International Olympic Committee, the NCAA.

Let me tell you a little story. In 1975 Chico State, a northern California school for aspiring barracuda who shouldn't have been there anyway, ran away with the NCAA Division III swimming championships, posting several performances that would have won the Division II meet and topping second place Johns Hopkins by 256 points. Last year, with Chico safely shipped to the upper division where they chewed up the likes of Northridge and UCal-Irvine, the small college meet was at least a contest.

But, because of Chico's outstanding '75 times the qualifying standards for the Division III's last year, based on the previous year's results, were outrageously tough. Many fine college swimmers didn't qualify for the Nationals, and many of those who did make it weren't able to repeat the standard time in the championship meet. In one event, the 100 yard freestyle, 22 out of 38 entrants failed to make the cut-off.

So what's the solution? Obvious enough. Revise the times downward, right? Not so obvious to our friends at the NCAA. The rules prohibit loosening qualifying standards, ostensibly to save member colleges money by not involving too many swimmers in the Nationals.

For an organization that only last year committed itself to encouraging the fullest possible participation in athletics by dumping insane squad size limitations, this is barking up the wrong money tree.

Instead of diddling around with Division III qualifying times and some kid's dream of participating in a real national class event, the NCAA should be getting involved with the real waste of money epitomized by Division I athletic scholarships and "laundry allowances."

The NCAA should ban member institutions from providing scholarship assistance to athletes on any basis other than financial need. It's not a new idea, but it's about time the paragons of American collegiate sports started taking it seriously.

Athletic scholarships have turned participation in an extracurricular activity into a job, and student athletes into more blatant professionals than Jim Thorpe or Karl Schranz ever were. Did you know that last fall, when those squad size rules limited football teams to 60 at home and 48 away, Division I schools were still allowed as many as 90 football scholarships? I've heard that even Yankee Conference member UConn has around 40 football players and 30 basketball players on grants-in-aid.

Consider the positive effects of eliminating these free rides, beyond deemphasis of athletes as an elite and privileged class of student, and the return of major college athletics to the status of a game rather than a business, or worse, a farm league for the majors.

Grant-in-aid funds could be shifted to university financial aid departments or to minor sports programs, either of which could put the money to better use than free-ticketing unneedy jocks.

Great talent would most likely be more evenly spread among the Division I schools, promoting competition and eliminating any need for that ridiculous proposed "super-conference" of the Ohio States, USCs and Notre Dames. At the very least high school greats could make their choice of school on the basis of program and coaching quality, rather than top dollar offer.

Those athletes more interested in their sport than a higher education might just stay out of college without that monetary incentive, leaving space in university classrooms for the serious student. The evolution of a renewed club sports system outside of education which an education of jocks from universities would make necessary would be just the shot in the arm American amateur sports need. Strongly based sports clubs would provide the facilities needed for post-graduate and women athletes now sadly neglected by coaches who would rather stick with the collegiate male in a nice safe university post (ever wonder why American Olympic women's swimming and track teams were so weak in Montreal compared to the juggernaut men's squads?).

ABC might not go for canning scholarships, nor would the AD's of the Big 10 or Pac 8, but who are college sports for anyway?

Random thoughts: I marvel that anyone could even conceive of shelling out 200 buckadingdongs for ringside seating at the Ali-Norton altercation . . .

Why does everyone accept that "To beat the champ you've got to knock him out"? If he doesn't fight as well shouldn't he lose? . . .

If you can, get ahold of the new Athletic Department brochure. Put together over the summer by Dan Daly '76 and released last week, it's an excellent summary of Williams sports today and a fascinating look at the past . . .

SOS closure forces a new look at regulations

by Stu Massad

After forcing the closure of SOS, a student-run campus dry-cleaning service, College administrators have begun rewriting the regulations governing student businesses, Dean Peter Berek said last week.

SOS, a campus agency run in conjunction with Treet Cleaners of North Adams, ceased operation last Wednesday because of conflicts with the College's tax-exempt status, Berek said. Seniors David Bass and Ronald Long, whom Berek called "innocent victims," had operated the agency only a short time before being forced to disband.

Bass and Long said that they began work on the dry-cleaning service in mid-September, after being approached by representatives of Treet. They worked for several days canvassing students to determine if the business might be profitable.

The two students first approached Walter O'Brien, Director of Campus Security for permission to operate from Baxter Hall. O'Brien referred them to Henry Flynt, Director of Financial Aid. Bass and Long said that Flynt was very enthusiastic about their plan. Official approval came from Patrick Diamond of the Office of Career Counseling.

According to Berek, the Office of Career Counseling permitted SOS to operate from Baxter Hall despite a rule in the Student Handbook stating that "no business of any kind may be conducted in or from a College dormitory room or building."

The rule protects the College from losing its tax-exempt status through association with profit-making enterprises, Berek explained. He also noted that the rule prohibits students from operating businesses from their rooms or from any other place on campus.

According to Bass, Flynt foresaw no

Town will allow students to register

The recent difficulties encountered by Williams students trying to register to vote in Williamstown were resolved last Thursday when state elections officials called town clerk Marilyn J. Head and informed her that the law required her to register anyone wanting to do so.

In past weeks, several students trying to register in Williamstown were told they needed at least a Massachusetts driver's license. The League of Women Voters of Williamstown challenged the issue, hiring attorney Bruce D. Grinnell to review case law concerning residency requirements.

According to the North Adams Transcript, Richard D. Roeden of the state elections, division said he talked with Head Thursday and explained the Secretary of State's interpretation of residency requirements for voter registration.

"Students don't have to bring anything but themselves to register. They must fill out a statement saying where they consider their home to be and swear to the statement's truth. But they don't need a driver's license or anything like that," Roeden told the Transcript.

Head commented, "Within 14 days prior to election anyone can challenge the accuracy of the statement." She made it clear that charges of perjury can be brought against anyone who signs a registration statement claiming Williamstown as his legal residence when in fact it is not.

According to the Transcript, while registrar John P. Conners politely refused to say he thought Head was wrong, he said he will personally register any students who have had trouble registering.

Board should cover improved food

by Keron Walker

The modest increase in Williams' board fees this year should be sufficient to support improvements in the College's food services, according to Food Services director Ross Keller.

"I foresee no problems in operating within our limits as determined by this fixed boarding fee," Keller said.

Business Manager Shane Riorden estimated the 1976-77 meals budget at $1,595,000, a 3 per cent hike based on an average of 1725 board contracts for the year. Apparently the rise in board fee from $900 to $925 per contract, along with the reorganization and cutback of some food service activities, is adequate to maintain the present variety and scope of the department.

Keller explained that he has augmented selection rather than quantity of food, and that any increased costs would be incurred by an extended employee payroll. "We purchase the same amount of food, but have hired more people to prepare and serve it," he said.

Confirming Keller's statement, Riorden said, "There are no major differences in the amount of food bought for the service and prices have stabilized somewhat." Riorden added that "Keller has revamped the supervision and presentation of meals in general, cutting back where he felt necessary and adding in the same way." He predicted that "we should have a better idea of exactly how the spending of the department has been redistributed by the end of the fall."

"The pattern of consumption is basically the same this year as last," Keller continued. "We have reduced the magnitude of some services, but not at what we believe to be the expense of the department. We have added other services which we feel more than compensate."

Keller went on to cite cutbacks in food sold to students and faculty at cost. A barbecue cookout option replaced this service. Food Services also caters to a number of specially requested meals and occasions for various campus organizations.

Riorden said that he had been unaware until recently that the branch of the Food Services involving sales from the commissary required so much time and money. Riorden explained that "students tended to buy in quantities too small to warrant spending the work hours and money to keep this service going."

"Keller has rearranged the structure of the Food Service here," Riorden said, "and so far has done an excellent job in co-ordinating it. His unit managers have their responsibilities well under control."

Keller said he expects that "the various components of the service will run even more smoothly after a certain time." "At the moment, we are all getting used to each other," Keller added.

Trustees to gather Thursday, will discuss Mt. Hope, frats

The Board of Trustees will meet at the college this weekend, Thursday, Oct. 7, through Saturday, Oct. 9.

Trustees and their spouses will kick off the weekend of meetings by having dinner at the residential houses to which they are assigned. Then at 8 p.m., student house presidents will join the trustees to discuss housing and fraternities at the meeting of the Campus Life Committee at the Faculty Club.

Friday, the trustees will have a full day of meetings. Starting in Hopkins 11 at 9, the Buildings and Grounds Committee will discuss the Mt. Hope proposal. The administration may identify to the Trustees the "friend of the College" who is heading the in-

Asimov, Solow present different views of future

Solow clarifies resource depletion

Fears of American resource depletion are "without foundation," economist Robert Solow claimed in his address, "The Future of the U.S. Economy: Have We Come to the Bottom of the Barrel?" Solow spoke Thursday night as part of the series, 1976: The Next Hundred Years.

The economist contested the widely held paradigm that, after 200 years of resource use and development, the United States has "almost reached the bottom of the barrel."

"Long before fuels run out, their prices will go up and substitute resources will be found," Solow said.

"The question is not what will the world be like when resources are not available, but when they are more expensive," he added.

Observing that the availability of resources has not hurt the standard of living in the "recorded past," Solow commented that "many resources could be used up that won't be used up." In his opening remarks, however, Solow predicted that the United States "will be poorer in the next hundred years, at least how we recognize wealth today." There are "too many uncertainties" to determine what long run policy choices will be, Solow concluded, especially for economists who are "unable to predict 52 weeks in advance." Solow urged that Americans redirect their attention from resources to "more important material problems" such as unemployment.

Noted economist Robert M. Solow of MIT spoke at the Center for Developmental Economics Thursday afternoon, discussing the research he has been doing for Portugal. That evening he lectured in Jesup Hall on resource depletion. (photo by Sundin)

Asimov stresses need for population control

by Nancy Richman

"We can complete the adolescence of humankind and we can enter into the adulthood," concluded author Issac Asimov as he addressed a college audience Saturday night on the topic, "The Future of the Communal Idea."

"We're going to have to abolish sexism," Asimov commented, "and racism too, I'm afraid. We're also going to have to wipe out war. Life is going to be dull with a sane world order, isn't it? I can foresee though a new idea emerging—a communal idea—colonies in space."

The world must deal with its population problem first, according to Asimov. "We are now facing the Malthusian catastrophe," the science fiction author claimed. If world population were to increase at its present rate, Asimov said he imagines a grim scenario. "If we look into the future about 500 years from now, we'd see 100,000 people per square mile."

Asimov continued, predicting that "there will have to be no non-human animals. We'll have to consume all available plant life. There will be no dogs, no pussycats and no more sardines. In 2460 AD, the entire world will be covered by one continuous high-rise structure. The ocean will rest on the roof and it will provide us with all the food we eat. Microorganisms will be shaped into mock veal and fake soybeans."

Such a predicament will never develop, Asmiov assured, explaining that "we're going to have a population which will peak and come down again." Technology and natural resources would be unable to support a world population double that of the present one. The only alternative is to lower the birth rate below the death rate.

"I have an idea which I have not seen proposed by anyone but me," Asimov elaborated. "We have to see that women have better things to do than have babies. Men have better things to do than have babies. My suggestion is that it is necessary for the ideals of women's liberation to be accepted. Women should join in all phases of the world. Automatically, the birth rate will go down."

Asimov stressed the global nature of the birth control problem and emphasized the need for some kind of world government to combat such problems. "No nation is strong anymore. Little by little, the nations of the world are going to have to get together to solve certain problems. The true terror is the nation state because its own rights supercede those of anyone else's on earth."

"We are all driving on a highway, using our own good sense and consideration to keep the world going and it's not going to work," Asimov predicted. "We're not going to last 30-35 more years without a world government."

Famous author Isacc Asimov lectured last Saturday night on "The Future of the Communal Idea," stressing the importance of solving the population problem and the creation of a world government. (photo Oettgen)

Word of Mouth

Isaac Asimov enthralled an almost filled Chapin Hall with his speculations on the future. His audience learned of the lecture through announcements in the Register, in the Record, over WCFM and by word of mouth. The large attractive posters announcing the event were ripped off the walls almost immediately after being placed there.

Economist Robert Solow was similarly effective in filling Jesup Hall Auditorium. Again, large attractive posters announcing the event were distributed throughout the campus, but most people attending probably did so on the advice of a professor or an upperclassman who recalled Solow's contributions to 1974's Convocation Panel Discussion.

How many extra people the posters attracted to these lectures is impossible to determine. Given the cost of the posters, the marginal cost of attracting those extra people was probably quite high.

Last year the Finance Committee set and the College Council endorsed a loose policy of restricting most organizations receiving Student Activities Tax funding to publicity budgets which would permit no more than 8x11 sheets of paper to supplement announcements in the campus media. The policy ran into a snag with organizations (such as ACEC, Cap and Bells, and the Dance Society) which felt they had to advertise on and off campus to attract audiences. The policy was also difficult to justify when other non-CC funded organizations were not under any advertising restrictions.

A cut in resources given to publicity and cleaning up that publicity (which amounts to several thousand dollars a year) is desirable. The College Council should again restrict publicity budgets and should consider expanding those restrictions to organizations which "must" have large amounts of publicity. Similarly, the Finance Committee should consult with the Student Housing Committee and the Provost on the practicality of reducing the advertising budgets of Houses and totally College funded organizations.

Lecturers

William N. Lipscomb, Professor of Chemistry at Harvard University, will give two lectures on enzymatic structure. Thursday he will give a non-technical talk entitled, "How Do Enzymes Work?" at 7:30 in Room 111 of Thompson Biology Laboratory. Friday at 3:00 he will present "Structural and Chemical Studies of a Regulatory Enzyme: Aspartate Transcarbamylase" in TCL, Room 19. Lipscomb is known for his work on the structure and activity of proteins and his contributions to the theory of electronic structure.

Craft Fair

The annual Green Mountain Craft Fair will be held at the Washington County Fairgrounds, N.Y. Rte. 29, 13 miles east of Saratoga on October 8, 9, 10 and 11. Craft professionals will give demonstrations in pottery, weaving, and woodworking. Besides the exhibitions, the fair offers folk music concerts every afternoon and ethnic foods. It runs from 10 to 6 daily rain or shine; admission is $1.

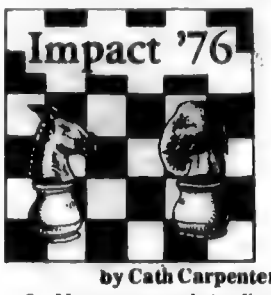
Five-College Area

Guy Van Dusen will present ragtime and finger picking Friday at the Brink, Mount Holyoke, 8:30 ($1).

Saturday and Sunday the Five Colleges will take a look at sexism in a "Conference on Bio-Psychological Factors Influencing Sex-Role Related Behaviors." The sessions are from 10:00 am - 12:30 pm and 2:00-4:30 pm at Wright Hall, Smith.

Sale

The Williams Outing Club is sponsoring an equipment sale through Eastern Mountain Sports and American Youth Hostels until Friday. The sale is being held in the WOC equipment room and all 76-77 catalog equipment will be sold at 20 per cent off the list price.



News and Notes

Thursday, October 7 at 4:00 pm Dr. Lewis Kohler, an educational consultant with the Los Angeles Public School System will speak on "Leadership Development". Refreshments served. Weston Language Center.

Massachusetts ERA

by Cath Carpenter

On November 2nd the first proposal on the ballot facing Massachusetts voters will be the Equal Rights Amendment to the state constitution.

The text of this amendment follows: "Equality under the Law shall not be denied or abridged because of sex, race, color, creed or national origin."

Not to be confused with the proposed 27th amendment to the Federal constitution (which is still in the process of ratification with four additional states required by the deadline of March 1979), the state E.R.A. affects only state laws and practices.

Battleground

Massachusetts, one of the first states to ratify the federal E.R.A. in June 1972, has become an unlikely battleground in the contest for passage of this amendment. Party due to the "liberal" context of some of the ballot proposals (Gun control, returnable bottles, graduated income tax) voters have been urged by some conservative elements in the state to "vote no" on all of the proposals.

Provisions

As a state amendment the E.R.A. has no impact on the following areas: abortion, banking, private insurance, public restrooms, private education, family life, religious institutions, homosexual marriages, federal military service, and social security.

Adoption of the state E.R.A. would abolish sex-based restrictions in jobs which are still on the books in Mass. law. Such laws restrict working hours for women to 48 hours a week in certain jobs and set maximum limits on weight of objects women may lift. The amendment would allow the individual worker's ability to determine limitations imposed rather than the present sex classification. The state E.R.A. would also extend the present benefits provided to widows to the spouses of either sex and require that present inheritance homestead provisions applying to the female spouse be applied to either surviving spouse. It also requires that the same criteria be applied in sentencing male and female prisoners.

The debate

Proponents of the state E.R.A. point to its provision of a guarantee of equality of human rights under the law. They support its immediate enactment as insurance against possible discriminatory statutes, and possible federal E.R.A. failure.

Opponents claim that the E.R.A. would adversely affect family life, force women to provide half the family income and do away with the traditional protection of women.

Other states

A similar state E.R.A. was defeated in New York and New Jersey in November 1975. Among the reasons for defeat was a low proportion of voter turn-out in the New York City metropolitan area and a high turnout in the upstate area where the E.R.A. was soundly defeated. Organizations opposing the E.R.A. Promulgated the view that women would lose rights and be forced into working to support their family.

Proponents countered by tracing the alleged consequences of E.R.A. to basic misinformation about the law, and claimed that "legal equality" does not mean "sameness". Legal rights, they claimed, would not be lost by women. The E.R.A. would guarantee a woman the same rights and obligations in supporting a spouse and a family as men have. "Homemaking" would be just as valid a support as "providing".

Local and state action

In Massachusetts, the state E.R.A. passed both required joint votes of the Senate and House in 1973 and 1975. Upon final ratification by the voters in the upcoming election, it would take effect immediately.

The Massachusetts Committee for ratification of the E.R.A. is the main lobby for passage of the amendment and is supported by groups ranging from the Massachusetts Federation of Republican Women to the United Auto Workers, Common Cause, and the Massachusetts Teachers Association. Opponents of the E.R.A. are backed by the League of Housewives, John Birch Society, and the Family Preservation League, among others. Local lobby action is provided by the Northern Berkshire Community for Ratification of the Massachusetts E.R.A.

At Williams

Williams students are involved in the ratification lobby through the Williams Americans for Democratic Action (ADA) and Williams Women. Their plans include leafletting in Williamstown, on E.R.A. coffee in a local neighborhood, participation in the fall foliage parade (in North Adams), a media publicity drive on-and-off campus, and an absentee ballot drive for students who are state residents.

Party Problems

by Larry Sanders

Williams College is getting bigger. The student body has grown to 1900. Sawyer library is a relatively recent addition and a new music center will soon be built. The school is toying with the idea of converting some of its private homes to student housing. This college, however, may be getting smaller in one respect. The administration has recently put forth a tentative plan that would more strictly control the campus areas available for student entertainment.

Dean Cris Roosenraad detailed the new policy before the College Council two weeks ago. Under this policy beer mixers could not be held on carpeted or hardwood floors in the major dining areas. Roosenraad claimed that the Food Services budget could no longer shoulder the maintenance costs resulting from damages to these surfaces. According to the dean, Food Services director Ross Keller proposed this policy change after conducting a detailed audit of his department's budget over the past few years. Roosenraad did point out that the administration would be amenable to a reconsideration of this policy.

The policy change has been waived once this year for a Mission Park party. Beer was served in a non-carpeted area but the students could bring the beer onto the main carpeted surface. The students monitored themselves on this occasion and Roosenraad called this "a successful experiment". A similar situation occurred last spring in Greylock. Students were permitted to bring alcoholic beverages upstairs as long as they stayed off the dance floor with their drinks. This, too, was a success.

These two examples should be ample proof to the administration that the students can act in a responsible fashion. To the administration's credit, it has shown a willingness to work out this policy problem with the students. While working on a final solution to this policy, it should be remembered that this school is no longer the "beevo-deemo" institution that it once was.

The problem of dining hall jurisdiction also must be resolved this year. At issue is how much control should the houses have over the dining areas for party planning. Should Fitch and Prospect houses exercise a degree of control over Driscoll?; Pratt, Armstrong, and Dennett over Mission Park?; Bryant, Hopkins, Carter, and Gladden over Greylock? And, finally, where do the freshmen go?

The root of this problem is that there simply is not enough room for everyone to party on the same night. How then does the school figure out which houses get the choice party sites? A real showdown on this issue was barely averted last spring when the freshmen had reserved Greylock dining hall for Winter Carnival weekend. Three Greylock houses also wanted the hall but were beaten to the reservation punch. Who had the right to the building? The Greylock presidents argued that they should have a right of first refusal over the dining hall. The freshmen argued that they reserved it first, according to the rules. Fortunately, the situation worked itself out; the freshmen were relocated in Mission Park. But the core issue was left unresolved.

One reason for this problem was the freshmen's disdain for Baxter Hall as a party site. The upstairs is off limits to any parties, and the downstairs level was not considered appropriate. This area was used, however, very effectively by the class of '77 during their freshman year. Maybe Baxter deserves another look.

This issue must be resolved promptly. Homecoming weekend parties will soon be planned and the houses need a system of procedure. Rushing to reserve the choice sites can only cause chaos and resentment because it is a secretive process. The Housing Committee and the administration must work out a new procedure that will be designed to better accommodate the needs of the houses and not reward early planning.

NEWS BRIEFS

Reserve desk announces new policy

The Reserve Desk recently initiated a new policy requiring the presentation of student ID cards before withdrawals of books and records. Until now, students could sign for reserve materials.

Irace, the Reserve Desk librarian, said that she was sorry that she had to institute such a system, but that it was necessary due to the number of books that were not being returned.

Irace added that the new system had been implemented on behalf of the students. In previous years some students had borrowed books under assumed identities causing great inconvenience to professors and students.

300 sign curb-rebuilding petition

More than 300 people have signed a petition calling for the rebuilding of sections of the curbs near Sawyer Library to make the sidewalks easily accessible to bicycles. Senior Shirley Be and sophomore Rachel Potter, who are circulating the petition, plan to submit it this week to the Deans' office, and then to B&G.

Alcohol use

To the editor:

I was very glad to see the issue of excessive alcohol use at Williams brought up on the front page of the Sept. 28 issue of the Record. The amount of alcohol consumed on this campus is enormous and is a serious social problem that needs to be looked at. Alcoholism is a growing disease and should be recognized as such. Alcoholism and drinking problems are not reserved for Skid Row and the poor; they are present in every socio-economic level in our society. One out of every nine adult drinkers in this country has a drinking problem. It seems very hypocritical to me that while we condemn drugs and drug addiction we continue to promote as an acceptable and desirable social norm the use of another drug ... alcohol. Our parents condemn drugs, yet see nothing wrong with their sons and daughters drinking and encourage them to do so.

The social scene at Williams is geared towards and around alcohol. A person is made to feel uncomfortable at a party without a drink or a glass of beer in their hand. The latest home football weekend is a good example; Bloody Mary parties before the game, drinking during the game in various forms, and drinking all evening at parties to celebrate the victory. How often do you hear people bragging, "I was so drunk last night ..."? Alcohol at Williams is inextricably linked with being social and having a good time. This subject is one that needs to be discussed and more fully understood. The misconceptions surrounding the "problem drinker" are one of the major hindrances towards working on solutions for alcohol related problems.

In conclusion, I hope that the actions taken by several houses of reducing social dues for non-drinkers is discussed and considered by more of the houses on campus. I am not against drinking. That is not the point of this letter. The point is both that alcohol use by students needs to be more critically examined, and that considerations should be made for the non-drinker.

Sincerely,
Ken Albrecht '79

Prior consultation

To the editor:

An open letter to the Administration

We have always felt that one of the greatest advantages of Williams College is the spirit of community facilitated by the open relationship among the administration, faculty and the student body. It is for this reason that we are especially concerned with what we feel may be a potential breakdown in this relationship. An integral part of a Williams Community must be the input of its student members and we fear that in recent major decisions, such input was either not sought or not given adequate weight.

The plans for the central mail room, for example, should not have been finalized and implemented without substantial input and approval from the student body through their representatives in College Council and from the Campus organizations specifically affected by the rearrangement of Baxter Hall. It may be argued that a centralized mail system is more efficient. This is not the issue. Efficiency is bought at a price and the decision to make this trade-off cannot be a unilateral one. It appears that much of the present Food Services Policy is dominated by a similar concern for efficiency. This is specifically true of those policies affecting the purchasing of food items and services by student groups and residential units. Once again, it is most important that student opinion be involved in such decisions.

We are pleased to see that the administration has decided to consult with the student groups involved with the Baxter Hall dislocation and has shown interest in reforming the Food Service Advisory Committee. It is extremely important that the general administrative policy underlying specific decisions be made quite explicit and that it meet with student needs. What is more, such consultations must take place prior to implementations of policy decisions.

It is our hope that in this way, the Williams Community will operate openly, responsively as well as efficiently.

Headline accuracy

To the editor:

As the father of a new freshman at Williams, I suppose it is difficult to get excited over the possibility of rape at your erudite institution. However, I imagine the parents of girls would have a different reaction to your scare headlines in the September 28 issue.

Now, don't misunderstand. When you read the whole story or stories, you get a reasonable picture. My fear is that you may cause a few heart attacks before a parent gets into the fine print!

I suspect (obviously a personal opinion) that rape or drinking or bomb hoaxes are no more and no less prevalent at Williams than anywhere else in our nation. It would seem, however, that you do owe your readers (and that includes parents who are shelling out ten bucks to get your paper) a little more restraint in your headlines.

If I am typical, I eagerly open your paper when it arrives to see what is going on at Billsville. Don't ruin my whole day by such words as "panic".

I enjoy your paper. This is merely a suggestion to have the headline truly reflect the content of the story. And if there really is a panic, then you not only should but must report that fact. In other words, be honest with us ... all the way.

Thanks for listening.

Sincerely
John A. Libertine

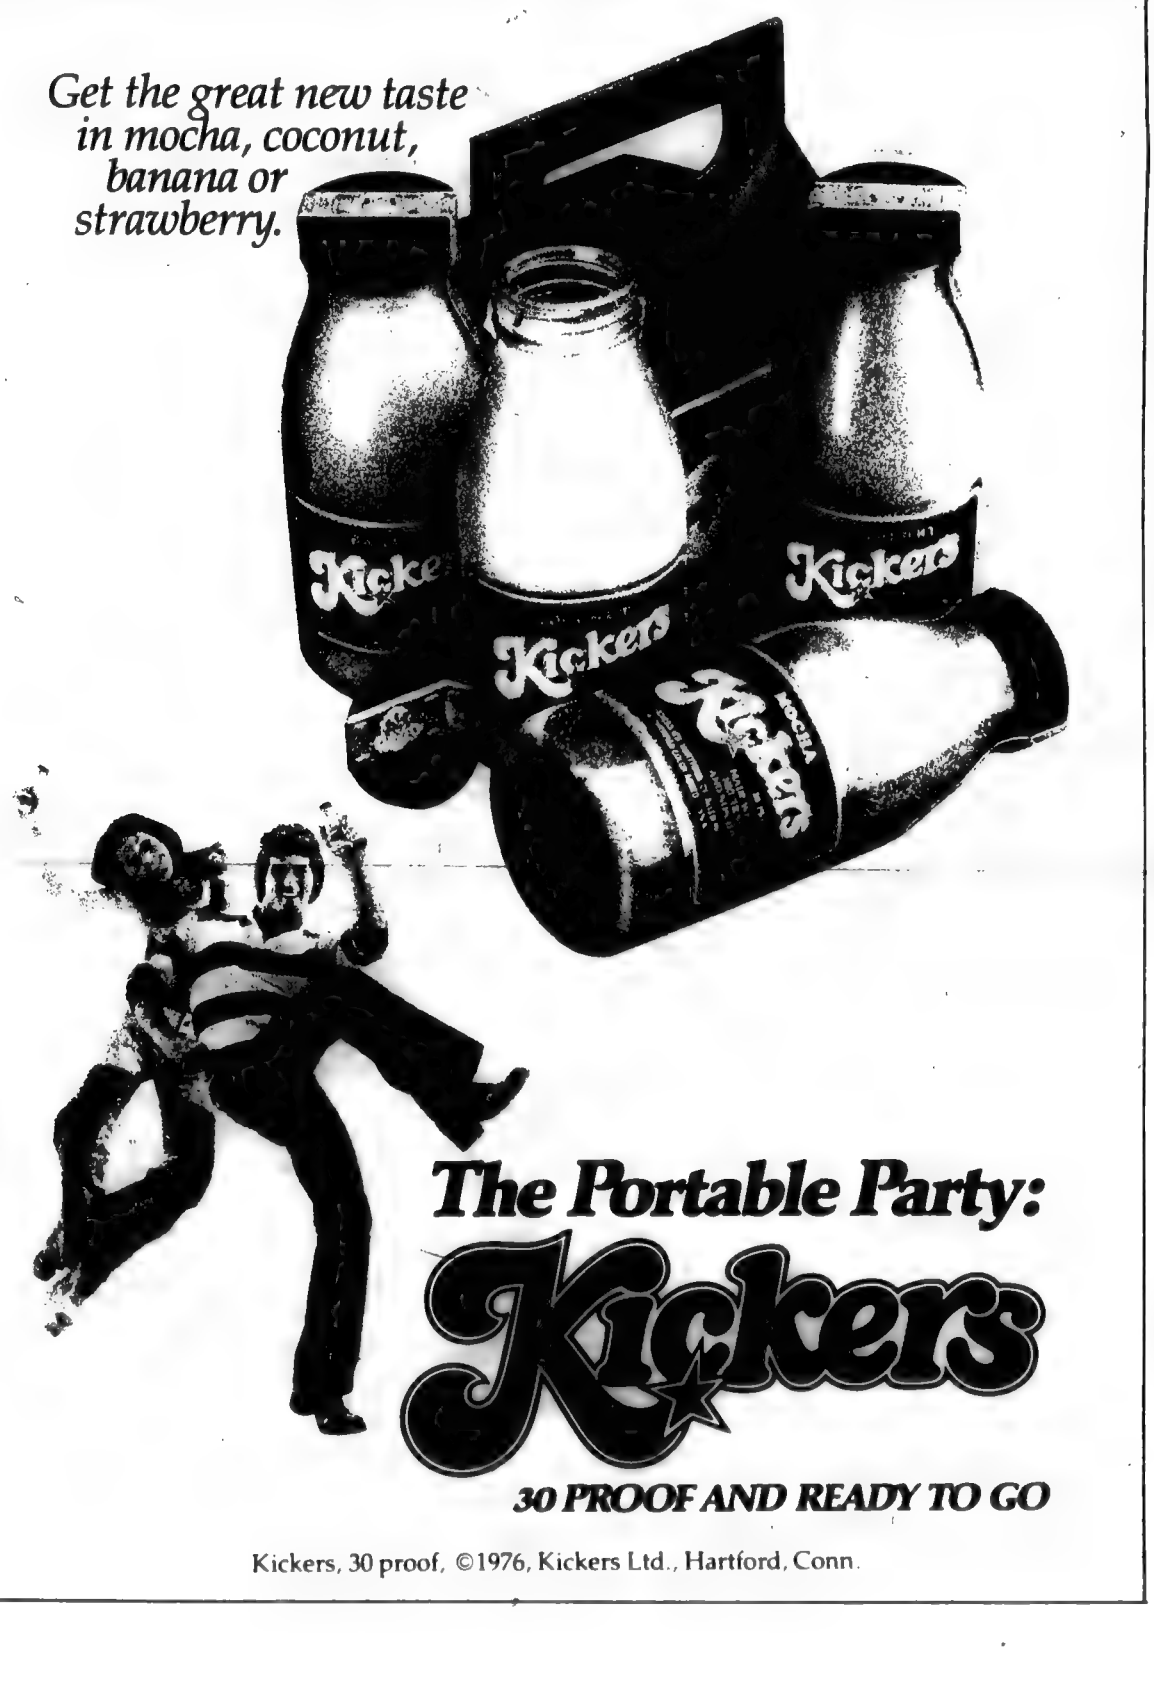
Frats defended

To the editor:

I have just read with considerable interest an article that appeared in your paper on the date of September 21 entitled "Alumni recall breakup of fraternities." It probably was one of the most one-sided articles I have ever read. It showed a complete lack of desire to really tell what fraternities really were and did.

I entered college in the fall of 1914. After a couple of months, I was pledged to Delta Kappa Epsilon. The rules of the house and that of most of the other fraternities were exceedingly strict. No liquor of any kind was allowed in the house; as a matter of fact, at one mid-winter party the seniors wouldn't allow the Captain of the football team to come into the house because it was known that he had been over at North Adams drinking beer.

Girls were not allowed above the first floor. If the marks of any sophomore or freshman got below a certain percentage, they were ordered to come up to the fraternity house every evening, five nights a week, and study under the supervision of a junior assigned to that work. We could not come to the dinner table at night without a stiff collar. Two freshmen were assigned to watch the front door and greet any guests that might arrive.



Every member of the fraternity was encouraged to go out for one or more athletic sports and other extra curriculum activities. In other words, the fraternities as were conducted before World War I were a powerhouse for good and the thought was primarily for the college and not for the fraternity. After every important function at the house, we went out and stood on the front steps and sang "The Mountains." I remember the time when a half bottle of Scotch was discovered in the closet of one of the sophomores. He was promptly barred from the house for a month and was not only not allowed to sleep there but was not allowed to eat there.

If any fraternity member got out of line in college in any way, the head of the house was promptly summoned to the Dean's office and, if the matter wasn't corrected immediately, the whole fraternity would be confined to campus for at least a month.

Naturally, the fraternity system is not a perfect system and, possibly, because of the change in the method by which fraternities were operated after World War II, something drastic should have happened. But I wanted to set the record straight that in the good old days when fraternities were run properly, we had to think and act like gentlemen for the good of the college.

Sincerely yours,
David Van Alstyne, Jr.

Arlo to play Chapman

The first popular concert of the year will be held this Friday night when Arlo Guthrie appears at the Lansing Chapman Hockey Rink. The concert, sponsored by the All College Entertainment Committee (ACEC), will begin at 9:00 p.m.

Guthrie, a 29 year old folksinger-songwriter is most famous for his hit singles "City of New Orleans" and "Alice's Restaurant;" the latter which was made into a movie that Guthrie starred in. He has 9 albums to his credit, including his latest, Amigo, which has just been released. Says Guthrie of the new album, "I'm essentially a lazy person—one album every 3 years—but I think this is one of my best." Born in Coney Island, the son of celebrated folksinger Woody Guthrie, Arlo currently resides in Stockbridge, Massachusetts.

Guthrie will play the entire two hour show with "Shenandoah", the backup band he toured with throughout the country. Students can expect a "mellowed-out evening" according to ACEC spokesman Jeff Verney. He added that "Arlo gives a very personal and relaxing concert.

H.M.S. Pinafore to be performed Friday night

Gilbert and Sullivan fans arise! Pinafore is here. The Manhattan Savoyards return after an absence of three years to present Gilbert and Sullivan's classic operetta H.M.S. Pinafore this Friday at 8:30 pm, in Chapin Hall. Admission is free to all Williams students.

The Manhattan Savoyards are the most successful American Gilbert and Sullivan touring company, although their performances are not limited solely to Gilbert and Sullivan. In its short six year history, the company has risen to a high position of popularity and critical acclaim, playing with symphony orchestras, at colleges, civic centers, and summer festivals. The group is well-known for its stylish performances emphasizing the wit and satire of the productions.

Three years ago, the Manhattan Savoyards presented The Mikado to a very appreciative Williams audience. This year, they will present Gilbert and Sullivan's most famous and best-loved operetta: H.M.S. Pinafore. The action takes place on the good ship Pinafore where never is heard a discouraging word. Well, hardly ever. It seems that Josephine, the captain's daughter, loves Ralph, a common sailor; and class snobbery keeps them apart. In fact, Captain Corcoran, Josephine's father, has been arranging a marriage between his daughter and Sir Joseph Porter, K.C.B., First Lord of the Admiralty and frustrated lawyer.

Sir Joseph is one of the most famous characters created by Gilbert and Sullivan. Ever the proper fuss-budget, he refuses to condone any impolite phrases from his men. He is a firm believer in the equality of men; it's just that he is more equal than anyone else. He is a very good family man, always attended by a long train of all his sisters and his cousins and his aunts. This First Lord of the Admiralty does have one flaw in his pristine character, however: he has never been to sea.

Also on hand is sweet, big, buxom Little Buttercup, secretly in love with the captain, who plays "I've got a secret" until the very end, when she saves the day—sort of. And who can forget nasty old Dick Deadeye, that fink of a misanthrope who makes everyone's life miserable and thereby makes his happy. All these people add color and life to the humor and satire of the production, which adds up to an evening of sheer delight.

Two of the characters in the Manhattan Savoyards' production of the Gilbert and Sullivan opera, "H.M.S. Pinafore," to be presented at 8:30 p.m. on Friday, October 8th, in Chapin Hall.

Unique pops concert wins over audience

by Valerie A. Sarantos

As Charlotte Hegyi ceremoniously lit the purple, green, and orange candles in the candelabra on the grand piano, crowds were still jamming into Thompson Memorial Chapel for Music in the Round's first-ever pops concert last Friday night. Starting on this note, the ensemble opened with a couple of light classical favorites, but modulated to some more obscure and unusually demanding works, such as P.D.Q. Bach's "Sonata for Viola, 4 Hands", and Mozart's "The Village Musicians". Both of these works, among others, revealed the troupe's incredible musical flexibility, and particularly their previously unseen non-musical talents which entertained, if not delighted, the audience.

After opening with an interesting arrangement of Strauss' "Beautiful Blue Danube" for six piece ensemble, Deborah Beardsley emerged adorned in Scottish attire for her solo of Beethoven's "Scotch and Irish Songs". At first the lovely lassie could not find her pitch as indicated by the accompanists. When she did, not a wrong note followed in the clear, bright performance of the four selections.

Julius Hegyi (Jules Mountain) had some amusing difficulties in tuning with his wife for the duet of her variations on the old English round "Let Simon's Beard Alone". The piece was an interesting blend of 20th Century and old English music.

In preparation for P.D.Q. Bach's "Sonata for Viola, 4 Hands", Charlotte Hegyi (Lotte Mountain) once again set the stage for more antics, by placing several sheets of aluminum foil on the piano strings to achieve a tinny harpsichord-like sound. For an enlightening explanation of the next spectacle, a special guest lecturer, Sir Hugo Reimann von Spitta Sonnock Sternadale-Bennett, Esq. (D. Moore), marched out sporting cap and gown clutching Peter Schickele's The Definitive Biography of P.D.Q. Bach.

After the description, the soloists emerged diligently carrying their instrument. Following much nervous fumbling, tuning, and counting, Susan St. Amour and Julius Hegyi arranged themselves around the viola so that the fingerboard rested on his left shoulder. Face to face, the two musicians sawed with demure blank expressions through four hilarious movements entitled Andanteeny, Molto Fast, Ground Round, and Allah Breve.

The second half of the program commenced with four smooth, easy-on-the-ear songs by 30's and 40's Broadway tunesmith Jerome Kern. The very moody, romantic pieces were "All the Things You Are", "Once in a Blue Moon", "The Way You Look Tonight", and "Smoke Gets in Your Eyes".

The Village Musicians then entered from all sides with their buckets, straw hats, suspenders, white socks, and amazingly, instruments. With great overwhelming enthusiasm, the well-meaning amateurs struggled through four Mozart movements with record trills, foot-stomping, a few wrong notes, and two obnoxious French Horns.

Yale hands netwomen first loss 7-2

by Evan Bash

Moving quickly from one extreme to the other as usually only New England weather can do, the women's varsity tennis team thrashed Dartmouth 9-0 last Tuesday before suffering its first loss of the year to an outstanding Yale team, 7-2 Saturday. The defeat was only the second in the last three years for the Ephs and Yale has been responsible for both. Coach Curt Tong's racketwomen now show a 5-1 season record.

Although they had fallen to Dartmouth in a spring scrimmage last year, this year's match was a completely different story as the Eph-women played the part of rude hosts in dropping only two sets in the rout. Jonnina Sadoff and Trudy tenBroeke were the only Williams singles players to really be tested and they both knew the answers, Sadoff winning 7-5, 7-5 and tenBroeke managing a 6-4, 1-6, 6-2 victory.

Number two Laura Carson settled down as her match progressed and won 7-6, 6-3, while Rebecca Chase had difficulties in the second set before scoring a 6-0, 7-5 win. Remaining undefeated in singles play was Amy Demorest with a 6-1, 6-0 victory while Barb Ernst breezed 6-1, 6-2.

Sally Kruse and Babe Kirk sandwiched one bad set in between two good ones as they won their doubles match 6-2, 2-6, 6-1. The other teams of Holly Prentice and Amy Sterling and Sherry Willcox and Sue Guttman were as strong as ever in recording 7-5, 6-4 and 6-1, 6-3 victories respectively.

Yale proved to be just too strong as they overwhelmed the Williams racketwomen for the second year in a row. When the dust had cleared in New Haven the strength of this years squad was revealed; the doubles teams. They have now lost only two matches between them against the six teams the Ephs have played. The undefeated team of Prentice and Sterling and the duo of Guttman and Willcox provided the only wins of the day for Williams as Kruse and Kirk went down in defeat.

Yale won all six singles matches and lost only five games in the process. Sadoff, Carson, Chase, tenBroeke, Demorest and Ernst all were defeated and off the court in the time it sometimes takes Bjorn Borg and Harold Solomon to play one point.

Vassar and strong Radcliffe will try to hand the rebounding Ephs losses this week. Tong and his team are hoping that only Yale knows how to do that.

Loss not tragic

When it's all looked back upon, the loss can't really be called tragic for Williams, after all, 3-0 isn't a rout and there are still six games to go. "I was very pleased at the intensity of the team," said Odell.

The one glaring weakness which showed through in the loss, was an inability to make holes for running backs and pass block for Wallace. Williams has lost center Lew Kitchin, making Tim Dunn the only experienced member of the front line. Until the necessary experience is gained, each week will be a learning session for the youthful front offensive line.

Next week represents another chance to learn under fire, as Williams faces their second strong foe in as many weeks. Trinity will invade Weston Field with a 2-0 record and revenge in mind. Two years ago, a 17-14 loss was all that marred a 7-1 Bantam season and last year, Trinity played the Ephs to a 3-3 tie. Time to bounce back, Williams.

problems with the handbook's rule since the dry-cleaning plant was not on campus. Bass and Long said they were "upset and disillusioned" when Berek used the same rule to force them to disband.

SOS posed an immediate problem, Berek said, because it profited Treet cleaners as well as Bass and Long. By supporting a private, off-campus business, SOS endangered the College's tax exemption more than most other campus agencies.

Berek pointed out that as an educational institution, the College pays no federal taxes or local property taxes on buildings used for education. Loss of such exemption would add substantially to the College's costs.

College administrators are now re-evaluating the rules governing campus agencies both to eliminate further misunderstandings and to guarantee protection of the College's tax status.

Berek said he expects the rewriting of the rules to take some time. He cited the present heavy administrative workload as one hindering factor. He also noted that the College will have to seek legal advice to insure against possible future problems.

BC wins polo tournament, Purple dunks Amherst, 14-10

by Ray Porfilio

Despite problems locating officials and goal-judges, the now annual Williams Water Polo "Pumpkin" Tournament ran its course last weekend. When the seven contests had ended—a round robin involving Amherst, BC, RPI, UNH, and Williams—and the water had calmed, BC emerged undefeated and walked off with the tournament trophy—a pumpkin.

Williams' showing, even with a tournament record of 1-2, was surprisingly strong. After dropping 9-8 and 9-4 decisions to RPI and BC respectively, Williams came back to defeat Amherst 14-10. To put these results in perspective, the water polo club, in its three year existence, has never beaten RPI. Last year the club was manhandled 22-0 and 19-1 by BC.

The loss to BC and the victory over Amherst count in league standings, making Williams 1-1 on the year.

Williams jumped to an early 4-2 lead against RPI, with passing and team play enabling four players to add a goal apiece. The same team concept extended to the other end of the pool where a switching defense ran out the half with Williams on top 7-5.

Inconsistency plagued the Ephs at the start of the second half, as play became sloppy and penalties numerous. Several RPI man-up situations inevitably led to goals, while Williams was being shut out. A shot by Brian McDermott early in the fourth session knotted the score at eight heading into the final minutes.

RPI missed on a breakaway; Williams shots were few and mostly inaccurate. The RPI goalie stopped one which was on goal, and in his haste to pass, let the ball roll down his arm into the goal behind him for an apparent Williams' goal and 9-8 lead. But both referees were looking down the pool for infractions on the RPI breakout and neither saw the occurrence. Despite vehement Williams protests, play continued with RPI scoring on a dribbler that floated into the goal. An RPI stall kept their perfect record against Williams intact.

Against BC, Williams came out pressing and determined to take more shots. This strategy paid dividends early as John Farmakis scored a minute into the game. The strategy also had its costs, as a BC 2 on 0 breakaway knotted the score only thirty seconds later.

Play was even, with the only difference provided by Eph lapses. Breakaways and a penalty shot propelled BC to 5-2 halftime lead which was never relinquished. Another breakaway and a man-up goal in the second half, gave BC more than enough insurance to wrap up the match.

The potential seen against RPI and BC was reflected in the numbers on the scoreboard against Amherst. The Ephs jumped to an 8-3 bulge before lapsing to lead by just one at the half.

The eighth Williams goal was an example of the quality play the Williams club is capable of, as alert play and crisp passing led to a score. After a save, goalie Tom McCoy landed a perfect pass in front of Mike Feltes who was breaking down the pool. Feltes in turn flipped to a wide open Phil Wild who connected for the goal.

The Ephs ran the score from 8-7 at the half, to 13-9 at the end of three, and the 14-10 final, for their first win of the 1976 campaign.

Offensively in the tourney Williams was inconsistent. Numerous opportunities were wasted with inaccurate or weak shots and too many were fired right to the goalie's strength.

One bright spot of the Eph offense was the renewed shooting of co-captain John Farmakis. He possesses an awesome shot but previously was reluctant to use it. Against BC though, Farmakis was the only Eph to score and against Amherst he had six first-half goals.

On the other hand, the defense was consistently aggressive, especially in man-down situations. Keeping opponents under 10 goals in water polo is a sign of strong defensive play and Williams accomplished this in two contests.

Congratulations, you're in medical school.

Now, you have to pay for it.

That can be a very serious problem today, especially with tuition costs climbing relentlessly. Yes, you can borrow, but by the time you enter practice those debts can be substantial.

There is an alternative—an Armed Forces Health Professions (AFHP) scholarship. Whether you're studying to be a physician or a dentist, whether your goal is to become an osteopath or an optometrist, it can pay your entire tuition and fees all through medical school. It will also provide you with a substantial monthly allowance. In other words, if you qualify, one of those scholarships can give you financial independence now, when you need it most.

When you're ready to go into practice, an AFHP scholarship will also have paved the way for you to start your career under highly favorable circumstances. You'll be a commissioned officer in the military branch of your selection. Your practice will be waiting for you. You'll step into it and know that the challenges you'll meet will be solely medical ones and professionally stimulating.

There will also be opportunity for further study. The Armed Forces have created extensive and outstanding clinical, teaching and research programs. Once you decide on a specialty, you may find yourself taking the graduate medical studies of your choice at one of their facilities.

The details are many. But if you'll send in the coupon, we'll mail you literature which will give you a good overview of the scope of our operations. Why not write? We think you'll be interested in the possibilities.

Halt unbeaten streak at 14

Middlebury frustrates Ephs, 3-0

by Tim Layden

So the fourteen-game Williams football unbeaten streak has been punctuated by the same Middlebury squad which started it, the only difference was the site. Williams has lost only two of its last fifteen games, and both of them have been at the hands of the pesty Panthers from the North.

As one looks back on the first Williams loss since a 25-20 squeaker at the hands of the Middlebury in 1974, it comes shining through that the Panthers beat Williams in the same fashion that the Ephs have been mowing down foes for several years, being opportunistic and never relieving the pressure.

Middlebury blocked a Williams punt, and scored on an error, or at least a psuedo-error, as Scott Harrington's fourth quarter quick kick went straight into the air and gave Middlebury the ball on the Williams 35. Williams, on the other hand, was playing a non-Williams game, failing to convert any of four fumble recoveries into scores and leaving Bob Odell on the wrong end of a shutout for the first time at Williams.

It was to be a frustrating afternoon overall for Williams fans and players alike. The Purple soccer team dropped a disappointing decision, to moo cow marching band took a back seat to an imaginative anti-Williams banner display at halftime and the Panther gridders clawed the Ephs. Clearly, this was Middlebury's day.

"If someone had told me that Middlebury would score only three points, I think I'd have bet some money on us," said Odell.

This first half was dominated by the Panthers, at least between the thirty-yard lines. Running backs Roy Heffernan (100 yards on 24 carries) and Jack Dobek ripped up big yardage in the early part of the contest, but the hosts were unable to move into legitimate scoring as Williams' defense, superb all day, refused to fold.

Defense outstanding

The defense played an outstanding game, said Odell, "they were really intense, flying around and hitting people. I was really proud of everybody."

Indeed, the Panther running backs, despite enjoying somewhat more success than in last year's loss, certainly suffered no less bruises. Dobek left the game with bruised ribs in the fourth quarter, while Heffernan is nursing painful ankle injuries.

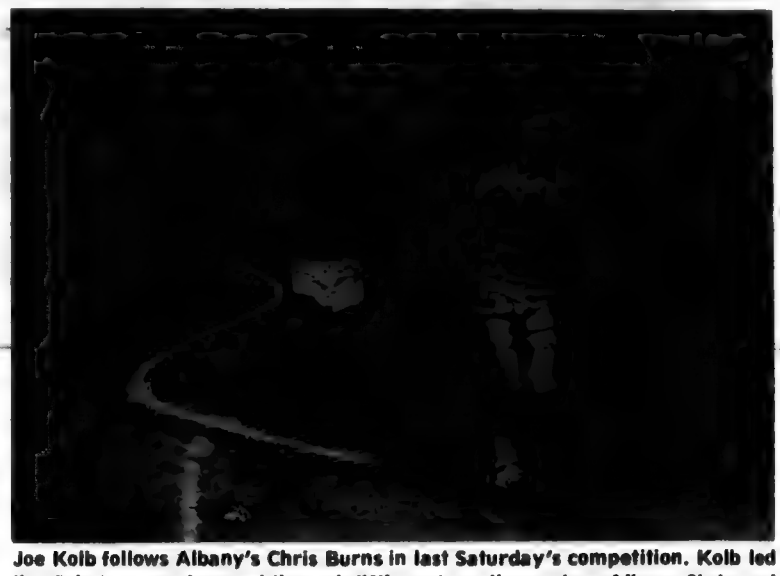
Williams cornerbacks Mark Eckert and Greg McAleenan and safties Todd Nelp and Dave Libardi "looked like linebackers" all afternoon, remarked Odell. The kamikaze quartet's hard hitting was louder than the Middlebury band for much of the day and is greatly responsible for making Heffernan and Dobek earn their yardage.

Yet, while the Williams defense was, excuse the trite phrase, bending but not breaking, the Middlebury defense was bending, leaking, and cracking but not breaking. Williams moved inside the Panther 35 five times in the loss, yet never moved inside the 20.

Two Don Wallace to Herb McCormick completions put the Ephs on the Middlebury 32 in the first quarter as did three Tom Redden runs in the second, but both threats ended in punts. Two other Williams threats ended in a fumble and missed field goal.

Ephs threaten

In the fourth quarter, Williams posed their strongest threat of the day. Weary tailback Scott Harrington broke five tackles from the Eph 26, and cut back across the field on an electrifying 54 yard scamper, putting Williams on the Panther 22. Three runs failed and Wallace and Kurt Anderson missed connections on a fake field goal, ending the drive, and Williams threats for the day.



The only points of the day followed a succession of miscues which resembled a game of hot potato. Middlebury fullback Paul Turner lost the ball on a second down carry, giving Williams an opportunity on the hosts' 21. Junior quarterback Bill Whelan, in his varsity appearance, lost the ball when hit near the sideline on an option, giving the ball back to Middlebury.

Apparently dismayed at Williams for not appreciating their hospitality and generosity, Middlebury gave Williams a second chance—with a little help from end Bob Staiger. Satiger roared in from his right defensive end spot and nailed Middlebury passer Joe Marino as he was about to release the ball. Mike Powers fell on the ball at the 20, for another Williams opportunity.

The Ephs again failed to score, and Kevin Cramer's 33 field goal attempt bounced under the crossbar. A draw play to Heffernan on the ensuing series gave Middlebury a first down, but that was all and Williams had the ball back on their own 16. Two unsuccessful runs forced a third and nine from the 17, where Harrington's quick kick squibbed off his foot, his first miss in two years on the tough kicks, and Middlebury had the ball on the Purple 35.

Dobek took a first down pass to the 15 and Heffernan tiptoed down to the four. Two running plays failed to score, and a third-down pass was dropped by a wide-open Jay Moore in the end zone bringing on Bill Porter to boot the winning 20-yard field goal.

Harriers sweep past Albany State, UVM

by Frank Carr

The varsity cross-country team travelled to Albany Saturday and chalked up two important wins over Albany State and the University of Vermont. The Ephs, now with a 5-0 record, show a string of 20 consecutive victories, dating from October 1974. The purple harriers swept second through fifth place for a 22-34 win over Albany and a 15-48 shutout of Vermont.

Frank Carr set the early pace and was the lone Williams representative in a pack of eight Albany and Vermont runners. However, after the first mile and a half, the bulk of the opposition began to fade away and Joe Kolb moved into the lead along with Chris Burns of Albany State. Kolb and Burns ran stride for stride until the three mile mark where Burns pulled away to win the race in 25:36. Kolb followed in second place with a time of 26:16 for the hilly 5 mile loop.

Meanwhile, Carr and Ken Leinbach cruised along together in third and fourth place, closely pursued by Dave Elliot of Vermont. Elliot, a high school teammate of Carr's, eventually moved into third place, but was passed by the Williams duo in the last mile. Carr finished the race in third place with a time of 26:28, and Leinbach was 5 seconds behind in fourth.

Junior Dan Sullivan battled a trio of Albany harriers throughout the latter part of the race, but managed to overcome his opponents, as he finished fifth in 26:37. Tom Schreck (8th), Steve Polasky (10th) and Chris Flavin (18th) rounded out the varsity scoring with fine efforts, followed by seniors Bert Saul in twenty-first place and Ed Bacher in twenty-fourth.

The junior varsity squad also remained undefeated, running away with a 26-33 victory over Albany State. Junior Larry Wu had a superb race, pacing the Eph contingent with a second place effort. Wu's time for the 4.25 mile course was 23:40, just seven seconds behind the individual winner from Albany. Hans Giesecke added a fine performance with a 23:46, third place finish.

The Williams J.V. swept sixth through twelfth place to clinch the win and raise their season record to 3-0. Steve St. Clair, Russ Anderson, Garrick Leonard, John Duffield, Cleve Thayer, Peter Winn and Jon Miller finished in that order, followed by Stew Read in sixteenth place.

The Williams harriers will have this whole week to train before hosting Trinity and Union this Saturday.

Yale slips past Ephwomen

by Nancy Rhein

The Williams field hockey team lost a close match to a stronger Yale team Saturday, 3-2 in New Haven. The loss dropped their season record to 2-2.

Although the Ephwomen had an excellent second half, Yale took advantage of a slow Williams start and grabbed an early 3-0 lead. Scoring on three of their five first-half shots on goals, the Bulldogs overpowered Williams with their aggressive play.

Commenting on the play of the Yale squad early in the game, Williams coach Linda Wilkins said, "They play the same game we do—Stickwork and all; but they're more physical than we are."

This ability to block out their opponent's offense, frustrated the Ephwomen's forward line, known for their scoring punch. Taking over twenty shots on goal, Williams was unable to score due to the excellent play of Yale's goalie.

Explaining that "almost the entire cage was blocked" Wilkins noted that Yale's use of their fullbacks near the goalie and the talent of the goalie herself kept the Ephwomen off the score board in the first half.

Coming on strong in the second half, Williams forwards Shailah Stewart and Sally Kraft scored on two fast break situations off long through passes. "The goals were one-on-one; it was the only way to get it past the Yale goalie," said Wilkins.

Although the coach thought the team "really had a comeback" going, the Ephwomen were unable to score again despite repeated efforts late in the half.

Remarking that "everyone was hustling and working well—really giving it all they had," Wilkins stressed the excellent play of the Williams midfield. Halfback Dawn Bedrosian had an outstanding game as did freshman Laurie Ash who shifted positions to fill in for halfback Leigh Wilson, injured during the aggressive match.

The Ephwomen are idle a week before meeting Skidmore, Monday October 11, in Saratoga.

Panthers pound kickers

by Mark Pogue

Purple dreams of 12-0 soccer were quietly laid to rest Saturday as Middlebury's Panthers soundly defeated Williams, 2-0. Hustle and aggressiveness, for the second year in a row, characterized a Middlebury attack which continually harried the Ephs and effectively disrupted their controlled passing game. The defeat left Williams at 1-1 on the 1976 trail.

"If I were Middlebury's coach, I'd say they played a magnificent game." This was coach Jeff Vennell's tribute to the bothersome Panthers, and it was hardly an overstatement. Middlebury, particularly at midfield, had the better of the play for most of the afternoon. Every head ball seemed to belong to the home favorites, and as in 1975, the Ephs simply failed to adjust to the Cats' aggressiveness. "Their pressure and our failure to react at midfield was the difference," Vennell agreed.

Williams goalie Skip Grossman did an outstanding job in holding the fort for as long as he did, but with 15:43 remaining in the first half a good shot by Panther Steve Smith got past Grossman for a 1-0 Middlebury lead. Smith's shot was Middlebury's 12th of the first half alone, whereas the Purple got off only 16 all afternoon. Freshman Panther goalie Harry Katz, in fact, handled his only difficult chance of the first half when he speared a drive by Perry Nelson in the game's opening moments.

Williams' booters have been known to start slowly and then hit their game in the second half, but at Middlebury it didn't happen. The Panthers continued to interfere with the Ephs' game in the second stanza and, as Vennell pointed out, "If you play a controlled game and you're off a little, you're off a lot."

Unable to break things open, Williams pulled a fullback with 15 minutes to play and added a fifth forward. In this set-up the Ephs began to make things unpleasantly warm for Katz, but the freshman handled good shots by Hank Osborne and Jim Hield and was never headed thereafter. Middlebury forward Matt Johnson, meanwhile, ended all doubt when his shot with 7:20 left deflected off Purple fullback Geoff Klingenstein and flew into the goal.

Difficult days lie ahead for the Ephs. Tomorrow they are sentenced to play a powerful Dartmouth team in Hanover. Could the Big Green possibly be overconfident for the game? They haven't beaten Williams in seven years. Are they really that good? Thus far in 1976 they've erased Middlebury, 4-1, and Springfield, 4-0. "We'll have our hands full," says Vennell. That's an understatement.

Trustees hear student views on housing problems

by Sally Coney

The Housing Committee briefed the trustee's Committee on Campus Life last night on the meaning of randomness in housing and challenged the validity of this concept as an overriding objective in inclusion.

Defending the principle of diversity, John A. Davis, professor at the City University of New York, said that the "administration should pull against the natural tendency to cluster together with people of common interests." Davis noted that a random housing system created an environment analogous to society. "One of the biggest problems in society," Davis said, "is seeing where your position in life places you with respect to others. Living with a diverse group of students encourages people to interact with students of varying interests and backgrounds."

Paul Boyer '77, Prospect House president, outlined the problems relating to house transfers. "The option of transfer is too great," Boyer told trustees. "It leads to problems of instability and lack of cohesion within a house."

Describing the role of alcohol in house social activities, Robert Eckleman '77, Dennett House president, said that he hoped to "put the alcohol issue in perspective." Eckleman justified the large amounts of money allocated for alcohol, saying, "Alcohol is an expensive commodity and it is frequently the only cost incurred at parties without bands."

Committee members noted that some houses offer non-drinkers reduced rates on dues.

FinCom to divide tax

by Chip Buckner

Thirty-five student groups seek a total of $110,000 from the Student Activities Tax this year. The Finance Committee currently meets four times a week preparing a recommendation for the College Council. Committee chairman Clarence Otis '77 predicts a total budget of "about" $107,000.

This year clubs submitted budgets to the committee by September 23. The committee is currently meeting representatives of these organizations trying to determine what the clubs can raise on their own, and how duplicate spending between clubs can be eliminated. The committee hopes to present its recommendations October 19, in contrast to the late November deadline set in past years. On this date the College Council will approve or disapprove of the committee decision.

This fall the Finance Committee asked the CC for a set of guidelines to assist in making decisions. Otis "wanted discussion" within the council to give the committee their feelings so that the two bodies would agree upon the recommendation. Clearcut guidelines would "avoid (the) duplication" that occurs when both the committee and then the council listen to arguments from the club.

Two controversial areas have been those of club sports and political clubs. The delegate on Club sports, especially crew and rugby, centers upon the ratio of the Student Activities Tax Income to club dues used to cover expenses. Usually, Otis said, "dues and outside sources cover at least half" of the budget.

Political clubs may not use College funds for political causes, so they have traditionally raised money on their own for this purpose. If the club receives SAT funds for bi- or non-partisan functions, then its own monies, in the amount of the SAT allocation, are freed for partisan use. In effect the activities tax money becomes political. In facing this dilemma, Otis admitted, the Committee has been "not all too consistent."

After the allocation process this fall, the committee members will meet monthly to recommend additional appropriations where needed. Each committee member will meet with the executive board of several clubs, and then represent these people in the Finance Committee.

College selectivity drops

by Dave MacGregor

Barron's Educational Services, Inc. has reduced their rating of Williams admissions selectivity from "most competitive" to "highly competitive plus" in the 1976 Barron's Guide to American Colleges and Universities, according to Carole Berglie, editor of the guide. This is the least reduction possible in the Barron's rating system, she said.

The selectivity rating is based on the median Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT) scores, percentage of applicants accepted, and the minimum high school grade average required, said Berglie. She attributed the reduced rating to the drop in median SAT scores from the class of 1978 to the class of 1979. The plus qualification was due to the "very low" percentage of applicants admitted (21.9), she added.

Berglie described Williams as "a victim of facts and figures" and said that the reduced rating is "not an indication that admissions quality has fallen." She commented that the number of colleges in the "most selective" category has declined sharply, and that "Yale just about slipped in" to the top category.

Admissions director Philip Smith said the rating was "not something we're worried about." According to Smith, "Williams is clearly among the most selective in the country," despite the rating. He also commented that SAT scores have dropped nationally as well as at Williams.

According to Associate Director of Admissions Philip G. Wick, average SAT scores for the class of 1978 were 623 verbal, 647 math; for the class of 1797 610 verbal, 534 math; for the class of 1980 626 verbal, 658 math.

Wick attributed part of the improvement in scores for the present freshman class to the decision to count senior year SAT scores of early decision candidates.

The lower rating should not harm Williams' reputation among prospective applicants "unless it persists for four or five years", according to Wick.

CC members support open meeting concept

The College Council declared its support of the open-meeting concept in an overwhelming vote Tuesday night. By a margin of 22-5 the council members accepted a resolution which called on all student and student faculty committees except the Honor Code, Discipline, Finance, and Elections Committees to conduct open meetings. Each committee was allowed the right to close meetings to discuss sensitive issues.

The resolution, proposed by Bryant House representative Stu Ginsberg, is not binding on any committee; a committee could vote to close every meeting. Council adviser George A. Goethals stated that "a real constitutional crisis would arise if the council attempted to make this resolution binding in nature."

The Council also voted to invite College Treasurer Francis Dewey to its next meeting to detail the College's plan for the Mt. Hope Farm. Goethals said that the faculty is also not adequately informed on the College's intentions for the farm and added that he believes both the students and the faculty should both play greater roles in determining the farm's future.

Treasurer Clarence Otis informed the council that the Finance Committee would wind up its budgeting sessions on Tuesday or Wednesday of next week. He then outlined his idea of how the Finance Committee would operate this year. "We see ourselves as meeting through the entire year and playing a greater role in monitoring the spending of organizational funds". Otis stated that there would be a substantial cushion at the outset of the budget year because more funds will be later allocated contingent on an organizations performance.

Gar-Wood representative Larry Mitchell again defended the CEP's closure vote. Mitchell said that "closed meetings promote the efficiency of a committee". He claimed that a reporter covering a meeting might represent the actions or attitudes of a committee. Mitchell stated that "Even if a reporter attended every meeting he may not fully understand the issues".

Course changes decrease

The institution of the new system for changing courses this semester saw slightly fewer students dropping, adding or changing courses than did so last year. Registrar George Howard reports that 53.6 per cent of the student body made at least one change in their schedules in comparison to 54.7 per cent last year.

Freshmen made the most changes, as 58.5 per cent of the class dropped or added courses during registration. 56.4 per cent of the Class of 1979 changed their schedules, as did 54.6 per cent of the seniors. Less than 44 per cent of the juniors made use of the new card system.

Howard reports that the new procedure "worked out better than the system last year." "Most students are pretty sensible about changes" added Howard, indicating that students were more prompt about turning cards in than a few members of the faculty. He went on to say that the procedure was "pretty successful. The Faculty seems to like it."

Gordon Winston of the Political Economy department disagreed as he indicated his dissatisfaction with the new system, saying that it is "less convenient because we had adjusted to the old system". Students who have preregistered for a course have the power to block others from entering it, because the professor cannot admit new students into a course until they are fairly certain of the number of students planning to remain in the class. Though many professors have an idea which students are not planning to stay in the course after the first few meetings, they cannot be absolutely sure of the size of the class until the final class lists are published. "The student has the right to take the course, but he has no obligation," stated Winston.

William DeWitt of the Biology said that the "new system doesn't make alot of difference for us", in terms of students changing lab periods. "There is still a problem of not knowing who's in your class", he added.

Eph faculty salaries rate high

by Margaret Graham

Williams College professors are among the highest paid in the country, according to a bulletin released by the American Association of University Professors (AAUP). Williams professors last year received an average compensation greater than 95 per cent of their colleagues at similar institutions. Associate and assistant professors received compensation exceeding 80 per cent of their colleagues.

The AAUP surveyed 439 institutions offering only the baccalaureate or equivalent degree compensation, as defined by the AAUP, includes salary plus countable fringe benefits such as life insurance and workmen's compensation; these fringe benefits account for 6 per cent to 20 per cent of the professor's total salary.

The bulletin lists Williams' 1975-1976 average compensation rates at $27,800 for professors, $20,400 for associates, and $15,800 for assistants. The salaries of continuing faculty rose, respectively, an average of 9.2 per cent, 9.7 per cent, and 10.9 per cent from the year before. Compensation at all institutions of Williams type increased an average of 7.2 per cent, 8.0 per cent, and 8.2 per cent. In the same time period, the estimated annual cost based on a higher living standard for a four-person family in a northeastern, non-metropolitan area rose 8.5 per cent to $21,137.

Amherst offered its faculty an average of $100 to $200 more each, though fringe benefits accounted for a slightly higher percentage of their compensation: 18 per cent - 20 per cent for them, as opposed to around 17.5 per cent here.

Skidmore's professors averaged about 5 per cent less than those at Williams; Wellesley about 5 per cent more; Vassar 5-10 per cent more.

Williams does not break down average salary rates according to sex; Dean of Faculty Neil Grabois said that this would betray the confidentiality of individual salaries here since Williams' faculty is relatively small. Among private and independent institutions surveyed, male faculty salaries exceeded women's by an average of 11.9 per cent for all professorial ranks; the average difference was 3.4 per cent within ranks. In 1974-1975, the corresponding figures were 13.3 per cent and 4.0 per cent.

A Message . . .

While the College Council's 22-5 vote to encourage open committee meetings does not force any committee to take any action, it is a significant action that cannot be overlooked. The vote can be read as opposition to decisions made behind closed doors, but it is much more than that.

The resolution recognizes that sincere and responsive representatives of the student body can make recommendations and proposals while their actions are being viewed by the public. It attacks the often ridiculous notion that ideas cannot be tossed back and forth when the public eye is watching.

The resolution also recognizes that this is the post-Watergate era, a time when secrecy cannot be justified for secrecy's sake, a time when representatives of constituencies are expected to act in view of their constituents. It comes at a time when municipal, county, state and the federal governments are trying to remove the doors which keep meetings closed and government documents secret.

The resolution recognizes the realities of committee life—that student representatives are not as responsive to student needs as they should be when (and all too often, if) they attend committee meetings. Open meetings would reduce the likelihood of these representatives remaining in total silence while faculty members control the workings of the committees.

The resolution endorses the freedom of press on the Williams College campus; it recognizes that whether by choice or by accident committee members are liable to present a distorted version of what happens at their meeting, and that more distortions are liable to occur when the press picks up these carefully worded reports.

The resolution correctly recognizes that there are times when committees must meet behind closed doors, but these times are the exceptions and not the rules.

Finally, the resolution comes at a time when students have been accused of being passive in the area of student rights. It puts students at Williams College in a position in which they have been all too infrequently in recent years, a position of demanding more rights.

On its surface, the resolution may appear to be powerless, but if student committee members see it as a mandate to propose and support the opening of their committee meetings, the resolution has some power. Faculty members cannot treat such proposals as requests from radical students, but must see them as requests which reflect the interest and desires of the student body.

The resolution places the issue of open meetings in a proper perspective: It encourages committees to ask, "What right do we have to prevent others from watching our action?" rather than "Do non-members have any exceptionally valid reasons for watching us?" It encourages discussion of the openness issue in terms of denying rights to students and faculty alike.

. . . A Response?

Monday's Committee on Educational Policy meeting will be the first major testing ground for the College Council's resolution urging most student-faculty committees to open meetings.

The CC will achieve at least a minor victory if the issue of open meetings is seriously discussed in the context of student and faculty rights to see their representatives at work.

Should the CEP vote against open meetings, it will owe the student body an explanation of why the matters currently up for discussion justify the serious deprivation of student and faculty rights.

By continuing to close meetings, the CEP and any other committee taking the same stand, would be increasing the danger that a distorted view of the committees' proceedings would reach the campus as a whole.

Committees cannot continue to operate in secrecy under the guise that closed meetings allow for freer flow of ideas. The College Council and Student Housing Committee's experiences in this regard indicate that ideas can flow smoothly with non-members present. Rather than disrupting meetings, observers and members of the press corps tend to make people think more about their statements and to move through business at a quicker pace. They certainly have not been an inhibiting factor at College Council meetings.

Much of the debate surrounding the openness issue has focused on the presence of the press, but this tends to cloud the issue.

At stake is the artificial separation of the deliberation of student-faculty committees from their source of legitimacy, the students and faculty of Williams College.

Letters: politics, sports phrases

Independent group

To the editor:

Students at Williams, because of workload, divergent interests, and the relative isolation of the school, may tend to be out of touch with political currents of the day. Furthermore, the uninspiring performance of the two candidates in the last debates can but dampen existing political interest.

In a viewpoint article in the Record of September 24, an idea was discussed—An independent group to clarify and personalize immediate issues nonpartisanly without "force-feeding" them. As a freshman who has found himself increasingly uninformed about the latest political developments, I feel that this type of group—such as the Williams Independents—would serve a need on campus.

Racial fire drill?

To the editor;

I would like to respond to Professor Bradburd's letter (Sept. 28) on the phrase "Chinese fire drill."

How such a common sports phrase can suddenly become "a variety of stereotypical racism that should have no place in society . . ." as Professor Bradburd says is beyond me. This phrase and others like it have served to brighten sports journalism for many years. To brand such common phrases as racist seems ridiculous to me. The same term appeared again on Sunday, Oct. 3rd in The Hartford Times in an article on ice hockey by Bill Winters. I think that Williams is an enlightened academic institution precisely because writers like Tim Layden have taken the time to make their work more interesting by the use of phrases like "Chinese fire drill." I commend him for this and suggest to Professor Bradburd that such established phrases are harmless and that they merely serve to make journalism more interesting.

Sincerely,
Jim Baldwin '76

(Note—Mr. Baldwin enclosed an article from The Hartford Times which included the following phrase: "The first period resembled a 'Chinese fire drill' as both clubs went with a wide-open attack, disdaining checking techniques like the plague.")

Article accuracy

To the editor;

In voting to deny the Record permission to send reporters to CEP meetings, I stated my fear that a reporter might misconstrue some of our remarks or take them out of context. Chip Buckner's article (10-1-76) only serves to confirm those fears.

I did tell him that I didn't think the committee expected such a reaction to our vote and in light of student response we might reconsider. However, I also said that we had a reason for voting as we did, and that reason was still valid, so while we might reconsider our vote I doubted it would change. That comment, taken out of context as in Buckner's article, implied that I thought it was likely that we would change our vote and that we regretted our actions. I do not believe this is true.

In addition, Buckner quoted me as saying we saw the vote as "inconsequential." I did use that word, but again in context the meaning changes. I said that we felt it was inconsequential because we didn't see it as denying anybody any information, and since there were other channels open, it was best for us to do what we felt most comfortable with.

If a Record reporter can distort remarks made in a personal interview, it seems much more likely that he will do so when he is dealing with the remarks of twelve people. Buckner was right in quoting me as saying that I would reconsider my vote. I have, and in light of such irresponsible journalism as he exhibited in Friday's Record, I feel that, should the committee reconsider, I must once again vote to deny the Record permission to cover our meetings. I thank Buckner for providing such a vivid example of the rationale behind our decision.

Sincerely,
Larry Mitchell '78

Gallery of the Absurd

Dear Readers,

I recently had an interesting experience that I'd like to share with you.

It all began one Monday evening about two weeks ago. A group of us were unwinding on the third floor presidential suite of Perry House after an arduous night at the books. We were discussing, if memory serves me correctly, the possibility of the Band and Stew Read's fire engine leading a Williams' student body parade along Route 9 into Pratt Field before the Amherst game when, suddenly, the phone rang, and she entered our lives.

Larry Stalvey, house soap chairman, was the first person to the receiver. "Dave Ross?" he asked while trying to catch his breath. "No, he's not here at the moment."

"Oh," the voice at the other end said with a touch of dejection. "Well, could you just tell him that Gallery magazine called and . . ."

Larry dropped the receiver. "Would you come again please, ma'am?"

"Sure. I'm from Gallery magazine. You've heard of it, haven't you? You know, the one with all the Pictures of GIRLS?!? I'd like to talk with David about a survey we're conducting concerning elitism. We're calling a number of college newspaper editors in the New England area asking them to write a few paragraphs about the topic for publication in Gallery's January issue. So would you have him get back to me?" Whereupon Larry proceeded to receive her New York office number, her Washington number, and then her home phone number with the instructions to have Dave call her at any time.

By now it was about 12:30 and devious little plots started hatching in my cranial cavity. I kept wondering what Parker and Gibby would have done in my place. Both, after all, had once lived on the third floor and consequently, had set a standard of behavior towards which one could only aspire. Moreover, I'd always wanted to be included in one of those magazine polls. I mean, when's the last time Playboy interviewed an Ephman for its college sex report? With trembling hands, I began to dial her number.

"Joyce?" I asked with trepidation. "Hi!" Then, taking a deep breath, I began.

"This is Doug Swift from the Amherst College Student calling. I underst—"

"Oh, hi there!" Exclaimed the voice at the other end. "Thanks so much for calling! I was just about to call you, as a matter of fact!" Then, without so much as pausing to catch her breath, she launched into a ten minute monologue describing the piece she wanted me to write for Gallery.

I was shocked. Everything was going so smoothly—too smoothly in fact. I began to wonder who was putting whom on. Her answers only made the matter more confusing.

Is Amherst an elitist school? the topic began. If so, is this elitism inherent, and does it carry forward into public life? If not, then in what ways is your school not elitist? "But you don't have to answer the second half," she quickly added, "because it doesn't apply to you. Just tell us in 35-65 lines why Amherst is elite."

I tried to question her about the philosophy behind the college forum and how it fit into a magazine like Gallery.

"Was it an attempt to boost the magazine's appeal among the college crowd and project a more intellectual image?" I wondered.

"Oh, no, nothing like that," she assured me. "It just seemed like a good idea. Gallery is a typical men's magazine with sexy pictures and good articles. Hustler is 50 cuts below us, in my opinion. In fact, I used to work for Hustler. When I went to Gallery I hid the fact, but they eventually found out and it became an asset. When I found this out I also told them that I went to a nudist camp to research a book I'm writing on pop sociology, and they loved it!"

I reluctantly informed her that I still had qualms about getting a byline in a magazine like hers, not to mention the picture she wanted me to include with the article. She quickly moved to allay all my fears. "Because you write for a meat magazine won't hurt your journalistic plans later on," she steadfastly maintained.

On that note I said good-bye, wishing her the best of luck with her book. I couldn't bring myself to write an Amherst scenario for her, but if you rush down to the News Room this January you can catch Dave's piece which, she informed us last week, was so good that "we're going to put it in the middle of the magazine rather than in the back with all the weird ads".

Good night, Joyce. Good Luck, Dave.

House presidents respond to CUL on interim report

Presidents and social chairman of Dennett, Perry, Gladden and Mark Hopkins houses met with the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) Monday to discuss their reactions to the CUL's interim report which was published last week.

Based on a survey taken last spring, the report focused on the problems of integrating women into the social life of the houses, the volatile transfer issue, the "excessive use of alcohol" and violations of students' rights and privacy.

House representatives took exception to many of the reports conclusions, especially those concerning alcohol. Robert Eckelmann, Dennett House president, reminded the CUL that alcohol appeared disproportionately in the budget due to its high cost, not its excessive use. Representatives agreed that house social atmospheres were not entirely responsible for campus alcoholism, citing other factors such as academic pressure and personnel problems, as major contributors.

Representatives also contested the report's conclusion that alcohol led to violations of privacy. The CUL report also over-estimated problems relating to integration of women into house social life, according to the house representatives.

Candidates Forum

by Garrick Leonard

Lack of enthusiastic, well-versed speakers and an excited audience proved to be the undoing of Monday night's Candidates' Forum. Envisioned as an opportunity for students to sound out peer representatives for Carter, Ford and McCarthy on their candidate's stands, the evening developed into a rehash of the first Presidential Debate, complete with vague platitudes and conflicting figures.

While each of the three representatives appeared to possess a certain degree of general knowledge about their candidate's positions on issues, time and again, when specific questions came up, the answer was "I don't know" or "I haven't seen the papers for a week." The evening's only moments of excitement came when harshly phrased questions from members of the audience threatened to provoke heated exchanges. Each such instance, however, was suppressed by the moderator and most of the audience whose main desire appeared to be to leave as quickly as possible.

Speaking for President Ford, Bruce McElvein felt that Carter's economic proposals might bring "jobs in the short run but inflation in the long run. President Ford is for long term progress." Ford, he stated further, "does not promise a pie in the sky."

Ken Bertsch, a McCarthy man, opened his remarks with an admission of defeat. "I don't think Gene McCarthy is going to win this year." Nevertheless, he urged people to vote for McCarthy as a protest against having to choose between "two of the finest examples of American mediocrity." "We expect more," he concluded. "We expect the best."

Bertsch also provided the most thoughtful comment of the evening when he remarked that he would much rather read Adam Smith than about Carter or Ford. This reporter felt that his evening would have been better spent studying Greek.

Relaxed Sewall returns home

For Richard Sewall '29, visiting professor of English for the fall semester, being at Williams has been "a kind of homecoming, a return of the native."

I spoke with Sewall in his temporary home on Forest Rd. and retain the impression of a man happy to be back in the natural beauty of Williamstown. In a plaid work shirt, he seemed relaxed and comfortable against a backdrop of mountains and changing leaves. The sometimes "renetic" pace of Yale, where Sewall taught for 42 years, seemed remote.

Sewall spoke fondly of his own Williams years and reflected upon the Williams to today. "I'm delighted with what I see here now. Williams seems better in every way." Sewall cited the bigger and more vigorous faculty as a significant improvement, as well as co-education and a more varied student composition. Though Sewall enjoyed his years as a member of Kappa Alpha, he participated in the movement to abolish fraternities and termed the current social system as "much preferable. It's a freer and more open system, allowing a greater chance for flexibility and mobility."

The contrast between Yale and Williams invites comparison, and Sewall commented on the two environments. "There is an urban—and urbane—atmosphere at Yale which I don't particularly like. Students seem more conscious of 'that job" awaiting them in New York." But Yale's setting, surrounded by graduate schools, was termed by Sewall as being "in many ways a good thing. It dramatizes real possibilities for students." He also mentioned that Yale is "a bit more diversified" in its student body make-up. Sewall went on to observe, "Although there's more happening at Yale in one week than here in a couple of months," Williams life is "simple and fine. The place invites thoughtfulness, care, and contemplation. It's quiet, well organized, and healthily intellectual."

For the approximately 135 students enrolled in Sewall's course on tragedy (English 371), the news from Sewall that the first set of papers was "better than the first I usually get at Yale" was well received. He elaborated: "In general the papers, even the poorly written ones, have been done with more care." Sewall attributed this fact to the "less hurried" atmosphere at Williams. "Students here seem more relaxed. There's more margin to their lives." He continued, "I'm delighted with the concern and attention students are giving the course."

Sewall's roots to Williamstown trace back to the time when his grandfather served as minister of the Congregational Church. In addition, his father and two brothers attended Williams. "It has been pleasant and heartwarming to be back." Looking around him he promised, "When you leave, you'll miss these mountains." As he stood in the driveway, a small figure beneath the overhanging maples, I began to think that maybe you can go home again.

Purple yachters get 'way on'

by Bruce Doblin

After a five year period of landlocked oblivion, The Williams College Yacht Club has begun its reorganization this fall with high hopes and a good wind behind it. Over forty people were present at the first club meeting and interest in the club will be gaining momentum throughout the year.

Prof. Carl Van Duyne, the faculty advisor, was pleased and surprised by this turnout. As he explained to the sailors, Williams College was one of the original charter members of the New England Intercollegiate Sailing Association, which was formed in the early 1930's. A recent letter from the Association stated their "delight to hear of the renewed interest of the Williams club." Harold Brown, acting secretary of the NESA, suggested in the letter that he will favor reinstatement of the Williams Yacht Club as a Regular Member and allow the school to avoid the usual required membership steps. "This move would be in recognition of Williams' role in college sailing since its inception," he added.

Williams had previously been known for its active and successful sailing teams. As an "old guard" on the New England Intercollegiate Association, Williams sailed against about thirty other schools in the East, including Harvard, MIT, Yale, Princeton, Brown, and Middleburg. The top contenders in the league this year appear to the Tufts, Yale, and the University of Rhode Island.

The highpoint of the teams' competitive history occurred in the spring of 1959 when Williams placed first in the major spring regatta of the year with the help of Chris Smith, Class of '60. Other past members of the team include Robert Bavier who is associated with Yachting magazine and captained the Constellation which won the 1964 American Cup Races, and Robert Carrick, a renowned marine editor who is serving on the board of the International Marine Archives. Numerous other Williams' sailors have taken part in American Cup races or continued on in the area of sailing. Stanley Ogilvy, for example, is known by many as the "king of the Star Class" and designs his own hulls.

The actors rehearsing a reflective scene from the forthcoming Williams College Theatre production of Henrik Ibsen's HEDDA GABLER. This opening production of the 1976-77 season will perform at the Adams Memorial Theatre October 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th and 17th.

Gabler's torments portrayed

"It is not so much about the plight of woman in the 1890's," commented Jean-Bernard Bucky, chairman of the Theater department, about his upcoming production of Hedda Gabler. "But rather a play about one extraordinary human being's aesthetic sense and the tragic fact that she cannot control or manipulate the reality around her." Ibsen's masterful view of Hedda Gabler's torment opens this Wednesday at the AMT and will run through Sunday. Tickets are available at the AMT box office for 50c with a Williams College I.D.

The play is one of the most important of the Swedish playwright Henrik Ibsen, and is certainly one of the most powerful tragedies ever written. It is one of the few naturalistic pieces which the AMT has seen in the past few years, though even that statement in itself must be qualified. The whole play bursts the realistic. The set, designed by Richard Jeter, is simply an acting space, though accurate to the period—a parlor which fades into the void of darkness. According to Bucky, "we have found a number of moments particularly obsessed and demonic which transcend the confines of the parlor."

Bucky also stressed that although the social criticism in the play exists, his production will focus more on Hedda as the story of a human being whose fantasies and desires transcend human possibility. This interpretation tends to bring out the thematic universalities which go beyond the social period view of the piece.

"The characters in Hedda Gabler are the trolls of Ibsen's earlier epic plays in middle class clothing," continued Bucky. "The whole world therein is an extraordinarily predatory one in which people are moved by passions and instincts that tend to burst them out of bourgeois appearance. All the while Ibsen is exploring the immortal longings of mankind. So although the play takes place in a drawing room, there is also an element of the demonic—especially in the title character.

"In a realistic work such as this," Bucky concluded, "it is the actors that play the play. There is no room for much directorial tour de force. The emphasis is on the engagement of actors on stage with the creation of passionate and moving moments. The collaboration is everything, and the synthesis is the strength."

Stetson library displays Dante, exhibits Marx

An exhibition of some 42 valuable and unusual books and prints opened this week at the Chapin Library of Williams College. Objects on display on the second floor of Stetson Hall were selected from more than 200 items acquired during the past academic year.

Among items on display are 34 impressive mixed media works by artist Robert Rauschenberg created for an edition of Dante's Inferno. Other highlights of the exhibit are an illustrated Bible printed by John Baskerville, and 16 issues of the 1761 "New-York Mercury", an important newspaper from the colonial days of American history. Also on view are Karl Marx's Capital in the first English translation; Scientists Against Time by James Phinney Baxter 3rd, president of Williams from 1937 to 1961, and an 18th century edition of the works of Josephus, with three engraved plates by William Blake.

The exhibit, free and open to the public, is on view 9 a.m. to noon and 1 to 5 p.m. Mondays through Fridays. It will remain on display through Oct. 22.

Dine at Williams

Lawrence hosts famed artist

by Mitchell Portnoy

It should come as no surprise for Record readers to learn that currently on exhibition at the Williams College Museum of Art (in Lawrence Hall) is a major retrospective by one of the foremost living American artists. At present, it seems, the only events that occur on this campus that ever make the typerooms of the New York Times are football victories, alumni weddings, and art exhibitions. It will surprise many, however, to realize that they have perhaps never even heard of the world-renowned and immensely talented Jim Dine.

This sleek and large exhibition, composed of about 95 magnificient works, spreads through almost five gallery rooms in the second story of the building. It looks especially nice in the Lawrence Rotunda, which is considered by this writer to be one of the most beautiful spaces in American interior areas. The exhibition committee has also successfully coped with the lack-of-space problems in the small museum by setting up large "walls" in the center of the East and West wings, and the Blashfield Room. Without a doubt, there's a lot to see.

Jim Dine, surmounting the disadvantages of a Cincinnati hometown and schooling, arose to become a member of the Pop Artist Group, along with Johns, Warhol, and Claes Oldenburg, the creator of the much-loved and even more hated Giant Ice Bag, in the College collection. Pop Art, a movement that began more or less in the '60's, is a celebration, put-down, and expression of the American material culture. Most of Dine's subject matter is indeed quite Pop.

The theme of hand tools, for which Dine is perhaps most famous is generously and brilliantly represented in the show. One cannot help but be amazed at the monumentality and forceful classicism of his axes, sledge hammers and pliers that hold their own against the huge, Ionion columns in the rotunda. Other times, his paint brushes, hammers, screw drivers and pliers seem to be as elegant and ereet as a row of London Beefeaters. Still other times they achieve a sexuality and obscenity that could not possibly be discussed at this time or place.

Another common subject of Jim Dine is clothing. The show abounds with shoes. One of his most beautiful lithographs is a huge, red bandana (appropriately labeled) that seems to sparkle, like real silk, in gleaming sunlight. Another less successful but towering work, entitled Self Portrait, is simply a colorful, strong bathrobe. Other subjects included are valentine hearts, disembodied heads and sterotypical women.

There is only "one" work of sculpture by Dine in this exhibition. It is actually composed of five separate pieces which show a brilliant metamorphosis from a common electric fan to a plant. The work, though not the most original and clearly derivative from other major artists, is beautiful in its shining media and graceful forms.

The show will remain on exhibit for about a month during the time that Dine is artist-in-residence at Williams.

Second of Griffin concerts features flute and recorder

Griffin Hall Concerts will present Marcia Brown playing flute and recorder with harpsichordists Victor Hill and Polly Mattson this Saturday at 8 p.m. Admission is free to the second concert of the yearly series.

The program includes a Telemann sonata for recorder and two harpsichords, a work for solo flute by C. P. E. Bach, a harpsichord suite of Louis Couperin commemorating the 350th anniversary of the birth of the composer, a Loeillet sonata for recorder and continuo, a sonata by J. C. Bach for harpsichord four-hands, and the D major "Methodical Sonata" for flute and harpsichord by Telemann.

Marcia Brown first appeared in Griffin Hall Concerts in 1972 and was most recently heard in the Handel's Birthday Concert in 1975. She graduated Phi Beta Kappa and with honors in music from Middlebury College in 1975. During the summers of 1974 and 1976 she studied flute at Tanglewood with James Pappoutsakis of the Boston Symphony.

Polly Mattson is a graduate of Wellesley College, where she was a student of the American composer Randall Thompson. She began harpsichord studies in 1972 with Victor Hill and moved to Williamstown a year ago, where she became director of the Junior Choir at St. John's Episcopal Church. She has appeared in two-harpsichord concerts with Victor Hill in Williamstown and in Ware.

Boucher has also had much sailing experience. Boucher is assisted by another avid sailor, Nancy Van Duyne, a freshman who was also instrumental in bringing about the club's rebirth and is serving as the secretary for the yacht club. Boucher was impressed with the number of people interested in the club and also with the experienced background of the members. He said, "I think that Williams College will be a top contender in the New England racing circuit after a few semesters of racing. Collegiate racing is a very different sort of competition than most sailors are accustomed to. The emphasis here is on tactics and not speed. Many experienced sailors find it is a completely different ball game. Past successes and racing experience do not necessarily lead to a successful collegiate career."

Boucher is extremely optimistic about the new club and hopes that this year will serve to build a foundation for it. Lectures, movies and speakers will be used during the year to maintain interest and participation throughout the renaissance period. It is hoped that John Marshall, the noted sail designer will come to Williams and speak to the club. Boucher would like to see some of the more active alumni sailors come forward to lend support to the club during its reorganization.

Van Duyne, the faculty sponsor, also has high hopes for the team this year. There is "a lot of interest, quite a bit of ability, and the chances of an active and successful team are quite high," he remarked. Van Duyne sees the club as serving a twofold purpose. First, it allows a team to participate in intercollegiate racing, and second, it helps those students who are interested in learning how to sail on a non-competitive basis.

Van Duyne brings a lot of sailing experience to the club as an avid sailor. He raced in the individual finn class for the United States in the 1968 Olympics and placed third in the finn world competition in 1970. Once the club gains momentum, though, it will be turned over to the Commodore, and will become primarily a student run organization.

"This year should serve as an experiential year for the team," Boucher concluded, "and a testing period to determine if the reorganization of the yacht club is possible. I am quite optimistic, and I am certain that once the club achieves good standing and participates in a few races, many more will open up to us and we will be on our way."

If the team is successful, and there is sufficient interest, Boucher hopes that in the future Williams may be able to purchase their own small fleet and perhaps sponsor their own regatta here at Williams. These plans Boucher admits are long range in scope and depend upon the performance of the team in the next few years.

This year may not be smooth sailing for the newly reorganized Williams Yacht club, but they are definitely on the right course.

Council supports open meetings

Following the vote Mitchell said that the Council's action would have "some effect" on the CEP and that he would reconsider his support of closed meetings in light of that action. Mitchell stated, "I do not see this vote as a rebuke of my vote or stand on the CEP." He still maintained that Record coverage of the CEP was not wholly desirable and claimed that he has been misrepresented by the paper as further proof of his reasons for backing the closed meeting concept.

The council also accepted two Elections Committee reports, filling the vacancies on the new Food Services Committee and on the Committee for Review of the Freshman Year.

Purple rowers prepare for first race Sunday

by Michael Behrman

Have you ever wondered who the men on the steps of Chapin Hall each afternoon are? These men make up one of the least publicized and hardest working teams at Williams College. They are members of the Williams Crew.

Each day the team travels by bus to Pittsfield to get in a grueling practice of running and rowing. Their hard work has paid off over the last few years as the team has enjoyed tremendous success.

Last year the varsity lightweights (under 165 lbs.) went undefeated and placed second in last spring's prestigious Dod-Vail Regatta in Philadelphia. Returning from this same squad are coxswain Andy Sisson and seven of eight oarsmen. Captain Ramsey Stabler heads the list of returnees along with Scott Stevenson, Prentice Weathers, Dan Fox, John Reynolds, Brian Norris, and Matt Watkins. Mark Pogue, Tom Davis, and John Harney are vying for the final spot.

The heavyweight crew also looks strong and is a good bet to improve on last year's .500 record. Coxswain Witt McKay and captain Steve Pagnotta lead the squad, which features six of last year's eight rowers. Also back are Dave Hitchcock, Gavin Watson, John Snyder, and Mike Austin. Paul Shlanta and Stanford transfer Pete VanOot should be capable of filling the openings on the squad.

Although the heavy part of the schedule does not come until spring, the crew will have two major races this fall, The Head of the Connecticut on October 10 and the Head of the Charles on October 17. Both of these will be tough three mile races as opposed to the spring when many races are only 2000 meters.

The team is pointing to the Head of the Charles race as this will be an all-day event featuring many of the top crews in the country. The course winds along the Charles River through Boston and is not only long but also very treacherous.

freestylers Keron Walker and Chantel Cleland along with exchange distancewoman Carol-Ann Smalley allows Samuelson more flexibility in his lineup than ever before. Tonight, for instance, Pearsall will cover the Purple's one real weak spot, the breaststroke events, while Murphy fills in for her in the individual medley. This leaves the 50 backstroke for junior Barb Bonner and soph Laura Marrack.

With all their new faces and four upperclass rookies as well, "the team is much stronger in freestyle, from sprints to distance," Samuelson notes. As Morrow's injured ankle heals, his options will broaden even further.

The return of diver Mary Southworth from foreign study affords the Ephwomen both depth and experience off the one meter board for the first time ever. Southworth, who won almost every event she entered as a sophomore club team member, has able backing from frosh Betsy Shorb and exchange Laurie Norton.

The Purple get 10 days to recover from tonight's intergender match up before embarking on a string of seven meets in a month. They host Union, the second of three home pool opponents, on Oct. 18.

Transfer guidelines sought

The Housing Committee met Monday to discuss semester plans and to decide on a method for settling party planning conflicts.

Addressing general housing policy considerations in the early fall, the committee agreed to aim for a January announcement of the specific mechanics of this spring's house transfer process.

Jamie Barickman and Sally Coney, committee co-chairmen, expressed their concern about the major turnover of committee members which will occur in the second term. "We hope to have settled the transfer issue before new house presidents are elected and we lose the experience now on the committee," Barickman said.

The group discussed conflicts between the freshman class and upperclass houses over the use of major dining halls for parties, deciding that the committee would resolve such problems in the future.

aggressive newcomers and veterans. Standoff Tom Kondell and inside Jack DuPre have combined speed and size to pace the line attack, getting plenty of help from Jamie Edwards, Larry Hyde, Jim Maxwell, and Jamie Barickman. One of the line's greatest assets seems to be its depth.

Rounding out the "A" side are wingers Sam Hanchett and Byrne Kelly and fullback Joe "Dewey" Powers. The trio's flypaper hands and quickness afoot have made them threats on the squad.

Williams will attempt to move over the .500 mark Saturday morning, battling the "Olde Farts" from the alumni team. The game is slated to begin at 11:00 on Cole Field, and usually ends in plenty of time to make it to the football field in time for kickoff.

Dartmouth Green slips past soccer Ephs, 2-1

by Richard Abrams

Williams booters came off on the losing end of a tough 2-1 decision with Dartmouth, in Hanover, Wednesday afternoon. Despite playing a much stronger game then they did at Middlebury, the Ephmen saw their record slip to 1-2 for the season.

Although playing aggressive, physical ball, the kickers found their backs to the wall after they fell behind as a result of two "bad" Dartmouth goals. With 15:30 left in the first half, Dartmouth's center fullback followed up a cleared corner kick with a 35-yard volley kick that goalie Skip Grossman, screamed on the play, couldn't handle. Perhaps even more annoying was the Big Green's second tally, which came only 0:06 into the second half, catching a bewildered Williams club off guard.

However, as opposed to last Saturday's game, Williams demonstrated an ability to come back. An initial letdown following Dartmouth's second goal gave way to continued pressure on the Dartmouth defense. Finally, Peter Berra pounded home a rebound on a misplayed ball. From then on the Eph's saw all their surges thwarted by tight defensive play. Near misses by Hank Osborne and Jim Hield in the waning moments almost put a damper on Dartmouth's first soccer victory over Williams in eight years.

"The only frustration was the type of goals we gave up", coach Jeff Vennell said in retrospect. Indeed, except for a slow start by the Purple, both teams were evenly matched throughout the contest. It was the type of game that could have gone either way.

Cited for outstanding play by coach Vennell were Berra, playing in place of an injured John Friborg, Osborne, and the entire defensive unit. This seems to follow the pattern of the previous games in which the defense did a fine job, and much of the failure appeared to be due to lack of offensive pressure. The team moves the ball extremely well across the field, but remains slow in seeing openings. Too much passing and not enough shooting inside the goal area continues to be a major problem.

Then what are the booter's chances for turning the season around? Junior halfback Ted Rouse seems to think that "it was a vast improvement over Middlebury, and it looks like we're finally rolling". Hopefully, the worst has passed, because Williams faces a tough Trinity squad at Cole Field on Saturday, not to mention perennial powers Harvard and Connecticut in later games. "If we play as well as we did against Dartmouth, I'm hopeful", says coach Vennell. In order to live up to their potential, the team is going to have to rely on a lot more than hope. The time to turn the season around is now. This team is far too talented to allow the opportunity for a stellar season to elude their grasp.

Questionnaire

In an effort to ascertain the female students' degree of interest in various intramural sports programs, the physical education department will distribute a questionnaire-survey to all William's women next week. The department urges students to respond seriously to the questionnaire as its results will determine the scope of the future intramural program for women at the college.

Face coed challenge

Swimmers take on Vassar in debut

by Dennis O'Shea

Litigation filed by radical feminist athletes and a threatened skin suit burning by members of the men's varsity notwithstanding, the women's varsity swim team takes on a coed squad from Vassar tonight at 7 p.m. in Muir Pool. The season debut pits the Ephwomen against a team that most likely will be almost half male. Vassar coach Jeanne Appenzeller's experiment with equal opportunity athletics results from a sudden downturn of interest in women's swimming at the Poughkeepsie, N.Y. school.

As they open their second year of varsity-level competition, Coach Carl Samuelson's Ephs seek to preserve an unblemished dual meet record that includes a 66-47 triumph over a straight women's team from Vassar in last season's opener. They buried a total of six head-on opponents, while finishing first and second in a pair of invitationals. The campaign's only real disappointment was a triangular meet loss to New England powerhouses UMass and Mount Holyoke.

With the graduation of breastroker Sue Buck and her sister Carol's decision to study abroad, and with captain Randall Morrow hobbling around on crutches, only two of last year's five big guns are sure starters tonight. On the other hand, between them sophomore returnees Marilla Pearsall and Nina Murphy accounted for 14 of 23 College record smashing performances in 1975. Pearsall currently holds all or part of seven College standards, while Murphy owns at least a share of five.

Ephs psyche up for Trinity

by Tim Layden

It's kind of like getting out of the frying pan and straight into the fire, except maybe not quite as bad. It's more like staying right in the frying pan. The Williams football team suffered its first loss in fourteen games, 3-0 to Middlebury last weekend and now face a talented, veteran Trinity team on Weston Field Saturday.

The Trinity-Williams rivalry has been a bitter one. Williams handed the Bantams a 17-14 setback two years ago, and both teams went on to go 7-1, Williams narrowly being named the top small school in New England.

Last season the Bantams suffered only two losses on the year, to Amherst and Wesleyan. The Bantams tied Williams 3-3, and robbed the Ephs of their first unbeaten-untied season.

"Trinity is definitely comparable to Middlebury," says Williams head coach Bob Odell, "and this is a pivotal game for them." The Bantams will be bringing one of the stingiest defenses in the East into Williamstown, having yielded only 240 yards in two easy wins.

The Bantams have handled Bowdoin (30-14) and Bates (28-0). Leading the Trinity defense have been a pair of hard-hitting lonebackers, senior Mike Leverone and sophomore Joe Delano. The Trinity defensive secondary has pilfered five enemy aerials, while defensive ends Rich Uluski and Don Grabowski lead the team in sacks.

As far as attacking the Trinity defense goes, Odell says that "We are getting back to basics." The Ephs offense will be without the services of center Lew Kitchin, who is out for the season, and Scott Harrington, a key halfback is questionable with a back ailment. Freshman Gus Nuzzolese has been pressed into varsity action as a result of injuries and may see action.

The rest of the Williams backfield should remain intact, with a possibility of one change up front. Tight end Kurt Anderson has reinjured his already broken thumb and Herb McCormick may be forced to move back over to the spot which he played a year ago. Tim Dunn, Brian Fales, Joe Maguire, Ken Schoetz, and Dave Maltzan round out the front line.

Odell plans to use a great deal of trapping and double-teaming up front, "to help out some of our younger guys."

Offensively, Trinity uses two quarterbacks, senior Rob Claflin and sophomore Mike Foye, neither is an exceptional thrower, but both are good leaders who get the job done.

The Bantams count on senior three-year veteran Pat Heffernan (6' 3", 215), no relation to Middlebury's Roy, to lead their offense. The bruising fullback picked up over 90 yards against the Ephs last year and will again be the man to watch. "He's a good one," says Odell.

Odell expects the Bantams to keep the ball primarily on the ground, but is leary of the deep threat, "They're very dangerous, liable to throw anything at us." Williams will open with the same defense which has been so successful for two weeks.

Co-defensive players of the week, seniors Emmett Creahan, Jim Spaulding, and Dave Libardi will head the Eph defense, which plans to keep playing its deep backs up tight to the line and dare Trinity to throw the ball.

Saturday's contest will mark the first time the Ephs have had to bounce back from a loss in nearly two years, it should be interesting. Game time is 1:30 on Weston Field with WCFM beginning coverage at 1:20.

Ruggers square record

Dwelling on the far corner of Cole Field for much of the fall has been the Williams Rugby Football club, diligently practising their own form of "organized mayhem" for several weeks and evening their season record at 1-1 in preparation for Saturday's annual alumni contest. The team rebounded from an opening game loss to Columbia with a 9-6 win over traditionally tough Albany Law last Saturday.

Pacing the Williams scrum have been hookers Bill O'Reilly and Marshall Partington, backed by the hard-working line of Dave Levy, Vic Zerbino, Charlie Davis, Jim Stuart, and Jim Hutchings.

Wing forwards John Raitt, Mike Krikorian, and Karl Webster team with sophs Clint Willis and Ken Quinn to add even greater punch to the squad.

The Williams line has been led by the hard hitting and sure passes of captain and scrum half, John Greer. Aiding Greer have been a host of

Junior tennis duet wins weekly honor

The women's tennis doubles team of junior Amy Sterling and senior Holly Prentice have been named the Record's athletes of the week. The duo presently owns the only unbeaten record on the team, which is 5-1 on the season, having lost only to powerful Yale. Sterling and Prentice were one of only two doubles teams to post wins in the Yale match and sport a 6-0 record on the season.

HONORABLE MENTION—

Jim Spaulding—Senior linebacker for the 1-1 varsity football team, Spaulding was the leading tackler on the Williams defense which kept the Ephs in the game in Saturday's tough 3-0 loss to Middlebury. For his performance, Spaulding was named one of three co-defensive players of the week.

of the fledgling women's cross-country team, she notched top honors in the Brandeis Invitational meet last Sunday.

Charles Oudin—Freshman member of the varsity fall golf team, he posted a five-over-par 77 to grab medalist honors in the Ephs easy double win over Albany St. and R.P.I.

Layden on Sports:

The Competitive Attitude

Attitude, confidence, morale, pessimism, momentum, all creatures of the mind which, to anyone who has ever participated in sports, are beasts which can wreak greater havoc on a field of competition than any safety blitz, suicide squeeze, or full-court press.

It is certainly mind-boggling to imagine the number of times a team has been beaten by their own attitude, or lack of it. Think of how often a team loses because it thinks it should lose, because it feels intimidated.

For example, to start on the lowest end of the spectrum. Remember the first time you ever faced a Little League pitcher, who was undoubtedly a foot taller than you and sported a five-o-clock shadow? Your coaches, your father, and your older brother all told you, "just keep your eye on the ball, and follow through."

Nothing to it, right? Wrong. All it took was one fastball that you not only didn't see, but didn't even dare look at for you to put one foot in the bucket and one eye on the safety on the bench. Of course, some spunky bugger would stand in and get a hit later in the game and you'd give it a try yourself and see that it was all in your head, but that's all it takes.

Remember the first time you played a contact sport, be it hockey or football or whatever against a team which looked like a bunch of Greek giants as they warmed up? Your coach told you: "Don't worry, the bigger they are the harder they fall." Fine coach, you hit 'em then. Anyway before long, you'd hit 'em, and sure enough, down they go. It was all in your head, but that's all it takes.

Here's one that applies to all sports, contact, non-contact, male, female, you name it. Trying to knock off the champ is the toughest thing of all. The champ is on top, the champ has confidence, the champ has momentum. Oh sure, everybody is gunning for you, but where would you rather be, on top or trying to get there?

To bring this all into some sort of Williams perspective, the Williams College football team has been the king of the hill of New England small college football for a couple of years now, and around every corner was a gun-slinging opponent waiting for the Ephs to "draw."

Well, last Saturday, the young, injury prone Ephs "drew" first on the Middlebury Panthers and the Panthers scored a direct hit. End of story, right—the Panthers head off into the sunset and Williams goes home to mommy with a bloody nose, having been hit back for the first time.

Not quite, the Ephs couldn't do this if they wanted to. The big bully from the other side of town is standing between Williams and wound-licking. The Ephs, no longer riding the crest of a long winning streak, no longer intimidating teams with their Purple helmets alone, face another of the season's tough foes Saturday.

Trinity College has been one of the Ephs most frustrating and frustrated opponents for the past two years. Two years ago, Trinity outgained Williams all afternoon only to have a long punt return called back and lose, 17-14. Last year Trinity hit harder than anything the Ephs faced all season on route to 7-0-1, and the result was a tie.

It could be last year the Bantams feared the likes of Perry, Palladino, Parker, etc. and that might have been the difference. Who knows, maybe it was all in their head. No such troubles for the hungry invaders from the South this year.

This year Trinity comes into the contest with a 2-0 record, sporting a pair of impressive wins and a very stubborn defense. Rumor has it the Bantams really wanted Williams last year; their loss to Williams in '74 ruined an unbeaten season. This year, the Bantams come in to Williams on top, with all kinds of returning veterans. And no doubt confident that this is the year to show Williams what its like to look up at someone rather than down at the world.

It should be very interesting to see how well the Bantams play with a little confidence. But it should be a lot more interesting to see how the Ephs respond to their first loss in 14 games and their first underdog role in centuries to someone other than Amherst.

Board expresses its opposition to frats

The Board of Trustees issued a statement Saturday stressing its "resolute opposition to efforts of fraternities to re-establish themselves among Williams undergraduates" following its quarterly meeting Saturday morning.

The statement comes in the wake of renewed attention to the existence of fraternities in the Williamstown area. Dean of the College Peter Berek had discussed at the September 15 faculty meeting the formation the Adelphic Literary Society, which he characterized as having links to the Alpha Delta Phi International fraternity. The ALS has since disbanded.

According to President John W. Chandler, the trustees had expressed concern over the continued existence of fraternity activity in the Williamstown area.

At least two fraternities, Theta Delta Chi and Kappa Alpha, maintain chapter houses in Vermont. College officials and officials of national fraternities reported that each year since the abolition of all fraternity activity on campus in 1969 alumni have contacted the College and undergraduates have contacted national fraternities with the purpose of restarting chapters on campus.

Chandler said that the trustees were leaving decisions on specific actions to be taken with regard to the continued fraternity activities up to the administration. Among recommendations made by individual members of the Board of Trustees was that some alumni be asked to contact other alumni to express the College's position on fraternities.

No specific actions have been adopted by the administration, Chandler indicated.

A rough draft of the statement adopted by the trustees was drafted by several College officials and presented to the trustees' Executive Committee. That committee made several changes in the statement, which is as much an endorsement of the residential house system as an attack on continued fraternity activity, including some suggested by members of the trustees' Committee on Campus Life as a result of that committee's meeting with House Presidents Thursday night, Chandler noted.

According to Chandler, because of time constraints the trustees were unable to devote much time to discussing questions raised by the house presidents concerning whether the present housing policies were fulfilling the trustees notions of the goals of the residential house system.

High winds blew loose a 40 foot metal strip from the roof of Sawyer Library Saturday, requiring removal by a security officer. The library also experienced a 90-minute power shortage, as did Tyler House and Mission Park. (photo Read)

Chandler holds conference on trustee action

by Chip Buckner

President John Chandler and Treasurer Francis Dewey III discussed trustee action in a press conference held in the President's office Saturday afternoon. Trustees discussed the fate of Mt. Hope Farm, Cluett Mansion, budget priorities, admissions, degrees and many other topics.

The College trustees approved recommendations to dispose of several pieces of College property. The land affected is a five-acre plot at the corner of Church and Southworth

Statement issued by Board of Trustees, 9 October 1976

Against a historical background of rising campus discontent with fraternities, the Trustees in June, 1962 concluded that Williams could best realize its potential as a residential college by providing facilities for the housing, dining, and social needs of all its students. In October, 1968, after observing that continuing fraternity activity was incompatible with the newly emerging residential house system, the Trustees requested alumni and undergraduate officers of the remaining fraternities to terminate all fraternity activities. A resolution strongly supporting the action of the Trustees was approved by the Faculty without dissent. Virtually all fraternities complied immediately with the College's request.

Following the transition to the residential house system, the College witnessed wider student participation in opportunities for a rewarding undergraduate life. The present house system has enjoyed strong support from Williams undergraduates for more than a decade, and its flexibility makes it responsive to new ideas and needs as these are perceived first-hand by responsible college committees.

The Trustees reaffirm their commitment to the College's residential house system and emphasize their resolute opposition to efforts of fraternities to re-establish themselves among Williams undergraduates, including continuing fraternity activity in and near Williamstown by small numbers of students, or indeed to any fraternity activity which hampers the effective fulfillment of the College's educational goals.

To avoid misunderstanding, we wish to make clear our support for the rights of students to form or join any of the many formal or informal groups that are appropriate to this college community and consistent with Williams' educational program. But we remind all concerned that the Regulations of the College prohibit participation by undergraduates in fraternities as a matter of educational policy and that violations will be subject to appropriate penalties.

Alpha Delta Phi confirms that ALS has disbanded

The Adelphic Literary Society (ALS), a student organization which had links to the Alpha Delta Phi International fraternity, has notified the International Headquarters of its dissolution, Robert S. Price, president of the international fraternity, confirmed in a letter to Record editor David R. Ross.

The ALS had announced its dissolution to the College community through an open letter dated September 28.

The letter from Price (which appears in full on page 2) noted that the members of ALS "had asked us to note their Society's existence, which we did, and now have asked us to note their Society's dissolution, which we did."

According to Price, the international fraternity's newsletter did not list Williams as having an active chapter. ALS was listed as an "affiliate"—a word which Price described as "lacking in precision." The Record had reported that Dean Peter Berek informed the faculty that Williams was listed as having an active chapter.

The letter also claimed that a summer meeting between College and fraternity officials was set up at the fraternity's request. A College official described this as not totally accurate.

The letter stated that the result of the College's position of fraternities "was to put the members of ALS in the stance of disloyalty to their College." "As loyal Williams men, they were and are unwilling to embarrass their College, whether it be right or wrong," the letter explained.

Price was very critical of College policy charging that "The rigid father-knows-best attitude that the College took reflects little confidence in the maturity of Williams' students."

"We regret only our inability to convince the College that, when only seven per cent of the students want to do something and 93 per cent don't, the seven per cent minority need not behave exactly as the 93 per cent majority does," Price wrote.

Town organizes in search for girl

by John Rindlaub

More determined than ever, a mixed group of 50 police, firemen, students and other volunteers gathered in the Mission Park parking lot by 10:00 a.m. yesterday to begin the fourth day's search for Cynthia Krizack. By late afternoon, still nothing had been revealed.

"Try to keep in line," Patrolman Edward J. Morin, who is in charge of coordinating the search, told his volunteers. "Look for jeans, a turtleneck and books. You've got to look for an arm or leg, otherwise you're not going to see her."

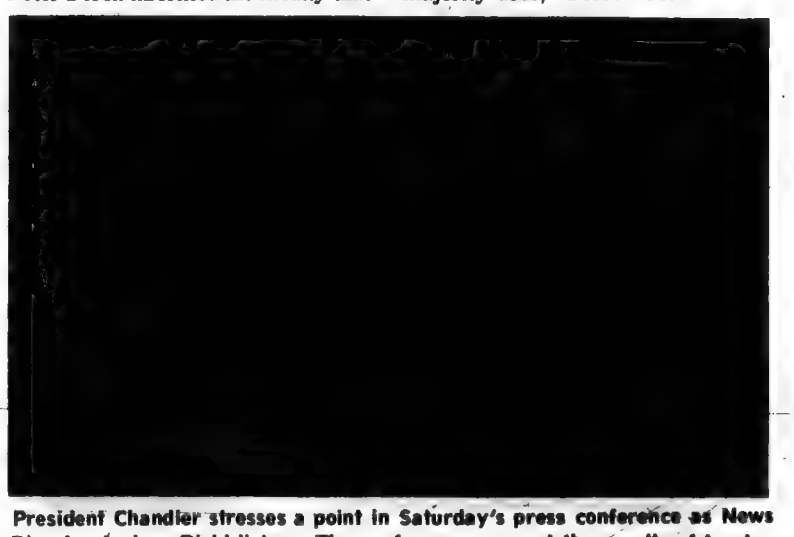
Police Chief Joseph Zoito said he still cannot explain the disappearance of the 17-year-old girl, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. David Krizack of 42 Southworth St. Yet he suspected that she may be in the one square mile surrounding her house and the Sawyer Library.

Cynthia disappeared after 8:00 p.m. Thursday on her way from her home to the library. According to Morin, "Nobody's placed her at the library. But you just don't vanish."

The hunt began with an extensive search of the College campus on Friday and Saturday by Outing Club members and other volunteers, said Walter O'Brien, head of College Security. Other searchers, operating in twos, explored what Zoito called "hot spots" in town, the places where teenagers congregate, but found nothing.

A scuba diver, Thomas Brady, Jr. of North Adams, walked Cole Field pond off Stetson Road late Friday night.

The twenty or more student volunteers yesterday morning joined members of the Williamstown Police Auxiliary under charge of George Wiles; Northern Berkshire Emergency Communications Club of Adams; and the Gale House Company under direction of Chief Edward McGowan.



Zoito said Cynthia was punctual and always told her parents of her whereabouts. "It is odd," he said, "that a girl this punctual can't be placed." It does seem unlikely that the girl, supposedly carrying Grendal by John Gardner and Young Man Luther by E. Erickson would be running away.

"Today's search will cover the same square mile," Zoito said yesterday, "but will be much more detailed." He added that although the F.B.I. was unofficially helping in the search, they cannot officially act until it is determined that she has been abducted across state lines.

O'Brien concluded late yesterday, "I doubt if they'll continue a concentrated search in the area. All the usual possibilities have been exhausted. Now police can only hope for leads."

Cynthia Krizack disappeared in Williamstown last Thursday night. She is 5'4" with blue eyes, brown hair, and was last seen wearing blue jeans. If you have any information, please call the town police at 458-5733.

CEP question sent to faculty

The CEP decided Monday afternoon, on prompting from the Steering Committee, to defer to the Faculty on the question of whether the CEP's meetings should be open or closed to the student body and whether a Record reporter should be allowed to attend.

According to the chairman of the CEP, Associate Professor George R. Goethals, there were many mixed feelings about the subject in light of the College Council's resolution asking that all student-faculty committees be made open to the student body. "I'm keeping my mind open about it and so are many others", Goethals added.

Also discussed at Monday's meeting was the possibility of a report on the disparity in grading between the different departments at Williams. Goethals said that members of the committee questioned what educational issues, if any, would be raised by such a report. A similar report was compiled in 1972 by Associate Provost David A. Booth. Goethals said the 1972 report resulted in very little change.

Jim Cohen, News Editor of the Record, spoke for 10 minutes on the need for Record coverage of CEP meetings. "Reading the minutes, then talking to committee members is an inadequate system of reporting," he said. "The reporter should have free access to information."

Letter: Alpha Delta Phi reply

To the editor:

Members of the former Adelphic Literary Society ("ALS") have sent me copies of your newspaper articles on their activities. They also sent to me a letter similar to that which we discussed in our telephone conversation last week. I want to confirm to you that they informed us that they have dissolved their society. Since there was never any formal bond between their group and us, there is no formal action for us to take. They had asked us only to note their Society's existence, which we did, and have now asked us to note their Society's dissolution, which we have.

However, there are a few inadvertent misstatements in your article that I would like to correct. First, the meeting between College officials and us was set up at our request. I can assure you that no "evasive or conflicting answers" to questions were given. Our reason for requesting the meeting was to lay out for the College the facts about ALS and the position of our Fraternity. We confirmed the facts and our position in writing in a lengthy letter to President Chandler. He, too, replied at length and in writing. If there was any vagueness in anyone's mind after that exchange, it was not due to lack of effort on our part and Dr. Chandler's part. There was never any evasiveness at any time by anyone.

Second, the Adelphic Literary Society is not the name Alpha Delta Phi used at its founding. It has used its own name since it was founded in 1832 at Hamilton College as a literary society. Third, we did not list Williams as having an active Chapter in our newsletter, XAIPE. The ALS was shown as an "affiliate"—a word lacking in precision but intended to indicate that the ALS existed but was not a Chapter.

Finally, your description of the Administration as being "worried" is rather understated, although we tried to convince the Administration that it had nothing to fear from us. We and the ALS specifically pointed out to the Administration the similarity of our literary purposes. That is why we were interested in them. We also pointed out that neither we nor the ALS had designs on Perry House (we do not have a reverter clause) and both accepted the current living and dining arrangements at Williams. Also, both our Amherst and Wesleyan Chapters are thoroughly integrated racially and religiously, and since Wesleyan University is coed, that Chapter has women members. We not only accept, we actively encourage diversity of membership.

Despite this, the Administration restated that Williams undergraduates are forbidden to belong to such an off-campus literary society. It asserted its intention to discipline any student discovered to be a member of that group. Its counsel, Palmer and Dodge in Boston, notified us that they had advised Williams that the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution did not protect a Williams student who asserted his right to associate freely with his friends off-campus, from such discipline.

The result of this position was to put the members of ALS in the stance of disloyalty to their College. If they asserted their constitutional right to free association, the College would act in a way that—win or lose—would be damaging to any institution with liberal pretentions. As loyal Williams men, they were and are unwilling to embarrass their College, whether it is right or wrong. We have no difficulty understanding that decision. In any confrontation between a College and a Fraternity, the College must come first.

We regret only our inability to convince the College that, when only 7 per cent of the students want to do something and 93 per cent don't, the 7 per cent minority need not behave exactly as the 93 per cent majority does. It seems to us that it is unnecessary that everyone march to the same drum beat.

It surprises us that an institution of Williams College's calibre is unwilling to let the idea of a non-residential literary society compete with the other ideas of social governance that exist in Williamstown. If that idea has no value, it will perish anyway, but the process of testing it will be of lasting benefit to the people involved (both for and against). The rigid father-knows-best attitude that the College took reflects little confidence in the maturity of Williams' students. Presumably, as adults, they are as capable of determining how they wish to organize their social lives as is the Administration.

Finally, descriptions of battles that took place 15 years ago, when both we and Williams were quite different, are of little relevance today. If you want to determine whether A.D. as it exists today is of value to the institutions that harbor it, we suggest you look at Amherst and Wesleyan. Our Wesleyan Chapter, for example, runs an active literary program, publishes a literary magazine, and makes a considerable educational and economic contribution to that University. It also provides a social outlet for the small percentage of Wesleyan students who want to be in a fraternity. Your peer institutions have found that their students can be trusted to make intelligent choices on their own. We expect that Williams College students, if permitted to do so, would act no less well.

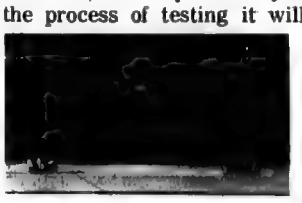
The State Senate

by David F. Grady

In this Presidential election year, the voting public is understandably focused on the race for the White House. Nevertheless, various other choices must also be made at the polling place on November 2nd, including, for Berkshire voters, the election of a State Senator.

Williamstown is in the Berkshire State Senate district, which encompasses all of Berkshire County except for a few small towns near the Connecticut border. The district is dominated by the city of Pittsfield, which casts roughly 40 per cent of the vote. It is an example of a "swing" district. That label is especially justified in the State Senate area, for Berkshire, which elected a liberal Democrat to the seat for most of the '60s and early '70s, now sends a conservative Republican to Beacon Hill (one of only seven G.O.P members in the forty-member Senate).

That incumbent Jack Fitzpatrick, is a successful businessman from Stockbridge. Fitzpatrick operates the Red Lion Inn, a well-known Berkshire institution, having made it once again an attractive establishment—and a profitable one as well. He ran for the Senate seat in 1972. He lost, but the winner was soon appointed to a judgeship, so Fitzpatrick ran again in the 1973 special election. This time he won, beating a lackluster State Representative from Pittsfield. Two key factors in his victory were 1) his success in turning the contest into a chance to, as he put it, "save the two party system in Massachusetts" by electing a Republican to the Legislature to keep the Democrats honest, and 2) the resulting high turnout of Republican voters, coupled with a poor turnout by Democrats.



Fitzpatrick has not been known as a "heavyweight" in the Senate. His defenders say this is due to his being part of a tiny minority; his critics maintain it is because he does not have a firm grasp on the basics of the legislative process. There is little in the way of specific major legislation with which Fitzpatrick has been identified. He takes the most pride in a bill which helped to set up guidelines for the development and-or preservation of the state's hill areas. The Senator is an economic conservative—his major campaign theme is the need to institute good business practices the running of the state government. This position found him in an odd alliance with Democratic Gov. Michael Dukakis during the 1975 state budget crisis, with Fitzpatrick supporting the Governor's budget cuts much more enthusiastically than many Democrats (he was careful, however, not to associate himself with the tax increases which accompanied the cutbacks). The Republican tends toward the conservative side of other topics as well; he has been a consistent supporter of efforts to reestablish the death penalty in Massachusetts, and opposes the move to ban non-returnable bottles.

Seeking to unseat Fitzpatrick this November is Democrat R. Frank Jakubowicz, a member of the Pittsfield City Council. Jakubowicz is a lawyer by profession, a former partner in one of the county's most politically prominent law firms. This is his first run for partisan political office; his partisan activities in the past being so minimal that as recently as last January one of his fellow Councilmen thought he was a Republican. The major hallmark of his council career has been his insistence on orderly and thorough deliberation on matters coming before that body. His supporters argue that he has thus helped turn what had appeared to be a political burlesque show into a more effective governmental unit. His detractors say the net effect of his efforts has been to prolong an already laborious decision-making procedure to the point where nothing gets done.

Jakubowicz's major criticisms of Fitzpatrick have been centered on what he says is the incumbent's non-record and ineffectiveness. He has accused Fitzpatrick of being more interested in forcing roll calls than in passing legislation, and of not even doing the former very well. The Democrat is also hoping to benefit from the supposed "anti-incumbent" attitude of the voters this year. To that end he has attempted to tie Fitzpatrick to the "Boston crowd", always a popular tactic for western Massachusetts politicians. This ploy has gotten Jakubowicz in a little trouble; the North Adams Transcript, accused him of "mudslinging".

The challenger has not conducted an issue-oriented campaign, though he did announce his opposition to capital punishment, unless it could be conclusively proven to be a deterrent to crime. Since the last move to reinstitute the death penalty failed by only one vote, the difference betw n the two nominees in this area i of state-wide importance. One "issue cluster" which could be important for the Democrat is education matters. Teacher organizations, are strongly anti-Fitzpatrick because of his votes against such things as local autonomy in school affairs and leave of absences for teachers who run for office. Jakubowicz, in a forthcoming position paper on education, is virtually certain to support these concepts, and to try to establish himself as the "pro-education" candidate.

Unless that occurs, it will have been a campaign of little form and less substance. Fitzpatrick is putting his hopes in his name recognition and constituent favors producing enough votes in Pittsfield and northern Berkshire to produce, in combination with his usual south county landslides, another term for him. Jakubowicz needs to win Pittsfield by a fairly large margin, and to take advantage of the incumbent's traditional weakness in the northern towns; the expected wins by Carter and Kennedy at the top of the ticket could produce coat-tails for him.

Window Pane

Aware of the Council

The College Council adjourned last Tuesday's meeting at 10:15 p.m. For the first time in two weeks, the council managed to dispose of both old and new business. President Steve Piltch posted an agenda of the meeting and the council members made a collective, conscious effort to avoid excessive debate.

So, you may ask, what's the point? It's nice to know that the council members didn't have to stay out past their 10:30 curfew, but, big deal. One early-ending meeting can't possibly have any special significance, can it? Maybe not, but consider the following.

The council has thus far voted to reconsider their irresponsible handling of the Housing Committee co-chairmanships. It has invited faculty and administration spokesmen to its meetings to report on campus safety and on the future of the Mt. Hope Farm. It has declared its support of the open-meeting concept. It has taken a welcome first step towards bringing a sense of order to its own meetings.

The point is that the college council is beginning to react to and thereby reflect student opinion on several substantative issues. This should not be a startling realization when one is talking about a representative student government, but on this campus it is. In years past, council actions rarely flowed in the mainstream of student sentiment. It was often nothing more than a stagnant pond off to the side of everything and everybody.

The major reason for this change is that the council is in the limelight as never before. Record coverage of the organization has been much more detailed this year than in years past. WCFM has conducted interviews with council members. Students are taking a critical view of their council and the council has started to react to this criticism. The campus is more aware of its college council and the council in turn is more aware of the campus. The trick now is to translate this awareness into true representation.

NEWS BRIEFS

3 Amherst students busted for dealing

The Amherst Student reported last week that three students will face the college's Judicial Board on charges of dealing marijuana door to door in campus dormitories.

College Security apprehended a junior and two sophomores September 26 after residents of two dormitories telephoned complaints to the switchboard. "Five lids of marijuana, each weighing close to one ounce, were taken from the three," the paper reported.

The students could be dismissed from the college and outside law enforcement agencies notified.

College votes Wednesday in mock election

The Williams' Republican Club and the ADA will conduct a mock Presidential election Wednesday from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. outside the Baxter mailroom. Students can vote for Presidential candidates Thomas Anderson, Peter Camejo, Jimmy Carter, Gerald Ford, Linden LaRouche, or Eugene McCarthy. Before voting, students must present their ID cards so their names can be checked against a list of Williams students.

'Gulielmensian' to be distributed in Sawyer

The 1976 Gulielmensian will be distributed in the lobby of the Sawyer Library during the next two weeks. Sophomores, juniors, and seniors may pick up their free copies from 1 to 3 p.m. Tuesday through Friday both weeks.

The 119th volume of the Gul was paid for by Student Activities Tax funds collected last year. It covers the years 1974-76, and includes team photographs for the first time in ten years.

CORRECTION

In Friday's Record article, "College selectivity drops," the class of 1979 was wrongly described as the class of 1797. The average SAT math score for the class of 1979 was listed as 534 instead of the correct 634.

Why worry about the FinCom?

by Harry J. Kelly

Ah, Autumn at Williams: football games, leaves, mud, the World Series, and, of course, the annual fiasco of the College Council's budgetary procedures. Referring to the latter I do not believe I have ever seen more well-meaning people trying to do so much good at any one time—while failing so regularly. It is not the Council's fault (that's a great line—it's never the Council's fault!) that they are saddled with so many poorly-conceived mechanisms as they are. They only voted them in, that's all. The present set-up looks good on paper, but regularly breaks down amid squabbles and petty technicalities. Look at how, the Council deals with appropriations and you will see some of the problems.

The student organizations frequently prepare inaccurate, outdated, misinformed budgets, and pass them to a FinCom desperately searching for some guidance for its decisions. After lengthy debate, the FinCom often finds itself not only preparing budget recommendations, but making policy decisions also. Thus, the FinCom may decide not only how much money a student group should get, but whether it should get any at all, or how its money should be spent, or how the group must reform itself to be funded. The Council next is presented with a series of budget recommendations, reflecting as best they can the efforts of the FinCom to put order where chaos reigns. This is a task not unlike parting the seas, and that it is done at all today is a miracle of no small note. An interesting thing occurs when these recommendations reach the Council—the Council digests the recommendations, often paying no heed to what the FinCom has labored to create. Tossing hours of effort to the whim, it decides it has appointed a Committee of Incompetents to handle its money-affairs and now assumes the task for itself. Never mind that it cannot hope to deal in such detail as the FinCom; never mind the inconsistencies bound to result, or the unfortunate clubs left to the last evening's frugality—Damn the torpor!—full speed ahead!

Recognizing that the FinCom has worked long and hard to prepare a reasonable budget, the Council ought to use great restraint in tampering with its recommendations. At any rate, let us look on the issue reasonably—can the Council, in fact, ever hope to use the same consistency as the FinCom, to take the same time and care in its debate as the FinCom has? Is it willing to negate literally months of work in a few minutes time? Can anyone who sits with us on the Council cite a case where issues of substance really superceded the hour of the evening? How do we restrain the Council from over-riding all the FinCom's efforts, then? It seems to me we ought to allow the FinCom to present its recommendation as a single package. The FinCom would present the Council with the total budget and its rationalizations for funding. After each individual request has been reviewed, the Council would then vote on the whole budget. Should it vote yes, the FinCom's recommendations would all be accepted; a no vote would throw all the budgets back to the FinCom for review.

The obvious results would be these: the Council would be discouraged to quibble or vote more money to friends' organizations; the viability of the FinCom would be preserved, as the Council would recognize its expertise, and finally, the budget could be dealt with speedily, realistically, and manageably. Should a sufficient number—say two thirds of the Council wish, an individual request may be amended or deleted. Obviously, the greatest drawback is that enough Council members may be sufficiently opposed to enough items in the FinCom's budget that they would defeat the whole measure. What an enormous error that would be—This is a great test for the Council, an opportunity to practice real legislative art—the art of compromise. I do not like the emerging budget totally—I would like to see some groups go unfunded—but I doubt that any other budget would be much better. I know the Council cannot do better in the brief time allotted to it. So I will vote for the Budget, burying my prejudices in the practical demands which must be met. You want the crew to get more money?—someone else might wish it to get less. Are you willing to abort the whole budget work to date to accommodate some small change? Do you truly think the Council can do a better job? If so, then let's get rid of the FinCom—if their recommendations are nothing more than whispers, why keep them? Organize a FinCom directly from the Council's membership, so that we can direct them more consistently. If you don't think the Council can do a better job, let the FinCom's budget stand.

The issue resolves to this: the creation of a FinCom implies divestiture of the executive financial power to the FinCom; the Council removes its right to prepare a budget, and gives it to the FinCom. Thus, the Council has no right to produce its own budget, only to approve or disapprove the Budget it is presented with. If the Council wishes to retain the executive financing power, it is at once illogical and unconstitutional to have an executive FinCom as is presently constituted. This is an issue for Stu Ginsberg and the By-Laws committee to consider, in their upcoming review of the Constitution. In the meantime, let's endorse a plan to present a single Budget, as the only fair, legal, and reasonable way of allocating our money. We owe the students—our constituents—the right to a budget guided by sound principles, careful thought and time-consuming investigation, not a budget prepared late at night, amid tests, papers, and hour exams, reflecting our personal tastes and prejudices.

Harry Kelly is a member of the Council and the FinCom, and expects to catch hell from both. Please don't take this as the FinCom's opinion.

Agricultural program to begin in January

by Jim Levinsohn

This winter, Williams College will join the back-to-basics revolution. After two years of planning, the College will offer an agriculture-oriented program under the auspices of the Center for Environmental Studies. While agriculture and the liberal arts are not traditionally associated, the program's statement of purpose contends, "that production of food, defined in terms of man's relationship to land and the supporting biosphere, is an essential part of the curriculum of a liberal arts institution."

The program is not designed to turn out farmers. Rather, Thomas Jorling, Director for the Center for Environmental Studies and Henry Art, Associate Director, have planned a program which will teach tomorrow's business leaders to think about, and analyze agricultural problems. After all, "Liberal arts colleges turn out leaders and we know it's the businessmen who make agricultural decisions and they are doing it relatively ignorantly," stated Jorling in a recent Transcript article.

Students may first come into contact with the new program in January. At this time, the program will tentatively offer at least three Winter Study Projects. According to Art, one of the projects will deal with the Hopkins Forest Museum, another with agriculture in Florida, and another with oral agricultural history. Thus far, no prerequisites have been established for these WSP's. Further related information will be available when the WSP catalog is released by the Registrar's Office.

Following the Winter Study period, a spring semester course will be offered. The course Environmental Studies 333S, is entitled "The Ecology and Energetics of Agriculture." This course will hope to teach Williams students to analyze the production of food from an ecological perspective. Energetics, according to Jorling, is "An awareness of how foodstuffs are grown, their caloric value to us, and how much work it takes, and how much fuel it requires." There are no absolute prerequisites for the course, although interested students should consult with one of the instructors.

The program will also offer a fall semester course to be initiated in 1977. The fall course, EVS 360F, will explore "historical, social and rural life values." The objective of this course will be to inculate in students an understanding of the historical dynamics of agriculture in American life. This course is designed as a complement to and substrate for the spring ecology, economics, and energetics course." Like the spring course, the fall course has no definite prerequisites yet. Students who do enroll in the Environmental Studies agriculture program will be required to take both semester courses and the Winter Study in order to complete the program.

The program will be funded by the W. K. Kellogg Foundation with $112,500. Jorling in the Transcript said, "The idea is also to develop programs other institutions can draw on. It's the first time Kellogg has funded this kind of thing. We hope it will be a beginning for other liberal arts colleges. We've gotten generally favorable responses from other institutions." The experimental program will be around for at least five years at which time another decision will be made.

Agrarian study finally comes to Williams, and the purple cow smiles, pauses, then moos happily.

Arlo Guthrie played a mixture of new songs and old favorites last Saturday night. (photo by Oettgen)

Review

Boyish Arlo rocks and serenades

by Tom Herwitz

Folding chairs had been set up partially obscurring the tennis courts below. The scoreboard above the stage asked for a 4 to 3 third period victory over Amherst. But the "home game" was not for the Williams hockey team, but rather for Berkshire based Arlo Guthrie and his back-up band Shenendoah. The crowd was full of Williamstown locals and assorted wives and friends of the band (sporting elaborate feathered hats) with endless children running amuck.

At 29, with his short curly hair, clean shaven face and country-style bell bottomed leisure suit, Guthrie looked more boyish than ever, somehow suggesting that the years had made him younger. Without a word, he started into a three song electric set featuring the classic "Will the Circle be Unbroken", and "Darkest Hour" from the just released album Amigo. On Ukelele Lady, the 1940's tune, the band backed Arlo with tight vocal harmonies which would be an important factor throughout the concert, and plenty of spirited swaying.

Moving to the piano, Guthrie played his most popular song "The City of New Orleans," and the African song "Guabi Guabi" the latter being a catchy tune about the "death by banana peel" of a great African warrior, featuring a nice a capella section.

Shenendoah finished the first half of the concert with a number of very pretty songs which exhibited slick vocal sections despite less than impressive lyrical proficiency. Although their "Grand Ole Opry" jokes went over poorly, the country tunes "I'm my own Grandpa," and "Who put the Benzadrine in Mrs. Murphey's Ovaltine" were amusing.

The second half of the concert was much more lively, though Arlo remained aloof and unexcited throughout. The sound mixing garbled the individual instruments, and an echo which could rival any bowling alley this side of North Adams added to the aural confusion. Guthrie was at his best when playing soft music alone, and singing his famous story-songs.

The concert certainly had its problems. Guthrie just couldn't get motivated to give an outstanding concert given the circumstances. The music was at times too loud or almost completely lost in the giant hall. And for most of the concert a mild tapping of the feet was the extent of the excitement. But Guthrie's unique nouveau-vaudeville style of performance is unusually entertaining and was perhaps the feature that saved the concert from failing.

Pinafore launched successfully

by Valerie A. Sarantos

As the four sailors entered prancing and singing gustily, the empty stage of Chapin Hall was magically transformed into the deck of the "H. M. S. Pinafore". The instrument of accompaniment, a solitary grand piano, sounded like a full orchestra. Thus, "Pinafore" was launched on its delightfully absorbing and entertaining voyage at the hands of an extremely capable crew, the Manhattan Savoyards.

The popular Gilbert and Sullivan operetta was wonderfully interpreted by the talented troupe, with each actor capturing and conveying to the audience the essence of the portrayed character. An able commander, the innocent but voluptuous Little Buttercup, ugly but appealing Dick Deadeye, the lovely Josephine and handsome Ralph Rackstraw, the hilarious and energetic Sir Joseph, and others were intertwined in a predictable plot of love. All were generally well-sung, but there was occasional difficulty in discerning words due to an overpowering piano accompaniment.

The indisputable highlight of the performance was during a song called "Never mind the why and wherefore", during which Sir Joseph wildly chased fair Josephine around the stage as she demurely sang. Exhausting Sir Joseph even further were the false endings of the song, until finally his only alternative was to "shoot the piano player", which he did.

"Oh joy, oh rapture unforeseen" was the concluding number of "H. M. S. Pinafore", in which all problems were resolved.

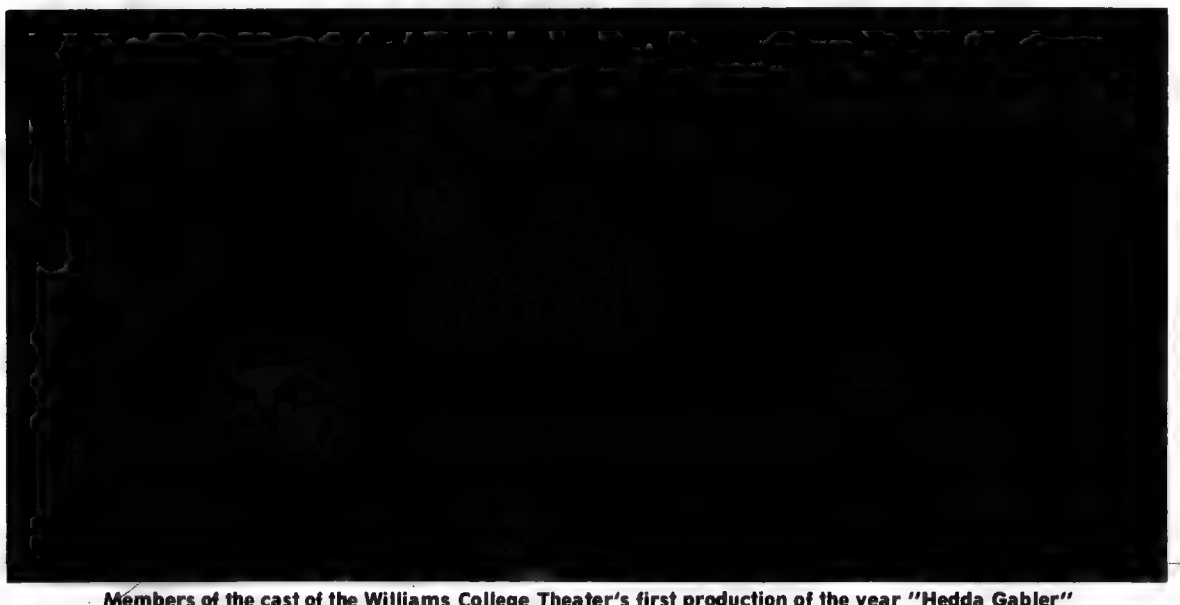
Frosh Revue promises to be a hit

by Tom Herwitz

Remember all those years in the past that we laughed—or rather groaned inside—as the freshman talent was displayed rather like week-old barbecued chicken at the corner rotisserie? That yearly occurrence which we called the Freshman Revue—but should have been the Ox-Bow Incident. Well, let the past be forgotten and ne're be seen again.

A visit last week to the Revue rehearsals affirmed that a new type of Revue was here, and made certain that this viewer would be front row center just waiting to gobble it all up.



The major reason for the change for the better is a re-evaluation of the needs and purpose of the Revue. Instead of making singers act and dancers sing, this year's revue is making the most out of each individual's talents. The whole thing is more organized, more sane, and more fun. And certainly the enormous talent of the writers, director and the freshman actors themselves is a significant factor.

"It's like the fact that students often want to be JA's because of either very good or very bad experiences with their own JA's as freshmen," explained Martha Williamson, the Revue's director. "I wanted to do this revue to correct the problems of the past, to make it fun and profitable for the actors as well as the audience."

The show is actually two shows in one. The second act is Comings and Goings, a theatre-game by Megan Terry. The first act is an audition for that play and is packed with comedy, singing, and dancing. Comings and Goings lets the dramatic abilities of the actors come into the spotlight.

"For the first few rehearsals," Williamson continued, "we had the actors improvise an audition. We let them work out their own characters."

Marc Lichtman's music is sheer delight. Snappy, smooth, and sophisticated. Lichtman has long been an important force in musical theater around this campus (with the Williams Cabaret and others) and one is now able to expect the best from him—and get it. The script is more interesting, entertaining and coherent than many of those in the past; the show has a definite unity and direction. Nina Girvetz' choreography is similarly exciting and she has the dancers to do it well.

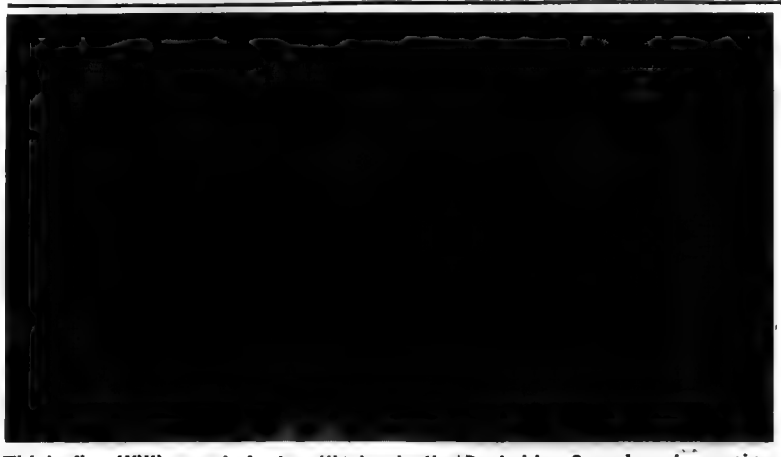
WSP catalog to appear Wednesday

More than 70 per cent of the courses listed in this year's Winter Study course catalogue are new, according to William C. Grant, chairman of the Winter Study Committee (WSC). Traditional favorites such as "Automobile Repair," "Inside Hi-Fi," and "Heating with Wood" will again appear in the catalogue to be distributed Wednesday of this week.

Recalling that some 80 students were not placed in any of their four course choices, Grant warned about courses that are "guaranteed over enrollers." He predicted that the pottery course, a plant care class, and two domestic travel courses, one to the Deerfield museum and one to the Mystic Seaport in Connecticut will be significantly over subscribed.

Grant announced that the committee made no changes in its policy toward student initiated 99's. Last year, the committee approved all but one 99 proposal, passing about 250, a figure close to that approved in 1975. "The committee is sympathetic to the students, and open to their ideas," committee member Eric Pyenson '78 said. "We can tell though when a proposal is a gut," he added.



In screening and editing course offerings, the committee "toned down the requirements of teachers who came on too strong," Pyenson said. "Some offerings by new faculty initially required three papers which is just too much work."

Alluding to faculty involvement in the program, Grant noted, "It is a great opportunity for the faculty to do things which would be impossible during the school year—to teach courses outside their normal fields." The Faculty's offerings reflect their own ideas and feedback they receive from students, according to Grant.

As in the past, alumni as well as members of the faculty will offer courses. This January, C. Eugene Webb '41, Senior Legal Counsel of the Legal Department of the World Bank, will teach a course titled, "The World Bank and Its Borrowers: Legal aspects of Development Finance."

Reaction to Winter Study varies among both students and faculty, some believing that the program is not experimental enough while others claim it is too liberal.

The Committee on Educational Policy (CEP) plans to review the Winter Study concept this year to redefine the program's goals and to decide whether or not these objectives are being fulfilled.

Thirty-five Williams students will play in the Berkshire Symphony's opening concert for the year, at 8:30 p.m. this Friday, in Chapin Hall with Julius Hegyi conducting. Here, Katie Hill '77, trumpet, trombonist Robert Staiger '79, and Andy Goodell '77 behind the tuba can be seen at rehearsal. Williams students are admitted free.

Berkshire Symphony to open season in Chapin Friday

The Berkshire Symphony, conducted by Julius Hegyi, will open its thirty-second season this Friday evening at 8:30 p.m. with a concert in Chapin Hall. Works on the program will be Lubos Fiser's Fifteen Pages After Durer's Apocalypse, Rimsky-Korsakov's Sheherazade, and the Four Last Songs by Richard Strauss. Deborah Beardsley, soprano, will be soloist in the Strauss songs.

Lubos Fiser, a contemporary Czechoslovakian composer, wrote this nine-minute work in 1965, nearly five hundred years after the birth of the German, Albrecht Durer, whose art inspired the piece. Despite the title of the composition, the music is not programmatic. The Fifteen Pages form a chain of short, condensed, and differentiated stretches of music sometimes separated from each other, sometimes linked up without interruption. All of them start out from a six-tone mode sounded in the very first picture in the form of a keyboard arpeggio.

Rimsky-Korsakov (1844-1908) began the serious study of music under Balakirev at St. Petersburg and was professor of composition at the Conservatoire there at the age of 27. In 1902, he met Stravinsky, who became his pupil; through Stravinsky, Rimsky-Korsakov's clear and brilliant orchestration had a marked effect on the orchestral writing of many contemporary composers. In 1888, he wrote much of his most mature orchestral work, including Sheherazade, which has become a familiar favorite of music lovers everywhere.

The German composer Richard Strauss was born in 1864 and died in 1949. His fertile imagination, brilliant musical and dramatic gifts, and supreme mastery of orchestra technique are displayed in these four songs written in the last year before his death. The song titles are translated into English as "Spring," "September," "Going to Sleep," and "In the Glow of Evening," and all are concerned with approaching death in various metaphors.

The Berkshire Symphony has more than seventy-five musicians who come from Vermont, Connecticut, and New York, as well as Massachusetts. More than a third are students from Williams College and several nearby high schools. There are four Friday evening concerts in Chapin Hall each year, the first and fourth of which are scheduled to coincide with Parents' Weekends at the college. After the October 15th concert, the three remaining concert dates are December 3, March 11, and April 29. Admission is free to Williams students.

Streets, and Cluett Mansion along with adjacent land. The trustees also authorized the College to explore James C. Kellogg's '37 proposal for the division and sale of portions of Mt. Hope farm, as outlined in the Record 9-28.

Dewey noted that the plan enabled the College to retain the land, while giving the town more tax revenue. He added that Kellogg might have to solve some of "the practical problems" to attract buyers. Dewey questioned Kellogg's ability to sell 50 lots without specifically defined lots, a road layout, and perhaps town approval in advance. "Sewer problems will be major," Dewey predicted, "so there is a lot of work to be done."

According to Dewey, the trustees wanted to give Kellogg the go ahead, though Chandler stressed that the College is "still exploring" various options.

The Williamstown Housing Authority has targeted the five acres at Church and Southworth Streets for low cost housing for the elderly. Dewey reported that the trustees were "not enthusiastic" about the sale, but that the College wanted to avoid a "confrontation" with the town on this point, observing that the land could have been taken by eminent domain.

With trustee approval of the action, the sale will be completed as soon as the town housing authority can raise the money, Chandler explained. The price, $5500 an acre, was an average of the estimates of three local realtors.

The budget review showed a $90,000 surplus. Chandler noted that the extra $24,000 raised by the alumni fund accounted for a substantial portion of the surplus, the remainder being spread throughout the College spending.

Chandler acknowledged the bequest of Schuyler Cole '24 part of which will endow the Class of 1924 Professorship. The trustees appointed Professor Dudley Bahlman of the History Department as the first recipient of this honor. Such endowments are intended to relieve a professor of departmental duties and allow him to choose his own course offerings.

The trustees set priorities for future spending, ranking Chapin Hall renovation highest, followed by art and athletic department improvements. A lack of money is delaying construction, Chandler explained, but architects have been engaged and plans are being drawn, so that when the money materializes the College will be ready to begin.

Lower in priority are Garfield House renovations and an increase in the financial aid endowment. Proposed changes in Garfield involve a structural addition and-or the conversion of rooms in the kitchen area. According to Buildings and Grounds, renovation of the building is preferable to destruction.

Chandler reported on Admissions policies and problems to the trustees. Enrollment this year is 40 students over the optimum, 1860 being the target figure for the opening day of classes. The housing shortage and crowded classrooms have not, he happily reported, been as serious as the administration originally anticipated. Future enrollment should fall and stabilize at an 1840 student average over the year, Chandler predicted.

In reference to the future of the Roper Center on campus, Chandler alluded to three options open to the Center's board. First, the board has considered relocating at a larger campus. Both Yale and the University of Connecticut have contacted the board toward this end.

A second alternative would keep the facility at Williams and link the center with computers at a number of schools, including the University of Massachusetts, Harvard and M.I.T. Finally the Center could remain on campus and develop ties exclusively with the University of Massachusetts. To some extent, said Chandler, we are moving toward this final alternative.

If Roper stays on campus the President added, the College will "be more generous" in its financial help. Currently support is being "phased down," but not "out".

The trustees' Degree Committee reviewed the Student-Faculty Honorary Degrees committee recommendations, amended the list, and submitted the report to the trustees. When asked if the trustees do any "armtwisting" to get Honorary Degree candidates to accept, Chandler replied "We do a lot of that." He smiled and added that he and the trustees fully exploited every "tenuous connection" to the College in persuading candidates to accept.

The session ended with a question concerning Student-Trustee relations. Though no official liaison has been appointed, Chandler said Pam Carlton '76 saw this as her duty. The trustees, he said, thought it "valuable" to pick another trustee "close in years" to the students.

"Despite the weather, the main problem with the game was the fact that it was so poorly officiated", Vennell said. This was particularly evident in the final 15 minutes of the game. Although both teams were very aggressive on the ball, they were also very physical off it, a fact which must have been overlooked by the referees, who called almost no penalties.

The entire squad played well, with the standouts being Osborne and sweeper Bruce Camelleri. Most optimistic was the play of the offense, which moved the ball exceptionally well. This was the result of the Trinity fullbacks allowing Purple halfbacks to push the ball to the inside, which is conducive to the Williams attack.

Coming up next weekend for the kickers is a journey to Maine to do battle with Bates and Bowdoin. Although Bates is weak, Bowdoin is undefeated on the season, having already beaten good teams from Amherst and Springfield. Featuring a high powered attack, they stand to be a difficult challenge for an excellent Eph defense. "I just don't know", says Coach Vennell, "but if the Booters can continue to put three or four balls into the net each game, the prospects for a good year will be tremendously enhanced."

After a scant three weeks' preparation, the women's swim team opened its dual meet season Friday with a decisive win over a coed Vassar team, 73-40.

Williams won eight of the fourteen events and swam one-two in three of them. Carol Smalley and Keron Walker accounted for four of the Purple firsts, while relay teams took two more. Smalley, an exchange student from Holyoke, edged out a male competitor in the 200 freestyle and then came back to run away with the 500 distance event in an excellent early-season time of 6:10.

Walker, a freshman, won the 50 freestyle with a time of 26.2 and the 100 butterfly in 1:06.9. Williams completed a sweep of the freestyle events as Marilla Pearsall took the 100 in 1:01.8 and the team of Morrow, Bonner, Murphy and Walker placed first in the 200 freestyle relay.

Mary Southworth displayed some fine form in the diving event, taking first from a field of five girls. Anne Youngling, a junior rookie, placed second in both her freestyle events, while Nina Murphy made a strong showing in the 100 individual medley and the 100 yd. backstroke.

Coach Carl Samuelson was evidently quite pleased with his varsity's opening meet. "The performances were excellent," he said. "This type of start is indicative of a very successful season."

Although Vassar won six events, none of its victors were female. Six men rounded out the opposing squad in the longer distances and the freestyle sprint.

Williams will take on Union in its last home meet for several weeks next Monday.

CORRECTION

Due to a typographical error, last week's article on professorial salaries stated that Amherst professors receive an average of $100 to $200 more than Williams professors. The difference is actually $1,000 to $2,000; the salaries listed in the table appearing with the article are correct.

The concert certainly had its problems. Guthrie just couldn't get motivated to give an outstanding concert given the circumstances. The music was at times too loud or almost completely lost in the giant hall. And for most of the concert a mild tapping of the feet was the extent of the excitement. But Guthrie's unique nouveau-vaudeville style of performance is unusually entertaining and was perhaps the feature that saved the concert from failing.

Pinafore launched successfully

by Valerie A. Sarantos

As the four sailors entered prancing and singing gustily, the empty stage of Chapin Hall was magically transformed into the deck of the "H. M. S. Pinafore". The instrument of accompaniment, a solitary grand piano, sounded like a full orchestra. Thus, "Pinafore" was launched on its delightfully absorbing and entertaining voyage at the hands of an extremely capable crew, the Manhattan Savoyards.

The popular Gilbert and Sullivan operetta was wonderfully interpreted by the talented troupe, with each actor capturing and conveying to the audience the essence of the portrayed character. An able commander, the innocent but voluptuous Little Buttercup, ugly but appealing Dick Deadeye, the lovely Josephine and handsome Ralph Rackstraw, the hilarious and energetic Sir Joseph, and others were intertwined in a predictable plot of love. All were generally well-sung, but there was occasional difficulty in discerning words due to an overpowering piano accompaniment.

The indisputable highlight of the performance was during a song called "Never mind the why and wherefore", during which Sir Joseph wildly chased fair Josephine around the stage as she demurely sang. Exhausting Sir Joseph even further were the false endings of the song, until finally his only alternative was to "shoot the piano player", which he did.

"Oh joy, oh rapture unforeseen" was the concluding number of "H. M. S. Pinafore", in which all problems were resolved.

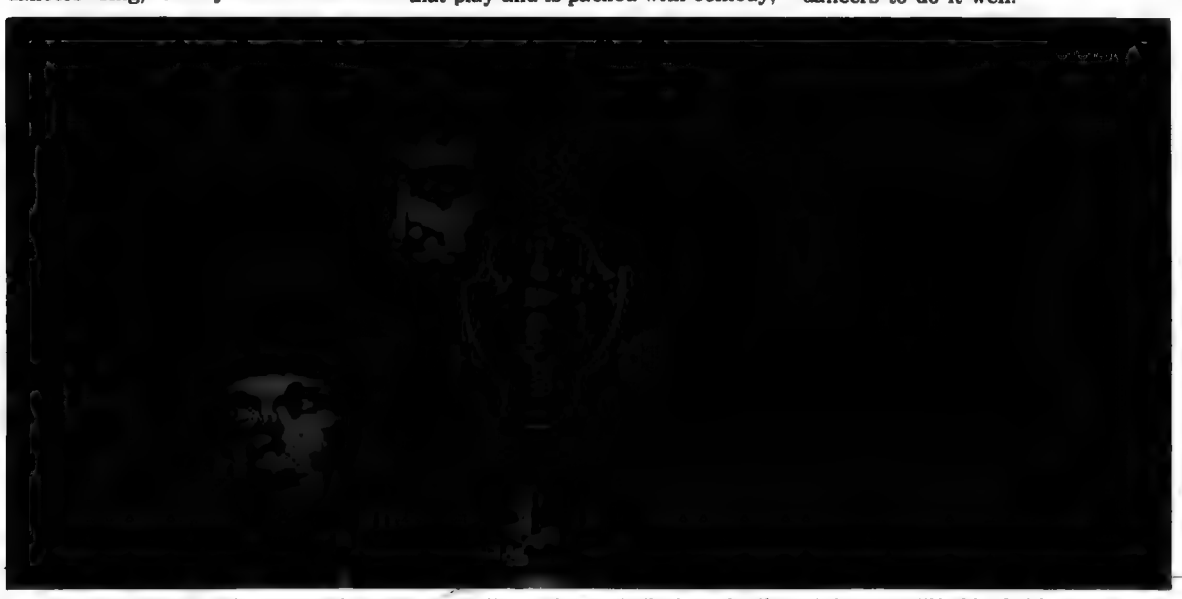
Frosh Revue promises to be a hit

by Tom Herwitz

Remember all those years in the past that we laughed—or rather groaned inside—as the freshman talent was displayed rather like week-old barbecued chicken at the corner rotisserie? That yearly occurrence which we called the Freshman Revue—but should have been the Ox-Bow Incident. Well, let the past be forgotten and ne're be seen again.

A visit last week to the Revue rehearsals affirmed that a new type of Revue was here, and made certain that this viewer would be front row center just waiting to gobble it all up.



The major reason for the change for the better is a re-evaluation of the needs and purpose of the Revue. Instead of making singers act and dancers sing, this year's revue is making the most out of each individual's talents. The whole thing is more organized, more sane, and more fun. And certainly the enormous talent of the writers, director and the freshman actors themselves is a significant factor.

"It's like the fact that students often want to be JA's because of either very good or very bad experiences with their own JA's as freshmen," explained Martha Williamson, the Revue's director. "I wanted to do this revue to correct the problems of the past, to make it fun and profitable for the actors as well as the audience."

The show is actually two shows in one. The second act is Comings and Goings, a theatre-game by Megan Terry. The first act is an audition for that play and is packed with comedy, singing, and dancing. Comings and Goings lets the dramatic abilities of the actors come into the spotlight.

"For the first few rehearsals," Williamson continued, "we had the actors improvise an audition. We let them work out their own characters."

Marc Lichtman's music is sheer delight. Snappy, smooth, and sophisticated. Lichtman has long been an important force in musical theater around this campus (with the Williams Cabaret and others) and one is now able to expect the best from him—and get it. The script is more interesting, entertaining and coherent than many of those in the past; the show has a definite unity and direction. Nina Girvetz' choreography is similarly exciting and she has the dancers to do it well.

WSP catalog to appear Wednesday

More than 70 per cent of the courses listed in this year's Winter Study course catalogue are new, according to William C. Grant, chairman of the Winter Study Committee (WSC). Traditional favorites such as "Automobile Repair," "Inside Hi-Fi," and "Heating with Wood" will again appear in the catalogue to be distributed Wednesday of this week.

Recalling that some 80 students were not placed in any of their four course choices, Grant warned about courses that are "guaranteed over enrollers." He predicted that the pottery course, a plant care class, and two domestic travel courses, one to the Deerfield museum and one to the Mystic Seaport in Connecticut will be significantly over subscribed.

Grant announced that the committee made no changes in its policy toward student initiated 99's. Last year, the committee approved all but one 99 proposal, passing about 250, a figure close to that approved in 1975. "The committee is sympathetic to the students, and open to their ideas," committee member Eric Pyenson '78 said. "We can tell though when a proposal is a gut," he added.

In screening and editing course offerings, the committee "toned down the requirements of teachers who came on too strong," Pyenson said. "Some offerings by new faculty initially required three papers which is just too much work."

Alluding to faculty involvement in the program, Grant noted, "It is a great opportunity for the faculty to do things which would be impossible during the school year—to teach courses outside their normal fields." The Faculty's offerings reflect their own ideas and feedback they receive from students, according to Grant.

As in the past, alumni as well as members of the faculty will offer courses. This January, C. Eugene Webb '41, Senior Legal Counsel of the Legal Department of the World Bank, will teach a course titled, "The World Bank and Its Borrowers: Legal aspects of Development Finance."

Reaction to Winter Study varies among both students and faculty, some believing that the program is not experimental enough while others claim it is too liberal.

The Committee on Educational Policy (CEP) plans to review the Winter Study concept this year to redefine the program's goals and to decide whether or not these objectives are being fulfilled.

Thirty-five Williams students will play in the Berkshire Symphony's opening concert for the year, at 8:30 p.m. this Friday, in Chapin Hall with Julius Hegyi conducting. Here, Katie Hill '77, trumpet, trombonist Robert Staiger '79, and Andy Goodell '77 behind the tuba can be seen at rehearsal. Williams students are admitted free.

Berkshire Symphony to open season in Chapin Friday

The Berkshire Symphony, conducted by Julius Hegyi, will open its thirty-second season this Friday evening at 8:30 p.m. with a concert in Chapin Hall. Works on the program will be Lubos Fiser's Fifteen Pages After Durer's Apocalypse, Rimsky-Korsakov's Sheherazade, and the Four Last Songs by Richard Strauss. Deborah Beardsley, soprano, will be soloist in the Strauss songs.

Lubos Fiser, a contemporary Czechoslovakian composer, wrote this nine-minute work in 1965, nearly five hundred years after the birth of the German, Albrecht Durer, whose art inspired the piece. Despite the title of the composition, the music is not programmatic. The Fifteen Pages form a chain of short, condensed, and differentiated stretches of music sometimes separated from each other, sometimes linked up without interruption. All of them start out from a six-tone mode sounded in the very first picture in the form of a keyboard arpeggio.

Rimsky-Korsakov (1844-1908) began the serious study of music under Balakirev at St. Petersburg and was professor of composition at the Conservatoire there at the age of 27. In 1902, he met Stravinsky, who became his pupil; through Stravinsky, Rimsky-Korsakov's clear and brilliant orchestration had a marked effect on the orchestral writing of many contemporary composers. In 1888, he wrote much of his most mature orchestral work, including Sheherazade, which has become a familiar favorite of music lovers everywhere.

The German composer Richard Strauss was born in 1864 and died in 1949. His fertile imagination, brilliant musical and dramatic gifts, and supreme mastery of orchestra technique are displayed in these four songs written in the last year before his death. The song titles are translated into English as "Spring," "September," "Going to Sleep," and "In the Glow of Evening," and all are concerned with approaching death in various metaphors.

The Berkshire Symphony has more than seventy-five musicians who come from Vermont, Connecticut, and New York, as well as Massachusetts. More than a third are students from Williams College and several nearby high schools. There are four Friday evening concerts in Chapin Hall each year, the first and fourth of which are scheduled to coincide with Parents' Weekends at the college. After the October 15th concert, the three remaining concert dates are December 3, March 11, and April 29. Admission is free to Williams students.

Streets, and Cluett Mansion along with adjacent land. The trustees also authorized the College to explore James C. Kellogg's '37 proposal for the division and sale of portions of Mt. Hope farm, as outlined in the Record 9-28.

Dewey noted that the plan enabled the College to retain the land, while giving the town more tax revenue. He added that Kellogg might have to solve some of "the practical problems" to attract buyers. Dewey questioned Kellogg's ability to sell 50 lots without specifically defined lots, a road layout, and perhaps town approval in advance. "Sewer problems will be major," Dewey predicted, "so there is a lot of work to be done."

According to Dewey, the trustees wanted to give Kellogg the go ahead, though Chandler stressed that the College is "still exploring" various options.

The Williamstown Housing Authority has targeted the five acres at Church and Southworth Streets for low cost housing for the elderly. Dewey reported that the trustees were "not enthusiastic" about the sale, but that the College wanted to avoid a "confrontation" with the town on this point, observing that the land could have been taken by eminent domain.

With trustee approval of the action, the sale will be completed as soon as the town housing authority can raise the money, Chandler explained. The price, $5500 an acre, was an average of the estimates of three local realtors.

The budget review showed a $90,000 surplus. Chandler noted that the extra $24,000 raised by the alumni fund accounted for a substantial portion of the surplus, the remainder being spread throughout the College spending.

Chandler acknowledged the bequest of Schuyler Cole '24 part of which will endow the Class of 1924 Professorship. The trustees appointed Professor Dudley Bahlman of the History Department as the first recipient of this honor. Such endowments are intended to relieve a professor of departmental duties and allow him to choose his own course offerings.

The trustees set priorities for future spending, ranking Chapin Hall renovation highest, followed by art and athletic department improvements. A lack of money is delaying construction, Chandler explained, but architects have been engaged and plans are being drawn, so that when the money materializes the College will be ready to begin.

Lower in priority are Garfield House renovations and an increase in the financial aid endowment. Proposed changes in Garfield involve a structural addition and-or the conversion of rooms in the kitchen area. According to Buildings and Grounds, renovation of the building is preferable to destruction.

Chandler reported on Admissions policies and problems to the trustees. Enrollment this year is 40 students over the optimum, 1860 being the target figure for the opening day of classes. The housing shortage and crowded classrooms have not, he happily reported, been as serious as the administration originally anticipated. Future enrollment should fall and stabilize at an 1840 student average over the year, Chandler predicted.

In reference to the future of the Roper Center on campus, Chandler alluded to three options open to the Center's board. First, the board has considered relocating at a larger campus. Both Yale and the University of Connecticut have contacted the board toward this end.

A second alternative would keep the facility at Williams and link the center with computers at a number of schools, including the University of Massachusetts, Harvard and M.I.T. Finally the Center could remain on campus and develop ties exclusively with the University of Massachusetts. To some extent, said Chandler, we are moving toward this final alternative.

If Roper stays on campus the President added, the College will "be more generous" in its financial help. Currently support is being "phased down," but not "out".

The trustees' Degree Committee reviewed the Student-Faculty Honorary Degrees committee recommendations, amended the list, and submitted the report to the trustees. When asked if the trustees do any "armtwisting" to get Honorary Degree candidates to accept, Chandler replied "We do a lot of that." He smiled and added that he and the trustees fully exploited every "tenuous connection" to the College in persuading candidates to accept.

The session ended with a question concerning Student-Trustee relations. Though no official liaison has been appointed, Chandler said Pam Carlton '76 saw this as her duty. The trustees, he said, thought it "valuable" to pick another trustee "close in years" to the students.

Booters trounce Trinity

low shot from the left side, and beat the goalie on the inside post.

"Despite the weather, the main problem with the game was the fact that it was so poorly officiated", Vennell said. This was particularly evident in the final 15 minutes of the game. Although both teams were very aggressive on the ball, they were also very physical off it, a fact which must have been overlooked by the referees, who called almost no penalties.

The entire squad played well, with the standouts being Osborne and sweeper Bruce Camelleri. Most optimistic was the play of the offense, which moved the ball exceptionally well. This was the result of the Trinity fullbacks allowing Purple halfbacks to push the ball to the inside, which is conducive to the Williams attack.

Coming up next weekend for the kickers is a journey to Maine to do battle with Bates and Bowdoin. Although Bates is weak, Bowdoin is undefeated on the season, having already beaten good teams from Amherst and Springfield. Featuring a high powered attack, they stand to be a difficult challenge for an excellent Eph defense. "I just don't know", says Coach Vennell, "but if the Booters can continue to put three or four balls into the net each game, the prospects for a good year will be tremendously enhanced."

After a scant three weeks' preparation, the women's swim team opened its dual meet season Friday with a decisive win over a coed Vassar team, 73-40.

Williams won eight of the fourteen events and swam one-two in three of them. Carol Smalley and Keron Walker accounted for four of the Purple firsts, while relay teams took two more. Smalley, an exchange student from Holyoke, edged out a male competitor in the 200 freestyle and then came back to run away with the 500 distance event in an excellent early-season time of 6:10.

Walker, a freshman, won the 50 freestyle with a time of 26.2 and the 100 butterfly in 1:06.9. Williams completed a sweep of the freestyle events as Marilla Pearsall took the 100 in 1:01.8 and the team of Morrow, Bonner, Murphy and Walker placed first in the 200 freestyle relay.

Mary Southworth displayed some fine form in the diving event, taking first from a field of five girls. Anne Youngling, a junior rookie, placed second in both her freestyle events, while Nina Murphy made a strong showing in the 100 individual medley and the 100 yd. backstroke.

Coach Carl Samuelson was evidently quite pleased with his varsity's opening meet. "The performances were excellent," he said. "This type of start is indicative of a very successful season."

Although Vassar won six events, none of its victors were female. Six men rounded out the opposing squad in the longer distances and the freestyle sprint.

Williams will take on Union in its last home meet for several weeks next Monday.

CORRECTION

Due to a typographical error, last week's article on professorial salaries stated that Amherst professors receive an average of $100 to $200 more than Williams professors. The difference is actually $1,000 to $2,000; the salaries listed in the table appearing with the article are correct.

Gridders fall to Trinity, 16-0 despite tough defense effort

by Tim Layden

Neither rain nor mud nor wind nor Don Wallace's 143 yards passing nor Herb Mc Cormick's six receptions nor the third straight week of tough Williams defense was to keep the Trinity Bantams from a long-awaited win over Williams on Weston Field Saturday afternoon.

It can almost be sensed now that every opponent Williams faces is licking its chops, finally seeing the opportunity to knock off Odell and the Ephs. Trinity came to Williamstown and took advantage of several Eph mistakes and even added a little icing in the end to post a 16-0 win and hand Odell his second consecutive shutout.

In a game where field position was to be a valuable asset all afternoon, Williams' first mistake of the afternoon came before even taking the rice paddy, er, the field. The Ephs won the toss at the start of the game and elected to receive rather than take the swirling wind. The strategy quickly backfired as Williams opened from the five-yard-line and Peter Unger's third-down punt travelled only ten yards. Bill McCandless booted a 20-yard field goal seven plays later.

For the remainder of the first half, the Williams offense moved smoothly between the 30-yard-lines, but continually stalled in Trinity territory. Don Wallace, according to Odell, "Did an exceptional job throwing the ball under atrocious conditions," hitting 7 for 11 for 125 yards in the first half, including four to Herb McCormick but never was able to get the Ephs in for a score.

Trinity's defense, rated seventh nationally coming into the game, was immovable in tough situations and shut off the passing attack in the second half, sacking Wallace five times after intermission.

The Williams defense, which was to yield only 150 yards total offense in the game, rallied around seniors Emmett Creahan and Jim Spaulding and junior Peter Tuttle to halt the Bantams attack for the entire second quarter. Two Unger punts inside the Trinity five also were of service.

The close of the first half, which brought the end of the game's driving rains, and the arrival of the first semblance of a crowd also left Williams on the short end of a 3-0 score. Sound familiar? The Bantams, however, recalling last year's 3-3 tie on a Kevin Cramer fourth-quarter field goal, came out throwing in the second half.

Quarterback John Gillespie hit split end Tom Lines with a pair of aerials to put the Bantams on the Williams 17, where a fumble ended the drive. Trinity ventured into Williams territory twice more in the period, but was unable to score, perhaps showing that an inability to move the ball inside the 25 is contagious.

It was, however, apparent, that the bigger Bantams were dominating the Ephs physically in the second half and eventually the Williams spell was broken.

A fine punt return by Tony Trivella and an extra 15 yards tacked on for a personal foul put Trinity on the Williams 11 and gave the visitors an opportunity to get some breathing room between them and the gutty Ephs. Mike Brennan's one-yard dive four plays later settled the issue and Trinity was in front to stay, 10-0.

The fourth quarter was a frustrating one for the Ephs, as Don Wallace's only wobbler of the afternoon and penalties thwarted drives. Rob Claflin, a reserve quarterback for Trinity returned a punt 51 yards for a score with just four minutes remaining in the contest, the kick was missed, but the Bantams had sealed a very satisfying 16-0 win.

"Their size just got to us in the second half," remarked Odell, "but we're much more encouraged than last week." The win marked the first time since 1973 that a Williams team has lost two games in a row, but it's not time to throw in the towel quite yet.

Williams has now faced two of the toughest opponents it will face this season, in Middlebury and Trinity. The losses have hurt, but the youthful Ephs are gaining experience and there were several bright spots in the loss.

The defense, under Dick Farley and Clarence Thomas continues to bit with fire in their eyes each week, and it can safely say that 20 points from the Purple offense will win most games this year. Bob Staiger and Mike Masi, standing on each others shoulders equal one Joe Greene, but the duo seems to have found their niche at defensive end and with help from the deep backs, have done an outstanding job.

Wallace's passing performance merits some sort of award, throwing a wet, slippery ball and still hitting 10 passes for 143 yards. Split end Herb McCormick, threatened earlier in the week with deportation to fight end, played the game of his life, grabbing six passes, most in heavy traffic.

Freshman halfback Gus Nuzzolese showed great promise, leading the rushing attack, and running with the type of abandon which the Eph attack needs. The return of Scott Harrington to the Williams offense next week should make Nuzzolese an even greater weapon.

Next week's opponent is unpredictable Bowdoin, led by tailback Jim Soule, one of the top running backs in New England. The game will open a two-week road trip, concluding at Tufts. Bob Odell-coached Williams teams have never lost three games in a row, and it's very doubtful he wants to start now.

Sophomore tight end Kurt Anderson reaches in vain for second-half pass from Don Wallace. Bantams capitalized on two Williams errors to post a 16-0 win Saturday afternoon, leaving the Ephs at 1-2 on the season. (photo by Oettgen)

Soccermen demolish Trinity 4-1 in downpour

by Richard Abrams

In an awesome display of offensive power, the Williams varsity soccer team thoroughly demolished Trinity Saturday, 4-1. Despite rainy conditions, which put a damper on any controlled passing game, the booters managed to handle the ball well enough to keep the Trinity defense constantly on the run. The victory, raising the squad's record to 2-2, laid to rest many doubts of their ability to generate an offense.

"Part of the difference was the increased number of shots as compared to our previous two games," coach Jeff Vennell commented. Indeed, the Ephs started strongly, and the early pressure paid off when upback Bill Roper tallied his first varsity goal only 4:25 into the contest. At this point, the Trinity defense tightened, and managed to ward off the Purple forwards until Henry Osborne drilled home an unassisted goal midway through the first half.

Jim Hield started off the second period just as the first when he took a pass from Osborne, and shot past a diving Trinity goalkeeper. Shortly thereafter, the Bantams scored their goal on a rather controversial pl[ay]. With 31:00 remaining, goalie [S]. Grossmann, apparently held on the play, watched helplessly as a follow up head to a corner kick flew into the net for a score. Vehemently protesting the call, Grossmann found himself quickly red carded, and sent to the bench for the remainder of the game. Jay Loeffler took over, and did an admirable job in stemming the Trinity tide for the final 30 minutes. Much of the pressure was removed from him when John Friborg took a

Racquetwomen net two more wins

by Evan Bash

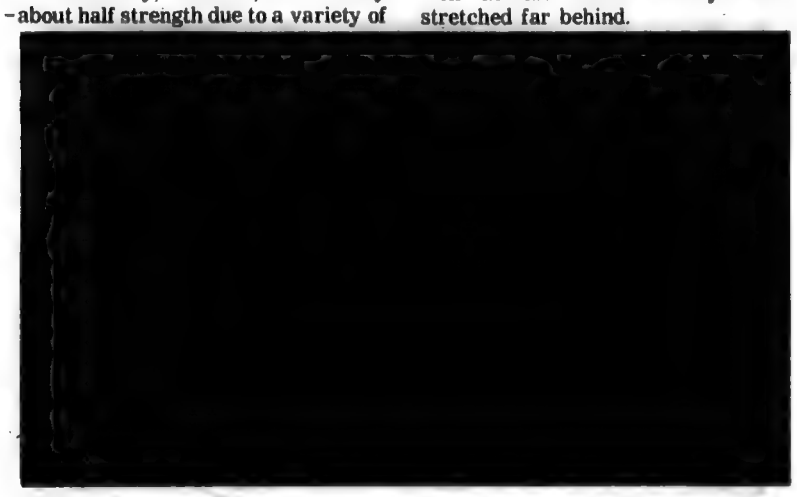
Exposing their opponents to the same ruthless attack being demonstrated in presidential campaign circles, the women's varsity tennis team raised its season record to 7-1 last week with 9-0 wins over both Vassar and Radcliffe. Coach Curt Tong unleashed a machine that dropped only one set out of the thirty-seven played in the two matches.

Against Radcliffe on Saturday, the Ephwomen had as much trouble with the circumstances surrounding the match as they had with the match itself. First, the storm battering the Berkshires forced the match inside Chapman Rink where a concert had taken place only twelve hours earlier. Then a majority of the squad had to stay mentally sharp for over two hours after the match was scheduled to begin as Radcliffe's arrival was delayed.

Williams got off to a quick start against the first shift of Radcliffe players. Jonnina Sadoff played very well at number one singles and won easily 6-0, 6-1. Two more easy wins followed for the Ephs as Laura Carson scored a 6-1, 6-0 victory while Rebecca Chase, who is making her mark as only a freshwoman, breezed 6-0, 6-1.

The second wave of Radcliffe players were turned away as easily as the first. The second of Williams' outstanding freshwomen, Trudie tenBroeke, struggled through the only tough set of the day before settling down to a 7-6, 6-0 win. Amy Demorest won 6-2, 6-1 and has now lost only one match all year, while Holly Boyer filled in ably at sixth singles with a 6-3, 6-0 victory. It was the same old story for the doubles teams as they all won handily. Athletes of the Week Amy Sterling and Holly Prentice won 6-1, 6-0, Sally Kruse and Babe Kirk followed suit 6-0, 6-1 as did Sherry Wilcox and Sue Guttman 6-0, 6-0.

It was a long ride to Poughkeepsie on Tuesday for the team and Vassar would have been happier if the Ephs hadn't bothered to make it. Once again the singles players led the charge. Only Amy Demorest lost a set as Barb Ernst, who missed Saturday's match, played in this one. The doubles teams were never in trouble of losing what would have been only their third loss in eight matches.



The Ephwomen will be challenged by Skidmore and Middlebury this week. The way the team is rolling, it will take a truly outstanding effort to keep them from gaining the now weekly quota of two wins.

Harriers outpace Trinity, Union, to go 7-0

by Chris Flavin

Running through pouring rain, the varsity cross country team easily disposed of Trinity and Union Saturday on a soggy Williams home course. The score of 21-37 over Union, and the 15-49 shut out of Trinity ran the Ephs' undefeated record for the season to 7-0.

The varsity, as usual, ran at only about half strength due to a variety of ailments. Williams junior Joe Kolb led the way from the start, accompanied by Wilcoski of Union. Close behind them Dan Sullivan ran the early part of the race alone. Further back, Ken Leinbach, Gary James, Ed Bacher, and Bert Saul ran together with a group of Union runners. The remainder of the Union runners as well as the entire Trinity team stretched far behind.

After the two mile mark, Kolb slowly pulled away from his Union opponent, and went on to win in the unsensational time of 26:18 for the 4.85 mile course. Wikoski took second, but was followed closely by Sullivan and Leinbach who ran the latter part of the race together, and tied at 27:21. Gary James finished fifth, while Ed Bacher and Bert Saul finished up the Williams win in eighth and ninth places. The first Trinity man could manage only a tenth place finish. Cleve Thayer and Jon Miller of Williams, who were moved up from the J.V. for this meet, finished twelfth and eighteenth.

The Purple now have a week off before going against M.I.T. Saturday at Franklin Park in Boston. After a couple of weeks of injuries, sickness, and relatively poor performances, the Ephs will have to find their groove Saturday, as they are going up against a strong M.I.T. team. The main task for the Williams harriers right now is to stay in shape for the big meets at the end of the season. Though they have outclassed most of their dual meet competition, these later meets will provide more than enough challenge.

CC supports higher ticket price

ACEC gets go ahead on J. Geils

The College Council voted 17-3 Tuesday to underwrite the deficit that the All-College Entertainment Council (ACEC) expects to incur from the Homecoming concert, allowing the ACEC to finalize its contract with the J. Geils Band.

ACEC co-chairman Jim Bowe estimated the probable loss on the J. Geils concert at $5,500. Bowe also reported that the ACEC lost $3,900. on the Arlo Guthrie concert and $175. on the cancellation of Tavares. The council's action implies that the minimum budget allocation to the ACEC would be the combined losses from all three of these shows. Last year the ACEC's final allocation totalled nearly $15,000.

In a non-binding resolution, the council expressed its support for higher ticket prices for the Homecoming concert. Bowe stated that ACEC would follow the council's recommendation and raise prices to at least $6.00.

Council Treasurer Clarence Otis reported that the Finance Committee had completed all but one of its organizational budget reviews. President Steve Piltch then set Oct. 27 as the first allocation session for the council.

According to Finance Committee member Dave Ross the committee will set general policy recommendations for the council and reconsider its tentative recommendations in light of those policies and the overall budget before going to the council.

Gar-Wood representative Larry Mitchell reported that the CEP could take no action on the council's open-meeting resolution for at least one month. Mitchell stated, "The CEP is primarily a faculty committee legally responsible to the faculty. We can take no action until the faculty decides on this issue".

Mitchell also reported that CEP also discussed the problem of the growing number of students taking fifth course. Mitchell said the committee considered this a burden to the school and discussed the possibility of raising tuition for those students taking fifth courses.

In his CUL report, Pratt house representative Peter Sheil stated that the CUL has tentatively adopted a proposal for conducting house transfers in a manner similar to freshman inclusion.

The council also supported the Tenure Standing Committee's plans to distribute a questionnaire designed to increase student input in the tenure process.

Carter tops Ford as 799 vote in mock primary

by Chip Buckner

Jimmy Carter squeaked by Gerald Ford in a mock election that nobody really won. A mere 35 votes separated the leaders as 799 students registered their presidential preferences outside the mailroom at a table run jointly by the Americans for Democratic Action and the Williams Republican Club from 8 am to 8 pm on Wednesday.

Upon learning of the results Bruce McElvein exclaimed "That's wonderful." McElvein '79, Chairman of the President Ford Committee (not affiliated with the WRC), noted that Democratic candidates received 80 per cent of the vote in last spring's mock primary, pointed to the change as indicative of the country's mood and predicted a narrow victory for the President in November.

Joel Smith '79 a key man in Carter's western Massachusetts campaign found the results "satisfying." "That's awfully close," he reacted, but "I didn't think we'd win big." He, too, extrapolated Williams' results nationally, saying that even a narrow victory on a national scale would suffice.

Smith claims that the election did not reflect Williams' real sentiments. He observed that the PFC had canvassed the student body and urged partisans to come to the polls, whereas the Carter organization had remained dormant. "If we'd pulled the voters, we could have won big," he asserted.

Past election years have been less competitive. In the 1972 presidential campaign George McGovern took 71 per cent of the total (563-795), to Nixon's 24 per cent (191-795) of the student body.

Mock Election Results

Candidate-Party	Votes	PC
Jimmy Carter Democratic Party	345	43.2
Gerald R. Ford Republican Party	310	38.8
Eugene McCarthy Independent	93	11.6
Peter Camejo Socialist Workers Party	22	2.8
Others	27	3.6
Total	799	100.0

CUL endorses transfer lottery

by Wendy Parnet

The Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) unofficially decided Monday to endorse a lottery transfer policy. The plan would incorporate random selection into the transfer process, making the system very similar to freshman inclusion.

Under the provisions of the proposal, students would apply for a housing transfer by listing, in order of preference, each of the 4 housing options now open to freshman during inclusion: Dodd-Fitch-Prospect, Greylock, Mission Park or Row House. Students would not be able to select a specific house within the four categories. Transfers could apply either alone or with friends.

The committee's action was a response to a trustee report stating that the housing system was "responsive to new ideas and needs as these are perceived first-hand by responsible college committees." If the proposal stands, it will serve as a guiding principle for the Student Housing Committee. It will not, however, be binding.

Committee members viewed the new policy as a method of cutting down transfers. Agreeing on the desirability of maintaining randomly selected, diverse houses, the committee felt that the current trend toward large numbers of transfers tended to cause excessive homogenity in the houses. The lottery selection, it was felt, would eliminate requests for transfers from all but those students who felt that their living situation was unbearable.

The lottery policy was seen as imposing a cost on all transfers. Those who applied would not know where they would end up. Committee members said they hoped this risk

Committee assesses majors

The Student Standing Committee recently received approval from the College Council on its plan to distribute a questionnaire on tenure and departments offering majors. According to chairman Hervey McIver '77, the committee will seek Dean of Faculty Neil Grabois' consent next week.

The committee, organized last year by Larry Sanders '77, seeks student input on tenure decisions and on department curriculum. The council established the group last fall, but the committee didn't begin functioning until this year. Current members are Hervey McIver, Paul Gismondi '77, David MacGregor '79, Steve Werbel '79, Wit McKay '78, and Bruce Stevenson '78.

The committee's plans include talking to the department chairmen, Grabois, and the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP) before going ahead with the questionnaire. The questionnaire would be distributed to juniors and seniors, asking them to comment on their major and on tenure candidates in that department. Specific questions include how well a major program meets expectations, the ability of a professor to communicate material, the accessibility of professors, and the extent of their interests in students.

Through a questionnaire, Standing Committee said it hopes to obtain more subjective and specific comments than available through the course evaluation sheets written at the end of each semester. At the faculty's suggestion, signatures will be required but only the committee members will see the names. Signatures allow the committee to contact students for clarification of written statements.

76 committee estimates the questionnaires will be completed by Christmas. During vacation the results will be correlated and the findings will be given to CAP, professors, and department chairmen.

Some departments such as history, biology, and political science, have advisory committees that act as liaisons between students and senior members of the department. Students on these committees can recommend other students to be interviewed and can talk to prospective professors.

Thompson, Lasell bells toll for sleepers

by Bill Wickwire

Many Williamstown residents would say that the biggest "ding-dongs" in town are at the College, and in a way they would be right. Williams, the site of most of the bells in town, provides the community with unending pleasure or just a big pain in the neck, depending on one's point of view.

Those bells heard at the hour and the quarter-hour are located in the top of Lasell Gymnasium. The Seth Thomas clock in the tower has two automatic systems which are unfortunately not any too reliable. You may remember two weeks ago when the hour would ring at twenty minutes past, confusing Williams students as well as town residents.

But where are those bells that play songs and ring for about fifteen minutes while disrupting our studies and waking us up early in the morning? They are high in the tower of Thompson Memorial Chapel and ring daily at 7:45, noon, 5:15 and 7:00.

The solid bronze bells are not rung by individual ropes but from a type of console which connects a lever through a series of springs and connections to each bell. It is this apparatus that moves to strike the bell so when the bells are heard they do not actually move.

They are still not easy to ring, however, which can be seen as Tad Cavuoti, the unofficial Williams College Master Bell Ringer, prances across the console, hitting each lever with a thud as the floor beneath vibrates and shakes. "I used to wear gloves," says Cavuoti, "because I got terrible blisters when I was a freshman." According to Cavuoti, the bells must be turned periodically to keep from wearing the bronze unevenly where the lever apparatus hits them.

They have been played on and off for the past 72 years. There are ten of them which cover the scale from E flat to E flat in the key of D minor with an extra D flat and an F. Those two extra bells make it possible to play in two other keys as musicians know.

"It is not a carillon" emphasizes Cavuoti, explaining that a carillon has two octaves with a bell for each halfstep. "The bells are really not very musical. It's a really limited thing."

Over the years, a good library of music has been assembled in spite of these limits. Most selections are from hymnals as they have the simplest arrangements. The ringers also do "change ringing" which is ringing to a numerical pattern rather than to a tune. "When it sounds like just bells and no tune," says Cavutoi, "that's change ringing. Actually, we do that when something is broken, and we can't do anything else."

The bells can be reached by climbing 99 nearly vertical steps to a platform within the tower. There are ten bells, the largest of which is as large as a Volkswagen Beetle, and can be rung either from the console or by a rope. Because of its size, it must be turned almost sideways to ring when operated with the rope. Although it is now repaired, the bell was broken last year by a group of Williams students who had swung like Tarzan on its rope. Because of such incidents, the tower is now locked.

For the first time, there are four bell ringers this year. Chet Palmieri '77, does the 7:00 p.m. ringing. Tad Cavuoti, also a senior and veteran of the group, rings at the most desirable times—noon and 5:15. That nasty person who wakes us up at 7:45 each morning is Alison Morgan, a sophomore. Newcomer David Wilcox, a freshman, is not yet a regularly scheduled bell ringer, but he should be soon.

The bells have become a big part of the daily scene at Williams. They tell us when to get up, when to eat lunch, when to eat dinner, and when to start studying. Of course, they don't have to tell us when to go to bed—we all know it's whenever the library closes or the beer runs out!

McCarthy—
a viable alternative

Eugene McCarthy

by Ken Bertsch

This is the transcript of an address given to the Williams Community at Candidates Night.

In the first place, because I'm President of the Williams ADA, I should make it clear that the ADA emphatically disagrees with my position. They feel that to vote for Eugene McCarthy is to throw your vote away.

In the second place, I would like to make the rather shocking remark that I don't think McCarthy is going to run this year. Because that is the case, I will not try to convince you to vote for McCarthy because he will do this and this and this when he is elected. I would rather suggest that you vote for McCarthy as a protest against the quality level of the two principles.

I went to the library to research the case against Gerald Ford and Jimmy Carter, but I just couldn't force myself to do it. Not that it would be difficult, but I couldn't think of anything that could possibly be more boring. I'll go back to reading Adam Smith any time.

Ford's preCambrian conservatism has been unrelenting. He's against anything that would aid the weak in our society. As writer Richard Rhodes has observed, he's against food stamps. He's against free school lunches for the children of the poor. He's against national health insurance, public housing, aid to education, rent subsidy, unemployment compensation for farmworkers, increased Social Security benefits, and increased minimum wage, support for mass transit from the Highway Trust, abortion, busing, strip-mining regulation, gasoline rationing, "liberal" Supreme Court decisions, public works. To be fair, he's not against everything. He is for school prayers and the CIA.

Besides all this, his vision and originality is in question. Ford was in the House for 25 years, and never once did he introduce a major piece of legislation of any kind.

My biggest problem with Carter is simply that I don't know him. It's true that I do know about his sex life and his prayer habits. (But I still don't know what President Carter is going to do in the way of policy, and he's still not willing to tell me.) I'm aware that he ran what was probably a racist campaign for Governor of Georgia in 1970. On the other hand, I realize that he was probably a competent governor of Georgia. I know that he was never a leader in any effort other than that of satisfying his own ambition. He supported the Vietnam War until it occurred to him that that support might cost votes in a Presidential campaign. He certainly was not known for his leadership on civil rights. Carter didn't stick his neck out; his only interest was in protecting his ass.

The sorry fact is that Ford and Carter are two of the finest examples of American mediocrity. Who are these two that they should be leading our nation? What have they done, where the hell did they come from? I cringe at the thought of voting for either. The alternatives are to not vote, to write in someone, or to vote for a candidate like McCarthy. Eugene McCarthy has, over the years, proven himself to be a courageous, decent, and intelligent public figure. His leadership was amply demonstrated when he stood up to his party hierarchy in 1968 and challenged President Johnson on the war. More recently, McCarthy has been a strong advocate of the view that we should not enshrine the two party system, as does the new election reform act. A self-respecting liberal can, I think, vote for him in good conscience. As I said, you could write in someone, such as Bella Abzug or former Gov. McCall of Oregon, or even that sainted Congressman from Arizona, Morris Udall. The problem is that the write-in won't show up when Walter and Barbara and John give the Nov. 2 results. On the other hand, the McCarthy vote will. There will be a solid block of Americans—six, seven, perhaps even ten per cent—who have demonstrated their disillusionment with the two major candidates.

Jimmy Carter modestly titles his autobiography Why Not the Best. That's a good question. This block of McCarthy votes will be a visible demonstration that we are dissatisfied with what we are being offered. We expect more. We expect the best.

Letters: rape, women in sports

Discrimination

To the editor:

Michael Behrman's article, "Purple Rowers prepare for first race Sunday" (Oct. 8) portrays the Eph crewmen as "one of the least publicized and hardest working teams at Williams College." It seems sadly ironic that in an attempt to expose a little-publicized team, it totally disregards an integral part of the Crew—that of the Williams women's crew. They, too, can be seen daily on the steps of Chapin Hall, and participate in equally punishing practices of running, rowing, and weight lifting.

The article is representative of the discrimination which women in sports experience not only at Williams, but everywhere. Women's soccer, for example, due to the lack of field space and coaches, must hold their season in the spring, an off season for most other colleges.

The sport itself is not the prime issue; whether crew, soccer, or any other athletic activity is concerned, we as persons interested in competitive sports must accept each other as inherently equal and progress accordingly.

Sincerely,

Libby Hohmann '80
Betsy McNerney '80
Suzanne Kluss '80

Safety problem?

To the editor:

I can't help feeling the "rape problem" at Williams has been blown quite out of proportion. Granted, the problem may exist, and be a problem no matter how small the incidence. However, having myself graduated the purple valley last spring, I now spend my days in the pastoral haunts of Washington, D.C. You think YOU have problems?

I am the dispatcher with The George Washington University Campus Police. Several years ago GWU was involved in a test case involving a freshman who claimed her rape went detected yet unattended to by our force. Since then, the force has been beefed up. Now there is a patroling force of 15 men—and women—per shift, as well as an administrative staff of retired pension-drawing former FBI and Secret Service fellows. The campus, located at the fringe of the downtown area, is probably one of the safest areas in the city. (Its size is roughly comparable to Williams' size.) Up to ten major incidents a night pass through my radio desk and onto my blotter. Very heavy patrols are maintained in the University Parking Garage—three women were raped there in the space of three months last year, all nurses on their way home after the evening shift got out.

Williams women, you may have a problem in the reporting of area rapes—but relative to the rest of academia—the Purple Valley is the land of tranquility. At Williams, it's safer to walk home than it is here to drive.

Sincerely,

Dana Perlstein, '76

Freshman parents' weekend

Freshman Parents' Weekend officially began today at 1:00 p.m. Parents can register in Baxter Hall until 8:30 tonight and from 8:30 to 2:30 p.m. tomorrow. The Annual Parents' Day Program will be held in Chapin Hall tomorrow at 11:30 a.m., followed by a buffet picnic at the Field House. Parents are also invited to attend this weekend's various sporting events and theater productions as well as Sunday morning's worship service at Thompson Memorial Chapel.

Budget surplus reported

The College administrative budget for the year ending June 30, 1976 returned a surplus for the first time in three years, according to a report distributed this week by Treasurer Francis H. Dewey III.

Total revenues for 1975-76 were $15,967,424, and total expenditures were $15,876,778, leaving a surplus of $90,646, said Dewey.

Newspaper recycling mandatory

The Williamstown selectmen voted unanimously Tuesday night to ban newspapers from the town landfill effective December 1, effectively making recycling of newspapers mandatory.

The ban will "keep Williamstown in the forefront of recycling," according to R. Carter Terenzini of the Bennington-Berkshire Counties Recycling Council.

Violators of the ban can be fined up to $20, but the town "will educate, persuade, communicate, and talk before issuing citations," said Town Manager Robert M. Janes.

"The goal is to keep as much out of the landfill as possible," said Conservation Commissioner Pamela B. Weatherby, adding that "the best start is newspapers."

Lectures

Martin J. Klein, the Eugene Higgins Professor of the History of Physics at Yale University, will give two lectures on Monday.

Klein will speak on "Albert Einstein: Portrait of the Scientist as a Young Man," at 8 p.m. in room 111 of Thompson Biology Laboratory. Because of his dual career as physicist and historian of science, Klein holds rare qualifications for discussing such a subject.

"Thermodynamics a Century Ago" is the title of Klein's talk before the physics department colloquium at 4:15 in room 214 of the Thompson Physical Laboratory.

Open Discussion on Homosexuality

The Williams Gay Support Organization is sponsoring an open discussion on "Homosexuality: Evolution and Revolution" with panel members Mary Stevens, lesbian, mother and law student, Dan Pinello '72, lawyer and gay rights worker, and John Atteridg, cofounder of the WGSO.

The purpose of the discussion is to initiate gay-straight dialogue on campus. It will be held on Sunday, October 17, in the Driscoll Lounge, from 2-5 p.m.

Outing Club hosts Greylock Day

The Williams Outing Club will hold its annual Greylock Day this Saturday, October 16th. The club is sponsoring an all-day hike and biking trip up Mt. Greylock. Guests include members of the Skidmore, Smith and Mt. Holyoke Outing Clubs. Interested participants should meet at the steps of Chapin Hall, 9 a.m.

Law field work

The Massachusetts Law Reform Institute is looking for 4-6 students to participate in a review and evaluation of the housing court sessions in Pittsfield. This evaluation will comprise a study of district courts throughout the state. Anyone interested will be required to attend a workshop to be held in Boston, October 16 and 17th, which will be followed by a commitment to spend a given number of Thursdays at the court in Pittsfield. This time will be spent observing court cases, interviewing clients and lawyers, and pursuing this study. Part of this work can qualify as a Winter Study 99 under Professor Tauber. Those interested should contact him immediately.

Rocky

Sawyer Library wasn't a particularly pleasant place to visit this week. A plain piece of white notebook paper tacked to the round bulletin board in the lobby and a xeroxed picture of a teenaged girl accosted all who passed by. The words on the paper were in pencil, hastily written and uneven. The penmanship resembled that of a young child. But the plea was terrifyingly mature.

"If anyone has seen the girl pictured below, either in the library or anyplace on campus within the last 24 hours, please contact campus Security or the Williamstown Police. Please!"

Cynthia "Rocky" Krizack, 17, 5'4", blue eyes, brown hair, honor student at Mt. Greylock High School, missing from her home on 42 Southworth Street since last Thursday night. The real world, that far away place that Williams students occasionally glimpse in the daily newspaper or on the evening news, had paid another unexpected visit to Williams College. And it has been damn unsettling.

On October 7th, according to the North Adams Transcript, Rocky called a friend about meeting at the Sawyer Library. When the friend indicated that she didn't intend to go, Rocky told her father she was leaving and would return by 10:30. She never did. Police officials claim there is no evidence indicating foul play but they also note that Rocky does not appear to be the type to run away. Other sources add that the girl had an interview scheduled at Hamilton College tomorrow and was looking forward to using the family car.

The unsettling aspect about the entire affair is that we're not used to having events like this take place in Williamstown. We expect it in Boston and aren't surprised when it occurs in the Five College area, but Williamstown tends to lull you into a false sense of security. We forget about student deaths, put last year's murder in the back of our minds, and gloss over reports of rape on campus. We tend to become so wrapped up in the paper due at the end of the week or the upcoming hour exam that we lose sight of the world around us.

At the same time, however, we still can display remarkable sensitivity to the needs of a crisis when they strike close enough to home. We've yet to develop the callousness of a veteran New Yorker or Bostonian. The plaintive letter in the lobby forced us to confront the issue, and we did. The picture in Tuesday's Record dared us to act, and we did. Rocky's disappearance is another reminder that as safe and as sound as we seem here, we're still a part of that real world out there. Our reaction to the disappearance, on the other hand, is an indication that sensitivity and concern can still be a part of that real world as well.

Registration for Physical Education for second quarter (October 27 - December 8) will be held at the P.E. Office, Lasell Gym on Thursday, October 14 and Friday, October 15 and week of October 18.

Stevens' roles of administrator, outdoorsman fulfill 'double axe'

by Michael Golden

The Double Axe is a novel. It is the story of a family living in the Maine woods. Describing their struggles to survive as well as daily activities, the novel appears Thoreauvian in its presentation of their environment. It was written by Lauren Stevens, Dean of Freshmen, as his senior thesis in college and was published in the spring of 1961. Through its publication, he has shown that, with a little determination, any two activities can be combined into one, in this case combining his love of the outdoors with his livelihood. One might consider that in mixing these two interests Dean Stevens was merely placing the two blades on his double axe.

On one hand the most appropriate term for Dean Stevens would be outdoorsy. He enjoys hiking, camping, traveling, bicycling, and boating. You know, the type of person who keeps L. L. Bean's in business. On the other side of his axe is his role as an instructor of creative writing. This was the credential with which he came to Williams originally, as a temporary replacement for a professor taking leave. He remained for three years, until the professor returned, and then moved northeast to Colby College for a year. The following year the professor permanently left Williams and Dean Stevens moved in.

He has gradually shifted his emphasis from teaching creative writing to acting as dean of freshmen. Though he still teaches a course in the imaginative writing of fiction, most of his time and energy is consumed in administrative areas.

In his sixth year as dean of freshmen, Stevens feels that he "likes administration work more than teaching. It was a long slow change to the Administration." The part of the job he enjoys most is "talking to students; feeling you help them out of difficult situations. It's very rewarding."

Besides acting as deacon at the Congregational Church, Stevens is an officer of the local A Better Chance program. A.B.C., a national organization designed to give underprivileged youth exactly what the name implies, brings some of the youth from the center city ghetto to suburban or rural areas for school, in this case to Mt. Greylock School.

Dean Stevens is ecstatic about the program which he feels gives those adolescents one of their only chances to get out of the ghetto. He concludes that it is very exciting to see them succeed in this transformation. "The best part is when they are accepted and go on to college," he states as he leafs through the list of Mt. Greylock-ABC students and the colleges to which they have gone.

Stevens doubts that there is anything unique about him. Nevertheless, when you see him, his salutation of "Greetings" will make you feel good; his smile will put you at ease.

Williams Women re-directs goals

by Wendy Parmet

Three years ago Williams Women was founded to help students deal with the problems of a newly co-educational school. Now the transition to co-education seems to have been accomplished successfully. And Williams Women, after establishing itself as an active organization, faces the task of re-directing its goals.

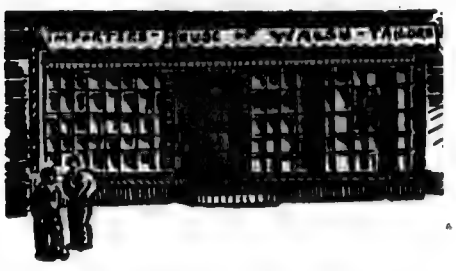
During its first year Williams Women's focus was not according to Dean McIntire "only Williams, but their most particular concern was with problems dealing with becoming a co-educational institution." The initial members worked actively to ease the pain of transition. For the benefit of the entire campus, they worked on the Williams Guide to Health and Sex and on the establishment of gynecological services at the infirmary. Among themselves they maintained an informal atmosphere and a strong internal group orientation. It was a place to meet women and discuss common feelings.

Today Williams Women remains all of that, but on a larger scale. Realizing, as coordinator Lesley Christoph put it, "that co-education has been very successful here," the group has felt the "need to look beyond the problems of the campus." It has branched out and tried to serve as an educational, political and social organization. It dealt with what former coordinator Valerie Anderson termed "world problems." Furthermore, it attempted to involve as many women on campus as possible.

On the whole, the coordinators felt that last year was "definitely successful." The group initiated numerous activities and drew in many new people. They sponsored speakers such as Elaine Noble, theater groups, workshops on self-defense, dialogues between the sexes on such themes as "Male Responses to Feminism" and the traditional Monday night discussion dinners.

This year the active role will be continued. Movies on feminism and speakers are planned. And the group is even becoming politically active. Members will leaflet next weekend in support of the state Equal Rights Amendment.

Williams Women certainly is now, as Andersen put it, "a little of everything." The problem is that in its attempt to be everything and reach everyone its own identity seems to have become blurred. One member said, "There is no real organization—There is no sense of unity."



Most of the women who joined Williams Women seemed to have done so because they were already feminists and saw it as coordinator Mary Ellen Shea did "as a good opportunity to get together with other people who felt the same way". Yet when they came, they participated in the activities without feeling a part of the group. Ginny Long, another former coordinator, says regretfully, "There wasn't much sharing."

Williams Women still feels that their active educational role is vital, if only to make people aware of feminism and women's liberation. But there is a growing realization among members that they just cannot appeal to everybody. There are many women on the campus who say, "I don't see a need for it. I've never felt discriminated against." And even though members laugh when they are called radical, some people see them as just "a bunch of hardy women's libbers"always brooding on problems.

As Williams Women plans its activities for its fourth year, there is more of a sense that it is time to take stands. Members are starting to face up to the fact that it is a feminist group. They realize that it is time to not only explore problems but "look at the positive things women can do."

It is admitted that besides activities for the school there is a need to do more for the group itself. They need to form more cohesiveness and unity. They must search out their own identity. Once they do that, they will be better able to serve their goal of helping and of raising the consciousness of the women and men on this campus.

Naturalistic theater returns to Williams

by Tom Herwitz

The curtain rose. It may not seem a strange thing to be happening at the beginning of a play, but in this day and age it has not only become a rarity—but a purposefully significant one at that. For the first time in a number of years the Williams College Theater attempted a straight performance of a classic naturalistic play.

The problems with producing realism at this level are almost insurmountable. In a realistic rendition the actors have nothing to fall back on, nothing to rely on but their own ability. In order for any sort of success there must truly be an acting tour force; performances so grand that they can fill in the great void left open by the theatrical deficiencies. A great production becomes good, a good one mediocre.

Hedda Gabler is the story of a woman—an unsatisfied, vicious woman—who cannot cope with the reality that surrounds her; the stifling, petty bourgeoise Victorian society which imprisons as well as victimizes her. She is unyielding, demonic, destructive of herself and those around her, and unable to accept the repressive circumstances. It is possibly one of the most complex, multi-faceted, and harshly difficult of any role ever created. To capture it with any sense of realism or meaning is a spectacular feat. The sense of anger, of pathos, of wickedness, and of terror—all these different sides of a single character must be merged. A balance between the power of the character and that of the enclosing environment which threatens her must be maintained.

Rochelle DuBoff has done a remarkable job of organizing the character of Hedda and bringing out many of the subtleties of the role. Her voice, her face, and her body are all beautifully expressive. But even with a portrayal such as hers, the reality of the situation is unconvincing.

The same is generally true of all of the characters who achieve, the purposes of their roles to varying degrees of success. There is something blatantly unrealistic and amateurish about the final product. A cardboard cutout effect of the thing as a whole—characterizations without the interaction necessary to make them and their situation full, human, and real.

Jean-Bernard Bucky has attempted in the production to diverge from the normally accepted view that the play is a study of society which crushes the non-conforming Hedda. Rather, he focuses on the tragedy of the woman herself. This idea does not, however truly come across in the production. Not only is the society around Hedda stifling to her, but to the audience as well. Hedda, the person, does not become clearly established, and the damnation of the character is not apparent enough to express Bucky's view. The focus of the play is not truly fixed, the whole not truly cohesive.

Richard Jeter's setting, though in the parlor less elaborate than called for, has a beautiful set of balconies (not used particularly effectively in the staging). The costumes, by Martha Hally, are fittingly bland, with the exception of Hedda's beautiful dress. The lighting by Frederick Penzel comes into full force at the end of the third act when firelight illuminates a demonic Hedda.

Hedda Gabler is a regression back to the stability of accepted theater. And Hedda is, as such, a mistake. In an age of such expansion of the theater, it is almost academic to attempt flat naturalism. Unlike other mediums the theater allows for direct and immediate synthesis of visual and aural expression. The theater can break out and reach to the audience, to bring the audience into a joint experience instead of presenting a rigid "sculpture" simply to be viewed. In a time where interaction is typical, lack of the same seems even more barren.

Choral Society to perform

The Williams College Choral Society, directed by Kenneth Roberts, will present its major Fall concert in Thompson Memorial Chapel tomorrow evening at 8:30 p.m. Assisting in the program of opera scenes and choral masterpieces will be a full symphony orchestra and baritone soloist John Hornor, Williams '51. Admission is free to Williams students.

The 110 college and community members of the Choral Society prepare one major program each semester, as well as the traditional Christmas program and incidental music for the Chapel services during special College weekends. Nearly always, an orchestra accompanies the chorus, and for this program some sixty-five instrumentalists have been drawn from Berkshire, Albany, Vermont, Springfield, and Boston orchestras.

The Overture and opening scene from Act 1 of Richard Wagner's Die Meistersinger and the "Procession of the Nobles" from Act 2 of Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakov's Mlada represent the world of opera in the program. Two choral masterworks, Handel's Coronation Anthem I: "Zadok the Priest," and Ralph Vaughan Williams' Five Mystical Songs, complete the evening.

Because his music is impressionistic, sensuous, and incredibly rapturous, Vaughan Williams has often been considered the "English Debussy". These five songs are mystical not in the sense of confusion, but in the deeper, simpler sense of the word.

Handel had known George II of England in Hanover, Germany, and so there was special affection and meaning for them in this music composed by Handel for George's coronation in Westminster Abbey in 1727.

Soloist John Hornor graduated from Williams College in 1951 with a major in music, where his principal teachers were Professors Robert Barrow and Irwin Shainman. He later earned Bachelor and Master of Music degrees at the New England Conservatory, where he was the first man to win the Eleanor Steber Singing Award.

Hornor, the Choral Society, and the orchestra will perform the Vaughan Williams work a second time in the Sunday morning Chapel service at 10:30 a.m. as part of the Freshman Parents' Weekend offerings at Williams College.

Cap and Bells Auditions

Auditions will be held this Monday, October 18, from 4:00-6:00 P.M., and Tuesday from 7:00-10:00 P.M., for the Cap and Bells, Inc. production of "The Effect of Gamma Rays on Man-in-the-Moon Marigolds", by Paul Zindel. The play will be directed by Todd Anderson.

There are roles for five women, and anyone interested is encouraged to audition. Scripts will be available for loan in the Cap and Bells office in the AMT. "The Effect of Gamma Rays . . ." will be produced in the Studio Theater of the AMT on December 2, 3, and 4.

Laughton biography tenderly woven

by Stephen Bernheim

When I began to read Charles Higham's Charles Laughton: An Intimate Biography, I was surprised to learn that many of my friends had not heard of the distinguished actor and director. After finishing the book I realized how little I had known of Laughton's career. As with most great artists, his life cannot be measured solely on the basis of his accomplishments, such as his portrayal of Captain Bligh in Mutiny on the Bounty, his direction of the Caine Mutiny Court Martial, or his collaboration with Bertold Brecht in the production of Galileo. More often than not, the work of such an artist is the result of a profound combination of life experiences. Higham's biography aims at such an understanding.

Laughton's career is approached from his own point of view. His subdued performance in the film Ruggles of Red Gap is explained in terms of his Catholic upbringing which would "never have permitted excess," or his Quasimodo in The Hunchback of Notre Dame where Laughton must portray the character's kindness and beauty of character in spite of his disfigurement. As Laughton was seriously pained by his own ugliness, acting the role became a personal battle. Anecdotes, letters and remembrances provided by Lanchester are interwoven with the chronological description.

The author chose wisely not to involve himself deeply in the lives of Laughton's co-workers and friends. Bernard Shaw, Bertold Brecht, Alexander Korda, Jean Renoir, Lanchester and others are presented only insofar as they contribute to the central character of the book. Laughton's lovers, David Roberts and Bruce Ashe, are likewise excluded from what could have been sensationalist exploitation.

In subtitling his book An Intimate Biography, Higham has set himself an enormous task, and falls somewhat short of his goal. The book is certainly a personal biography: tender, caring and considerate. But it is not intimate in the sense that we enter the realm of Laughton's passions and despair to understand them. After reading the book, we feel more as if we have been invited guests with the Laughtons for a few days or weeks, graciously taking our leave before we learn too much. In 1943 when Laughton was starring in Renoir's This Land Is Mine, the actor was unable to continue filming a scene after he pulled one of the bars from a prison set. "I can't believe it's a real cell, a real prison," Laughton moans. This is a moving scene in itself, but we never learn of his actual motivation for this response; rather, the insight is recorded so that the reader draws the conclusions, instead of the author probing the character so that the motivation can be made clear.

Charles Laughton is a moving book, and a pleasure to read, though Higham's collaboration with Lanchester explains a great deal of his discretion and restraint. Surprisingly, the author refrains from eulogizing his subject, all too often a characteristic of film star biographies. This book makes clear that if there is any person on stage or screen who deserves to be eulogized, it is Laughton.

Addresses Housing Committee

O'Brien approves student party monitors

Addressing the Housing Committee Monday night, Security Director Walter C. O'Brien approved a proposal to supplement security officers with student monitors at small campus parties. "If you can get by with student monitors, that's great," O'Brien told the committee. "It's a real headache for me trying to provide extra personnel for parties."

The committee proposed the monitor system as a way to reduce the cost of parties. By cutting the number of security guards required at each party, students can defray the $27 fee charged by the College for each officer. In the past, the College required one guard for each fifty students attending a party although the requirement was never strictly enforced, according to O'Brien.

O'Brien agreed to implement the monitor system on a trial basis for small house parties but said he wished to "reserve the right in the case of all-college parties and parties given for the entire freshman class."

In an effort to explain inadequacies in campus security, O'Brien told the committee that he is working with a low budget and a small staff. "We have the same number of men now as when the campus enrollment was 1200 and there were fewer buildings."

At its meeting Monday, the committee also considered a proposal to add two at-large members to the housing committee. Following clarification of the committee's open meeting policy, Dave Forrester '78 withdrew the proposal.

Earlier this semester, the committee voted to open its meetings to observers and to speaking participants with the approval of one of the co-chairmen.

CUL move seen as try to cut transfers would eliminate requests from students who merely wanted to improve their living conditions. The policy would benefit those who desperately needed to transfer by guaranteeing them their request.

The CUL's agreement on the policy is, at this stage, only informal; committee chairman Earl L. McFarland will issue an actual statement later this week.

Members of the CUL expressed a desire to hear student reactions to the policy proposal. Although it will be receptive to new ideas for the actual mechanism involved, the committee seemed very firmly committed to reducing transfers.

Members agreed that students have many opportunities to associate with people similar to themselves, including the option to affiliate socially with a house other than the one in which they live. The committee considered the housing system the only system that encouraged diversity.

Seek to repeat '73 season finish

Purple gridders to tangle with Bowdoin Bears

by Tim Layden

The Williams College football program last found itself in the unenviable position of owning a losing record in 1973, dropping the second and third games of the campaign and going on to post a 6-2 record and winning the Little Three. Conditions are remarkably similar in 1976 and they are also quite different.

Williams and head coach Bob Odell have again lost the second and third games of the season and own a meager 1-2 record. The Ephs will travel to the wilds of Maine Saturday to do battle with a relatively weak Bowdoin team which also owns a 1-2 record.

Three years ago, Williams also faced Bowdoin in the fourth game of the season, and snapped out of their losing streak, topping the Polar Bears on Weston Field, 22-15. The win began a five-game winning streak.

Characteristic of the 1973 Ephs was an offense which could move the ball but couldn't score when it was really needed. The defense kept the first loss respectable, but just couldn't do it all. Deja vu, right?

Williams fans can hope for history to repeat itself and for the Ephs to crush a weaker Bowdoin team, but it's the players who have to score the points, something they haven't done in two weeks.

Bowdoin will field a weak defensive team, possibly just what the doctor ordered for the ailing Eph offense. Bowdoin yielded 42 points to Amherst in a big loss and 30 to Trinity, by no means an offensive power, in their season opener. Head coach Jim Lentz has benched several senior veterans in favor of inexperienced freshmen, who are getting baptism under fire.

The young Williams offensive line (I promise not to say it any more) should finally get a chance to handle to a unit which lacks experience as much as they do. If the starting front wall of Tim Dunn, Brian Fales, Joe Maguire, Dave Maltzan, and Kenny Schoetz is to prove their worth, this is the time.

Williams will also enter the contest with a healthy backfield for the first time this season, as Scott Harrington is expected to return to the lineup. Charlie Carrier, Gus Nuzzolese, Tom Redden, and Pete Hansbury round out the backfield regulars. Redden was picked by the coaching staff as "offensive player of the week."

Junior split end Herb McCormick, who nabbed a career-high six passes in the Trinity loss, suffered a sprained ankle in the process but should be ready to go Saturday. Kurt Anderson will be at the tight end slot for quarterback Don Wallace.

If the once-promising, oft-injured Williams offense doesn't put some points on the board against the Bowdoin defense, prepare for the lowest-scoring season in Williams football history.

Defensively, the tables are turned. The Ephs, ranked nationally in NCAA Division III total defense, will face their toughest individual foe of the season. Bowdoin tailback Jim Soule has become the leading ground-gainer in Bowdoin history with over 1,000 yards. His 152-yard afternoon against W.P.I. Saturday earned him ECAC Division III player-of-the-week honors.

The tough senior runs with abandon, and with little regard for his body, and gains yards. Williams shut him off in the second half of the Ephs' 22-7 win last year by hitting him with abandon, holding him to his lowest total of the season.

The key to shutting off Soule will be Eph linebackers Jim Spaulding and defensive player of the week John Theil, who have been whirling dervishes all season. The duo must be Palladino and Niden (1973) reborn and shut off the Polar Bears' one-man ground game.

Bowdoin quarterbacks have aired the ball only 32 times in three games, completing just six. Tight end Jim Small (3 catches) is the most "dangerous" target. It should be another linebacking afternoon for the Williams secondary.

No Bob Odell team at Williams has ever lost three games in a row, and on paper, there's no way this should be the first. But perhaps Renzie Lamb put it best, "It's an entirely situation for these kids than they've ever faced before. I mean they've lost two games in two years, and here they've lost two games in two weeks . . . But they're quality kids and I think they'll turn things around."

Just one catch folks. Renzie made this comment three years ago before the Bowdoin game. The first part of the quote still holds, and we'll all soon see about the second.

The contest begins at 1:30 p.m. in Brunswick. WCFM will broadcast the contest from about 1:20.

Leigh Wilson drives a pass to Liza Olsen in last Monday's game against Skidmore. The Ephwomen won the contest 5-0, raising their season record to 4-2.

Golf overpowers Middlebury

The Williams golf team upped its record to 4-2 Wednesday with a 395-407 victory over a fine Middlebury squad. Playing No. 1, co-captain Steve Saunders overpowered the Middlebury Country Club (not to be confused with the college itself) with an awesome driving display, delivering a fine 77. Chris Vogelsang also fired 77, showing a lot of class with his ability to overcome the devastating psychological effects of previous poor outings. Co-captain and recently crowned college champion Dave Tomaszek toured the course in 80. Had it not been for a coma-like display during the middle six holes, Tomaszek would have lived up to medalist potential. Sophomore Dan Katz, despite a painful stomach injury, flabbergasted his teammates with an 80. Rounding out the scoring, seniors Barney Ireland and Charlie Haines cruised to solid 81's. Both possess bone-crushing drives (not to mention astounding length) and should figure prominently in future contests.

Previously, Williams scored a double win over Albany and RPI following a disappointing debut at Yale. Promising freshman Chip Oudin and Ed Bousa led the way against Albany and Yale respectively, with the stalwart co-captains close behind.

The team travels to Cape Cod this weekend for the New England, with a strong performance anticipated.

Herb McCormick grabs athlete of the week honors

Varsity split end Herb McCormick's six pass receptions in a muddy 16-0 loss to undefeated Trinity last Saturday have earned him Athlete of the Week honors.

McCormick, who saw considerable action a year ago as a tight end, is a 6'1" 180 lb. junior who snared four Don Wallace aerials in the first half and two more after intermission before leaving the game with a sprained ankle. McCormick's six catches accounted for well over half of Wallace's 143 yards passing.

HONORABLE MENTION:

Jay Loeffler—junior goalie for the varsity soccer team, Loeffler replaced red-carded co-captain Skip Grossman in the second half of Saturday's 4-1 win over Trinity and held the Bantams scoreless for thirty minutes.

Joe Kolb—The top runner on Tony Plansky's unbeaten cross-country team, Kolb topped a field of Union and Trinity competitors Saturday and cruised to an easy win, leading the Ephs to a double victory.

Keron Walker and Carol Smalley—both first-year members of Carl Samuelson's women's swim team, the duo accounted for four first-places in the Ephwomen's opening match win over a coed squad from Vassar.

Team Bus Crashes

A bus accident Monday afternoon delayed the women's tennis and field hockey matches at Skidmore. No one was hurt but the teams were about fifty minutes late for their starting times.

"It was a little scary, like any accident, but we got off the bus and after a while people were laughing," one member of the tennis team recalled.

Riding behind two other cars, the bus apparently could not stop in time when the first car suddenly slowed for a turn. Attempting to avoid collision the bus swerved to the right but scraped the guard rail and hit the second car, which in turn hit the first.

Eph field hockey dominates play in 5-0 shutout against Skidmore

by Nancy Rhein

The Williams' field hockey team overcame a season long problem of slow starts and dominated Skidmore Monday, 5-0.

The Ephwomen scored in the first minute of play and took charge of the game, and through the use of quick stickwork and fast play ran the Skidmore team off of the field.

Opening the scoring for Williams was the team's leading scorer, center Sally Kraft. Kraft's goal was followed in the first half by goals off of the sticks of three other forwards, Liza Olsen, Shailah Stewart, and Amy Kindwall. This distribution of goals throughout the offensive line forced Skidmore to "be on their toes" according to Williams' coach Linda Wilkins.

Commenting on the exciting first half scoring, Wilkins noted "the forward line really worked together" and stressed the contribution of left wing Anne McClelland to the excellent offensive play.

As a result of the offensive domination, the Ephs defense saw little action, although goalie Mimmie DuMouchel had some nice saves. "It's really hard to keep your concentration when the ball is at the other end of the field. But Mimmie had some beautiful clears. She's very steady," said Wilkins.

Cutting off the drives by the Skidmore offense, the midfield and aggressive defense cleared the ball to the forwards throughout the half. Later in the second half, Kraft added one more goal to bring the score to 5-0.

Although Wilkins was pleased with the team's play she sees a need to working on scoring in the penalty corner situation. This inability to score following corners played a major role in the Ephs defeat by Yale and helped keep the Williams score low Monday. Corner scoring may well determine the outcome of this Saturday's 12:15 home game against a strong Middlebury team.

A victory Saturday will assure the squad of the winning season they had anticipated, as they now stand 3-2 with two remaining home games.

The Williams Record

VOL. 90, NO. 13 WILLIAMS COLLEGE OCTOBER 21, 1976

First meeting Oct. 27

FinCom to open funding

by Jim Cohen

The Finance Committee will present the first of four sets of funding recommendations to the College Council next Wednesday, outlining budgets for eight organizations grouped as media and publications.

Recommendations for discussion Oct. 27 range from $13,308 for the Record to $160 for Free University. The committee decided to submit no recommendation for the Gul; the yearbook had requested $11,856.

The committee finished its deliberations this week, passing on requests from 35 organizations totalling $110,672 and setting general guidelines for presenting the budgets. Chairman Clarence Otis '77 said that he would outline policies for each category at the beginning of each CC meeting. "A finance committee member will present each organization's budget, answer questions and present our rationale."

Organization representatives will have five minutes to respond to Finance Committee comments. The council has set no limits on the time it will spend discussing each organization.

According to Otis and committee member Dave Ross '77, the committee made substantial cuts on requests from four organizations. Requesting $5,700, the Dance Society was granted $4,300. The Cap and Bells budget was reduced from $7,300 to $4,500. WHEW, seeking $1,050, was denied any funds.

In the media and publications category, the Back Talk budget was cut from $3,260 to $2,400. Otis said the committee reduced by 25 per cent the number of pages the literary magazine proposed to print.

"Last year they didn't turn anything down. The committee felt that it should maintain quality," the chairman said. He also noted that the preliminary request was based on two issues each semester. "They won't be able to do it this semester," he said.

The WCFM recommendation, slated for discussion Oct. 27, may be increased $200 to fund special programming.

Otis said he expects the CC to change the All-College Entertainment Committee (ACEC) recommendation when it is brought up with entertainment and service organizations Nov. 1. "Our recommendation was $12,000 for 2 rock concerts and two jazz concerts. A final rock concert allocation was contingent on how well they did on the first two concerts." Last week, the CC voted to underwrite the deficit for the Tavares cancellation and the Arlo Guthrie performance and the expected losses from the J. Geils concert at homecoming. A $12,000 allocation wouldn't be sufficient to cover these deficits and fund two more concerts.

On Nov. 8, the CC will discuss budgets for sports clubs, and political groups; on Nov. 9 they will consider religious organizations and groups labelled miscellaneous.

GUL funding postponed

by Ann McCabe

The Finance Committee voted Sunday night against making any recommendation to College Council on funding of the yearbook, Gulielmensian. On Wednesday, Oct. 27, committee member Bob Fox will present possible alternatives for funding, and CC will vote on the proposed options.

The options include: allocating $11,856 as a supplement to advertising revenue, having complete funding by student subscriptions, having the CC cover the cost of yearbooks for seniors and have anyone else who wants it subscribe.

"Our main purpose is to have a yearbook, not a senior book," stated Stew Read, co-editor of the Gul. He said he feels a full or part subscription system would force Gul to cater to seniors; "It would deeply cut into the quality of the book."

Gul is asking for funding of $11,856, the same as last year. The Gul also gained $1,100 in advertising revenue. It was one of the first years Gul had not run over its estimate, and Read said he believes costs should remain the same in the future.

Committee member Ross Cheit supported a subscription method because "the book is basically for seniors; there is not the demand from others, especially sophomores." In the past two years students have failed to pick up 200 to 500 books said Cheit. He said he believes these figures prove many students would not want the book if it was not so readily available. Bob Fox added "people who want it will pay for it"

Previously, money from the Student Activities Tax has been alloted to Gul. Read estimates the book costs about $7.50. According to Read this price could double through subscriptions because fixed costs like photography remain the same regardless of the number of subscriptions. The trouble of collecting subscriptions could end the book according to Read.

CC debates open meeting tax allocation

Open meetings and the Student Activities Tax dominated debate in the College Council Tuesday night. The representatives postponed the discussion of additional security measures until after the SAT allocation when they will meet with Security Officer O'Brien.

CC President Steve Piltch informed the Council that the Faculty Steering Committee will move that "meetings of standing committees will normally remain closed," but encourage "at least one open meeting per semester." The Council expressed its concern that the faculty had not considered the students on the committees when making this decision, and voted to draft a resolution to that effect, reaffirming previous stand on open meetings.

The Council approved a Finance committee plan reorganizing the SAT funding process. Beginning Wednesday October 27 the Council will consider the budget requests of a number of student organizations. At the meeting the Treasurer will outline the policy the FinCom used to determine the allocation. Following a FinCom statement of the club's request and the committee's recommendation, the officers of the club have five minutes in which to respond to the decision of the committee.

The CC will then deliberate and vote upon the committee's recommendation. If not approved, the Council may either set another figure, or return the matter to the FinCom.

In committee action, the council approved a Student Standing committee resolution to allow departmental majors to evaluate teachers before tenure decisions.

Students lose section choice

The Calendar and Schedule Committee decided Monday to deny section choices to students changing spring courses during the present revision period. Although approval of all course changes is virtually guaranteed, the committee decided that students who registered last spring should have priority in class hour and professor preferences in multi-section courses.

"We don't want to encourage students to make hasty course decisions in the spring," committee chairman Paul G. Clark said. By removing the option to state section preferences, the committee hoped to limit the number of course changes made during the fall revision period, according to committee member Sally Coney '78.

In remarks directed to the new committee members, Clark explained that computerizing the registration process brought out many questions of priority allocation. "When scheduling was done by hand," Clark told the committee, "there were a lot of priority decisions made. The computer program had to incorporate guidelines for making these decisions."

The program used in this fall's scheduling distributed freshmen evenly among the sections of multi-section courses. The computer then granted section preferences in the order of senior, junior, exchange, sophomore, special and graduate students.

The committee discussed the validity of this ordering system, deciding that only seniors should be given preference in granting future section requests. In scheduling of this spring's courses, the junior and sophomore classes will be pooled and the computer will consider their section preferences equally.

The decision to maintain senior priority was based on the "last chance" principle. Seniors may have no other opportunity to be in a particularly desirable professor's class and should therefore be granted priority in section requests, the committee decided.

Discussing the policy of equal distribution of freshmen among sections, the committee was unable to reach any conclusions. According to Registrar George C. Howard, the computer program initially assigned freshmen lowest priority resulting in a clustering of freshmen in the least desirable sections. Revision of the program eliminated the inequity by placing equal numbers of freshmen in each section.

Keller answers food critics

Director of College Food Services Ross Keller responded to criticisms of row house services raised at the Housing Committee meeting Monday.

Gary James, representing 16 row house presidents, indicated that the major problem in the smaller dining houses was the lack of autonomy and flexibility in planning and preparing menus. He objected to the practice of trying to run these houses as though they were major dining halls. Keller said that it costs considerably more to feed row house students than those in large dining halls and the only means of controlling the economic limitations were through a somewhat standardized menu or budgeting a certain sum per student for daily meals.

"It is ridiculous to consider the latter," Keller stated. "Therefore, there must be some standardization if we are to operate within the proposed budget. However, I am in no way trying to make the row houses identical in terms of preparation or tradition."

Dean Roosenraad added, "If a strictly economic decision had been made, all row houses would have been closed. In order to make an overall improvement, we have to accept some changes."

Keller went on to say that his principle responsibility was to provide palatable food for the students at regular dining times. He reported that this purpose was overshadowed last year by $21,000 to $22,000 worth of over-the-counter food sales, which cost the college over $5,000 in payroll. He said he felt it his job to overcome this loss through better planning and organization.

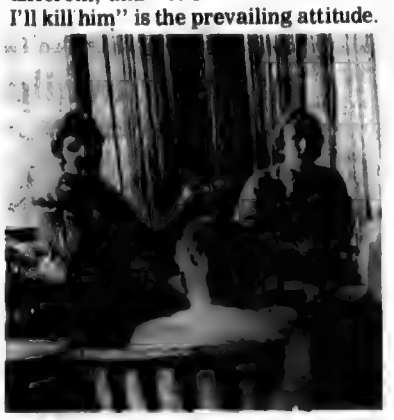
Pinello addresses WGSO

"I'm thrilled the WGSO exists here at Williams," claimed Dan Pinello '72, a lawyer and gay rights worker. "I think it is vital for the community."

Pinello, lesbian Mary Stevens and Williams Gay Support Organization co-founder John Atteridg '76 discussed homosexuality with an audience in Driscoll lounge Sunday. The WGSO-sponsored program sought to "initiate gay-straight dialogue on campus."

The discussion focused on coming out—telling family, friends and the world in general that one is gay. "It's a very personal decision," said Pinello, "and is irrevocable." Often, the results are painful: a temporary or permanent alienation from family and acquaintances. But, as an audience member noted, "Parents and family are aware of more things than we might realize. A family may work itself out without confrontation." In any case, as Pinello noted, "People have a tremendous ability to adapt. People respect honesty and candor."



Panelists cited several advantages of coming out. First of all, Atteridg said, "It ends one's two-faced attitude and gives people a chance to accept you."

"Only if we are in the open," Pinello continued, "will people be able to say that homosexuals are the same as other people. It will not come home that there is no difference until a person knows one personally."

"The basic problem is one-parent child raising, not the lack of a male figure or my attitude," responded Stevens, a mother and law student, when asked about the effect of her homosexuality on her little girl. "My parents," she continued, "tried to raise me straight, but it didn't work. I tried everything." Stevens has been married twice to men whom she "loved but not physically." A gay member of the audience said that he had "married for cover. If you're married, you're not gay." "I enjoy raising children though," Stevens concluded, "and (my daughter) seems very straight."

Participants also mentioned the rigid "American attitude towards sexuality," which views people as "either homosexual or heterosexual but not both." Europeans, it was noted by someone in the audience, have not drawn such tight lines, and bisexuality is more acceptable than it is here. Pinello continued, "Gender does not make too much of a difference. If a person is exciting and vibrant, we can have a good relationship which involves sensuality."

Living in New York City, Pinello finds that "people are developing open-minded attitudes there." In most other places, he noted, things are different, and "Show me a shmo and I'll kill him" is the prevailing attitude.

Dan Pinello '72 and John Atteridg '76 returned to campus Sunday to lead a panel on homosexuality sponsored by the Williams Gay Support Organization. (photo by Read)

A Wasted Winter?

It is difficult to criticize the Winter Study Program at an institution like Williams where, for many, it provides a much needed respite from the educational rigors typically encountered during the rest of the year. Nevertheless, a common complaint on campus this week has come from students who have looked through the 1977 WSP catalogue and arrived at the conclusion that there are very few projects in it that they would really like to take.

The concept of the Winter Study Program has such a basic appeal to most students and faculty alike that disturbing trends in how the month of January is actually being used are easily overlooked. The WSP here has been undergoing a subtle but annoying change over the past few years. It seems that the projects being offered each year are more academic than those of the previous year while, at the same time, being less intellectually creative and stimulating.

Winter Study projects, as stated in the College Bulletin, are "designed to vary the pace and texture of the more traditional academic offerings and methods of presentation." Yet the vast majority of this year's projects will be held in normal or near-normal classroom situations. Furthermore, the trend seems to be to make their content more closely resemble that found in regular courses.

Winter Study provides a unique opportunity for students and faculty to get out of rigid classroom situations. Such opportunities should not be squandered. It's truly a shame that a college community as talented as ours can't come up with a list of Winter Study projects which will not merely be apathetically accepted, but rather enthusiastically endorsed by the student body.

Burns appointed to Carter committee

The Democratic National Committee has appointed Professor James MacGregor Burns to a committee of university educators in support of the Carter-Mondale Presidential ticket, the National Committee announced last week.

The educators' committee, composed of sixteen members associated with schools in the New England area, will concentrate its efforts in that area. Other members of the committee include Professors Henry Steele Commager and John Kenneth Galbraith.

Girl still missing; rumors unfounded

Cynthia Krizack, a 17 year old Williamstown girl missing since the night of October 7, had not been found by Monday afternoon according to Massachusetts State Trooper Jack Flaherty. The State Police are cooperating with the Williamstown Police in the search, with unofficial FBI aid, said Flaherty.

Rumors that Cynthia was found Sunday, that a book belonging to her was found near Cole Pond, and that blood was found in the Roper Center parking lot are totally unfounded, according to College Security Director Walter O'Brien.

Cynthia is 5'4" tall, with blue eyes and brown hair, and was last seen wearing blue jeans. Anyone with information concerning her whereabouts should contact the Williamstown Police at 458-5733.

Officers available at flat rates

Residential houses wishing to have parties will now pay a flat rather than hourly rate for the hiring of security officers, according to Business Manager Shane Riorden. The change involves an increase in the rates paid to hired officers, which will be absorbed by the College.

According to Riorden, the College will now consider security duty at house parties as overtime work, and payment to officers will be on a time-and-a-half basis. Houses will pay a flat rate of $21 for security at weekend parties, and $28 for parties on weekday nights. The difference between the flat rate and full overtime pay will be covered by the College.

The College initiated the wage changes in an attempt to compensate security officers on a more equitable basis, according to Riorden. Previously, houses paid security officers on an hourly basis, standard rates being $5 an hour before midnight and $6 an hour afterward.

Riorden estimated the expected extra cost to the College due to the change in the rate system to range anywhere from $500 to $1000. "Since the number and size of parties are variable, we can't really give a specific estimate," he claimed.

Letters: security, illiteracy

Rape attitude

To the editor:

From my perspective as a rape crisis counselor trained in North Adams last spring, it seems important to address myself to two groups of individuals on campus: firstly to the smug, unruffled members of our community who fail to recognize the possibility of a rape occurring on campus. Secondly, I direct myself to those who, since the "rape panic" several weeks ago are afraid to step out-of-doors.

The pristine image of Williamstown as "the village beautiful" fosters a dangerous sense of complacency which ought to be dispelled. Obviously we're not living in New York City, or Boston, or Washington, D.C. One of the reasons many of us came to Williams was to escape the brutal realities of an urban life. But the potential exists here, as in the city, for the crimes of robbery, assault and rape. How often do you leave your room unlocked? Or walk home alone at 1:00, 2:00 or 4:00 A.M.?

Several weeks ago The Record published an article with the headline: "Rape Panic Unjustified". Although the report itself was responsible and well-researched, the title was somewhat misleading. Last week a letter to the editor began, "I can't help feeling that the 'rape problem' at Williams has been blown out of proportion" and concluded, "relative to the rest of academia—the Purple Valley is the land of tranquillity". The most obvious message contained in Dana's letter and The Record headline is something we all want to hear in order to continue living our insulated lives of drowsy unconcern: "Don't worry—rapes don't occur around Williamstown very often (if at all), and the incidence of it is so small as to be practically negligible in terms of its effect on the campus community".

What is most disturbing about this attitude is the emphasis placed on the quantity of incidents rather than the impact of such a traumatic experience upon the individual. How can the Purple Valley be characterized as a "land of tranquillity" if there are reported rapes occurring frequently enough to support the existence of a rape crisis counseling center in North Adams? If there was only one victim in all Berkshire County, and she happened to be your mother, girlfriend, or little brother could you consider a rape panic to be "unjustified"?

I don't mean that paranoia is constructive, or that women on campus should go out at night carrying knives and wearing suits of armor. There is validity to the contention that this is one of the safer places to be going to school—that there just isn't going to be the frequency in the number of assaults that one would find in a more urban setting. It is important however, to realize that the possibility exists here, and to exercise a reasonable amount of caution. So if you're a woman going to Constantine's at 1:45 A.M. from Mission Park, bring a friend with you. Or if you're a Williams man at a Prospect party and know that there's a woman who has to walk over to Tyler, you might offer to hike over with her. It's important not to feel embarrassed about being afraid. As Williams women we all too often feel silly about asking our friends for protection.

If you do feel threatened, or have any questions about this issue, there are four trained counselors on campus who can be called at anytime: David Wood, Barb Tipping, Greg Campbell, and Melinda Ballou. Our numbers are in the Student Directory, and we maintain a policy of complete confidentiality. There are off-campus counselors also, if you would rather consult with them. Dean McIntire is in the process of putting together a pamphlet which will provide students with the procedures to follow in case of an attempted assault or rape.

The problem of rape is often approached irresponsibly or irrationally. As sensible human beings it's time that we grappled honestly and logically with this question, offering sensitivity and support to one another.

Sincerely,
Melinda-Carol Ballou '79

Literary compitince

To the editor:

As a compitent, perspiring, young Williams student and a Division III man myself, I am naturally very appaulled and annoyed upon an overview of the Winter Study Program course guide which kame out last week that I might find listed under "Special 12: Elementary Expository Writing", page 44. Such a deliberate, deflamatory slur and innuendo of the writing capacity and competence of Williams College students and especially we Division III-persons is entirely unexceptable, degradational, and unconformable upon this strata of education, especially on behalf of a Biology professor of all people, and just sends ripples of upwelling anger down my spine. I hope every body to boycot the course nobody wouldn't have got in here in the first place if they don't know how to fluidly use our mother tongue.

As all ways,
Richard Spicer '77

Bits and Pieces

Random thoughts while trying to write a Classics 101 paper in between tackles by Scott Perry and his Cincinnati Bengal defensive unit . . . With Tommy Casanova injured Scott got the call and turned in a solid, mistake-free performance. Best play was when Scott stopped Franco Harris on the one yard line early in the fourth quarter. Harris crumbled but Perry didn't budge . . . Opposing Steeler quarterback Mike Kruczeck from BC was Scott's roommate in Florida last year for the All America bowl game . . . Joining Scott on the Bengal squad are Brian MacInally from Harvard and Reggie Williams from Dartmouth. Archie Griffin must think he's playing with a bunch of professors . . .

. . . Dennis O'Shea's water polo team pulled off a stunning upset at Bowdoin this Saturday when they upended the host Polar Bears 9-7. Bowdoin had entered the game ranked No. 1 in Division II. Two hours later the natormen defeated UNH to enter the finals against BC. Playing their third game of the day with only a 15 minute rest between the last game they fell behind 8-1 but rallied in the second half to lose by a close 11-7 margin. This is only Williams third year of competition . . .

. . . Still on the subject of sports, did you know that the day our women's tennis and field hockey teams were playing bumper pool in the streets of Saratoga Springs over in Worcester Evel Knievel was successfully clearing ten buses in a Columbus Day jump before 10,000 oglers at Holy Cross' Fitton Field . . .

. . . A slap on the wrist and two tickets to the next Tavares concert for this reporter for incorrectly reporting that Cynthia Krizack had an interview scheduled at Hamilton College this past Saturday. A check with Kirkland Admissions revealed that the interview is scheduled for Saturday, December 4th . . .

. . . Food Services Director Ross Keller has encountered some rough seas in his dealings with the row houses. It seems he's trying to run them in the same manner as Greylock or Baxter, which indicates a basic misunderstanding of row house life. Although numerous meetings with row house cooks and stewards have filled his schedule the past few weeks, it's too early to tell if he's benefitted from these sessions . . .

. . . Other kitchen scuttlebut indicates that while Keller's made gains in his attempts to increase contact with the students, he's aggravated contact with his employees. Needless ordering fiascos and delivery miscues continue to abound. Several houses are also up in arms over his no rebate policy for special meals. At least the salad bar is on Mr. Keller's side . . .

. . . CEP sources indicate that the committee might have given approval to the Record's request for a reporter at meetings had not the Faculty Steering Committee entered the fray. Now we'll have to wait two months before the issue is resolved. And you thought bureaucracy was confined to Washington . . .

. . . Kudos to all involved in last weekend's musical and theatrical events. The frosh revue, especially the first act, was the best in four years . . . Likewise this year's edition of the yearbook . . . Frosh parents lent a touch of class to the Log both Friday and Saturday nights.

Sneak Preview: A Colloquium-workshop entitled "By Word of Mouth" scheduled for the 28th and 29th of Oct. promises to be one of the most innovative and fascinating ventures in quite a while.

Co-chairmen Philip Cantelon and Henry Art have assembled an impressive group of participants to lecture and discuss oral history and interviewing techniques in a variety of disciplines, including music, folklore, anthropology, psychology, and history.

The tone of the affair will be informal, featuring a number of workshops. Cantelon stresses that the weekend is being put on expressedly for students and encourages everyone, regardless of their experience, to partake in some of the sessions . . .

. . . Imponderables; Whatever happened to Gurgle? . . . Did anyone think they'd miss Ken's Market this much? . . . Why is the soccer team playing Tuft's at home tomorrow? . . . See you in Medford Saturday.

Clark to host Marlboro

On October 28 Music from Marlboro comes to Williamstown. Six outstanding soloists from the celebrated Marlboro Music Festival, which is under the artistic direction of Rudolf Serkin, will join for an evening of chamber music representative of the concerts which draw crowds from around the country to Marlboro, Vermont, each summer.

Founded in 1950 by three families bearing the famous musical names of Serkin, Busch and Moyse, the festival brings together for two months each summer leading musicians from all parts of the U.S. and many foreign countries. Both young professional musicians and mature artists come to Marlboro at their own expense to exchange ideas and explore together the vast repertoire of chamber music in an informal and intimate setting removed from the pressures of professional concert life. Marlboro is a kind of musical retreat or in the words of British critic Peter Hayworth, a place "where great musicians recharge their batteries."

The Music from Marlboro concerts since 1965 have offered a far wider audience a sample of the unusually varied instrumental and vocal programs and the spirit of music-making so characteristic of Marlboro. This year twenty-five outstanding artists are taking time from their individual activities to bring these programs to over thirty U.S. cities. The artists for the forthcoming program in Williamstown will present works by Dvorak, Wolf and Schoenberg.

The first concert in this year's series will take place at 8:30 on October 28 in the Clark Art Institute auditorium. Tickets are available at the Institute and are priced at $10 for the series of three concerts, or $3.50 for each. Students will be admitted free.

How to escape a rape

HOW TO SAY NO TO A RAPIST—AND SURVIVE, by Frederic Storaska
Random House, 231 pp., $7.95

Reviewed by Stephen Bernheim

During the past few weeks there has been a lot of talk and rumour going around about rape. Most of it has concerned itself with what the college administration can do to lessen the possibility of attack by having more street lights, tighter security and the like. All this is worthwhile, but the best chance a woman has is to read How to Say No to a Rapist—and Survive, by Frederic Storaska.

How to Say No ... is a clear and mature look at rape, rapists, and how women can begin to defend themselves. The author challenges many popular misconceptions, like the use of force during rape: "87 per cent of the time the rapist used verbal coercion to subdue his victim." This leads to what Storaska calls "the singly most important statement in the book—that the rapist is a human being." This forms the basis of the author's approach; try talking your way out before trying to bust your way out.

Storaska has a list of rules to follow which go against most of what women are learning today. This includes the victim's not antagonizing the rapist by yelling or screaming, not committing her behaviour by beating him on the face, and by her not doing anything unless she is sure it will work.

This book is filled with anecdotes about the author's travels across the country, lecturing to women's groups and colleges about rape prevention. Some of the stories are of clever ways by which women have managed to escape being raped: by pretending lesbianism, vomiting, feigning convulsions, death or disease.

Other chapters include advice on rape by close friends or relatives, child abuse, gang rapes and going for help afterwards, whether or not resistance has been successful. It is in this that the book is terribly successful and necessary. It covers the wide range of assaults possible against women, and offers solutions. Never prescribing an exact procedure, the author rather suggests patterns of thought, ways to approach particular types of situations. He relies in the end on the ingenuity of the woman to survive the situation. This too is a valuable step, for neither government nor police can eliminate rape entirely. Some men will always try to rape, and some women will always be their intended victims. How well prepared for this attack is the woman can make all the difference.

Though this book is by no means all a woman needs to repel a rapist, it is a necessary part of her protection.

Tax surplus revealed

by David R. Ross

The presentation to the College Council of the budgets of organizations requesting Student Activities Tax funds (starting with next Wednesday's meeting) is the last stage of an allocation process that began last May.

In May, CC Treasurer Clarence Otis requested organizations to submit preliminary budgets with estimates of the level of SAT funding they would be requesting. Since the start of classes this fall the College Council's Finance Committee has averaged three meetings a week, two hours a meeting in considering the final budgets of these organizations.

The committee has faced fewer financial constraints than in previous years. The increased enrollment this fall has brought in at least $1,000 additional SAT revenue this semester. More importantly, reversing a recent trend, the number of organizations requesting funds dropped from over 40 last year to 35 this year. The budget that was emerging from Finance Committee debates as the Record went to press contained a substantial surplus of unallocated funds.

According to Business Manager Shane Riorden, "The Student Activities Tax was seen as a way to free student organizations from the problems of fund raising. It had gotten to the point where most organizations spent more time raising funds than participating in their activities."

Before the tax, the question of how much money organizations would receive was determined by the individual actions of students. Removing the market mechanism, has created headaches for the relatively small groups charged with allocating the funds.

Through the 1960's, two committees distributed receipts from the tax (which stood at $30 per year). A faculty controlled committee used slightly more than half the funds to cover "organizations the faculty felt might be lost in the shuffle of student financing," said Riorden. A relatively small number of organizations were actually funded by the Finance Committee and the equivalent of the College Council.

The abolition of fraternities, which were the center of social activities on campus, led to increased demands on the tax by increasing numbers of organizations. By 1970, the SAT had been raised to $50.

Since then, the number of organizations requesting funds and the size of their requests have continued to increase dramatically. Yet, the tax rose only $6. According to Riorden, the Finance Committee, which took over the task of recommending SAT funding for all non-College funded organizations, was "saved" by the increase in the College's enrollment from about 1250 to 1850. However, "the growth years are over," Riorden said.

In allocating funds, the College Council has long struggled to establish solid policies in an attempt at consistency. It endorsed a report of the 1973-74 Finance Committee setting "procedures, considerations and guidelines" for funding. But, these guidelines have never become completely binding policies. This year's Finance Committee will present the policies it used in evaluating budgets and will later take up the task of more formally setting solid policies, Otis declared.

MIT stops Eph harriers' unbeaten streak at 23

by Frank Carr

Coach Tony Plansky's varsity runners were well on their way to a second straight undefeated season until Saturday in Boston where a powerful M.I.T. squad snapped the harriers' streak at 23. The Ephs fought a hard battle over the five-mile Franklin Park course, but were simply overwhelmed by the depth of their opponents. The disappointing loss was eased somewhat by the Ephs' convincing victory over Tufts. The final tally of the tri-meet showed M.I.T. with 24 points followed by Williams with 39 and Tufts with 73.

Frank Richardson, M.I.T.'s All-American, sprinted into the lead right from the gun and blazed through a 4:30 first mile, closely pursued by Williams junior Joe Kolb. Richardson continued his scorching pace for the entire distance and won easily with a time of 24:20. M.I.T.'s second and third men moved up to challenge Kolb after 2.5 miles but Kolb broke up a possible 1-2-3 M.I.T. sweep as he kicked into third place at 25:21. Captain Ken Leinbach crossed the finish line in fifth place (25:28) closely followed by Tufts' first man.

The next Williams finisher was Frank Carr in seventh place with a 25:54 clocking. Carr was chased to the line by a trio of M.I.T. runners with Dan Sullivan following in eleventh place at 26:14. Sophomore Steve Polasky and freshman Mike Behrman (in his first varsity race) finished right behind M.I.T.'s seventh man in 13th and 14th place respectively. Seniors Ed Bacher (19th) and Chris Flavin (20th) both outran Tufts' fifth man and Bert Saul added a 22nd place effort.

The Williams junior varsity came out victorious over M.I.T. 20-40, while Tufts was unable to field a full team. Freshman Rick Lane had an excellent second-place performance to lead a purple sweep of 2nd through 6th. Following Lane were Dave Seeger, Steve St. Clair, Hans Giesecke and John Duffield all with times under 17:30 for the 3.1 mile course. Russ Anderson placed ninth.

This Saturday, Williams will host the New England Small College Athletic Conference Cross Country Championships starting at 1 p.m. in the science quad.

For those wanting to watch the race, the course proceeds from the science quad, past the row houses along Route 2 and makes a left onto South Street. After passing the Clark Art Institute, the runners bear left onto Gale Road and then enter the Taconic Golf course for two loops around the perimeter. The runners will then come back on to Gale Rd. via a path through the woods and head up South St. and back to the science quad.

Netwomen raise record to 9-1

by Evan Bash

Taking their cue from a gusting wind blowing things around outside, the women's varsity tennis team moved indoors Saturday to blow away a good Middlebury team 8-1. Mother Nature also involved herself in a match played earlier in the week as the Ephwomen trounced Skidmore 7-0 with two matches not completed due to darkness. The two wins raised the team's record to 9-1, assuring them of yet another outstanding season.

Playing in Chapman Rink for the second consecutive Saturday, Coach Curt Tong's racketwomen did not have quite as easy a time against Middlebury as the final score might suggest, as five tie-breakers were contested.

Jonnina Sadoff led her teammates to victory once again as she scored a hard earned three-set win. Playing number two in the absence of Laura Carson, Rebecca Chase proved her worth with an easy 6-1, 6-4 win. Trudie tenBroeke and Amy Demorest both also had to move up one position, tenBroeke handled the assignment with a 7-5, 6-0 victory while Demorest met an outstanding Panther and dropped the only match of the day for the Ephs, a tough three-setter.

Forsaking the relative security of her strong doubles team, Sue Guttman moved up to number five singles and turned some heads with a fine 6-1, 6-3 win. Barb Ernst made it five singles wins for the Williams as she hung tough to win 7-6, 6-7, 6-3.

For the first time in a while the usually devastating Eph doubles teams had to struggle to victory. Sally Kruse and Babe Kirk slipped past their opponents 6-2, 4-6, 7-6 and the undefeated team of Holly Prentice and Amy Sterling managed a 7-6, 7-5 victory. The new doubles combination for the day, Sherry Willcox and Marion Sherman, needed a set to adjust to each other's style before recording a 2-6, 6-1, 6-1 triumph.

This is a big week for the Ephwomen as they close out their dual meet season with matches against Smith and Springfield. Both are strong teams and it will take some more exceptional play by the squad to lift their season win column into doubles figures and also allow Williams to put a strong claim in on the best small college women's tennis team in Massachusetts.

kickoff returners in New England. Brown brought back a kickoff 92 yards against Wesleyan to decide the contest.

Williams exploded for their biggest offensive output of the season in a 43-6 win over Tufts in medfors a year ago, as Don Wallace threw for nearly 250 yards, and three touchdowns.

Tufts, however, is a much-improved team and will be looking for revenge. The contest begins at 1:30 at Ellis Oval and it is fall break, should be a good Williams crowd present.

team was flat and simply not swimming. As a result, BC jumped to 5-0 and 8-1 first half leads. Williams rallied with six second half goals, only to have their efforts fall short.

For the tournament as a whole, co-captain Guy Hoelzer noted the cohesiveness of the squad and cited teamwork as an important factor in the victories. Dennis O'Shea, president of the club, stated that "the key to success was ball control . . . We were able to hang on and not panic; we had the patience to wait and advance the ball."

The club, in this tournament, exhibited encouraging signs of improvement with experience. Consistency and control are increasing with each passing game; a team unity is becoming evident in the pool. Perhaps more importantly though, the results of the weekend may lead to spots in the New Englands and Easterns later this fall.

Stickers skin Panthers, 5-1

by Nancy Rhein

In a terrific display of team effort, the Williams' field hockey team upset a tough Middlebury squad Saturday, 5-1.

Coming off an easy victory over Skidmore earlier this week, the Ephwomen used the same winning combination of a strong start and quick stickwork to defeat the Panthers.

Starting the game with aggressive drives on goal, the psyched-up offense took control of the scoring, opening with a rebound goal by co-captain Amy Kindwall.

Following Kindwall's goal, the determination of the team became clear as they hustled and moved the ball both offensively and defensively. The concentration of the Williams forwards near the Middlebury cage resulted in a visitor's foul, setting up the Eph's first short corner since the team began intense work on corner scoring this week. The practice paid off as Kindwall tallied for Williams bringing the score to 2-0 for the half.

In the second half, Middlebury crossed the ball and scored on a shot that any goalie would have had trouble stopping. After the Panthers' goal, Williams moved in on their goalie and scored on a hard drive off of the stick of inner Shailah Stewart.

Tasting victory, the Ephwomen turned it on, challenging the opponent's defense. Taking advantage of another corner situation, Stewart tallied for Williams. And, not to disappoint the cheering crowd Stewart added one more goal in the next minute to complete her hat-trick.

The three-goal second half showed the team at its best as coach Linda Wilkins noted, "They started trusting each other and backing each other up. The momentum was really forward."

Reaching their potential Saturday, the team finally let loose and really used the speed and talent they have possessed all season. As Wilkins put it, "This game was the highlight of our season."

Wrapping up their season Tuesday, Williams met Smith to finish the regular season 5-2. The team will complete the season with a North Eastern Field Hockey Association tourney October 30.

Row houses voice food complaints

Keller also alluded to certain sanitation problems, and organizational conflicts if row house cooks were allowed to run each house on his own basis.

"Decisions involving menu changes and substitutions will be made by unit managers and myself, in consultation with the house cooks," Keller said.

Keller proposed to minimize waste by reviewing orders with cooks. However, he explained that the six weeks of experience have not yet been enough for unit managers and the cooks to clearly define a pattern of overproduction.

First meeting Oct. 27

FinCom to open funding

by Jim Cohen

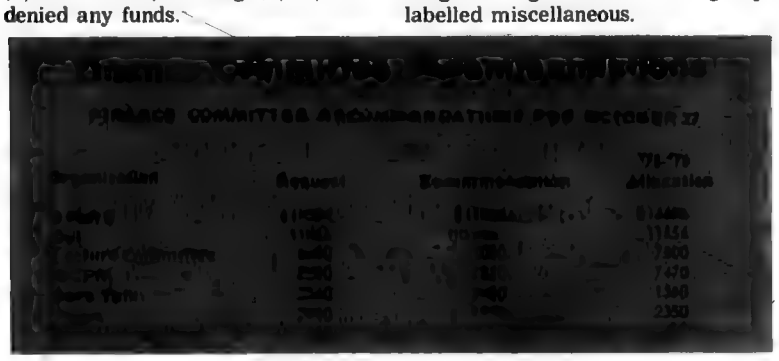
The Finance Committee will present the first of four sets of funding recommendations to the College Council next Wednesday, outlining budgets for eight organizations grouped as media and publications.

Recommendations for discussion Oct. 27 range from $13,308 for the Record to $160 for Free University. The committee decided to submit no recommendation for the Gul; the yearbook had requested $11,856.

The committee finished its deliberations this week, passing on requests from 35 organizations totalling $110,672 and setting general guidelines for presenting the budgets. Chairman Clarence Otis '77 said that he would outline policies for each category at the beginning of each CC meeting. "A finance committee member will present each organization's budget, answer questions and present our rationale."

Organization representatives will have five minutes to respond to Finance Committee comments. The council has set no limits on the time it will spend discussing each organization.

According to Otis and committee member Dave Ross '77, the committee made substantial cuts on requests from four organizations. Requesting $5,700, the Dance Society was granted $4,300. The Cap and Bells budget was reduced from $7,300 to $4,500. WHEW, seeking $1,050, was denied any funds.



In the media and publications category, the Back Talk budget was cut from $3,260 to $2,400. Otis said the committee reduced by 25 per cent the number of pages the literary magazine proposed to print.

"Last year they didn't turn anything down. The committee felt that it should maintain quality," the chairman said. He also noted that the preliminary request was based on two issues each semester. "They won't be able to do it this semester," he said.

The WCFM recommendation, slated for discussion Oct. 27, may be increased $200 to fund special programming.

Otis said he expects the CC to change the All-College Entertainment Committee (ACEC) recommendation when it is brought up with entertainment and service organizations Nov. 1. "Our recommendation was $12,000 for 2 rock concerts and two jazz concerts. A final rock concert allocation was contingent on how well they did on the first two concerts." Last week, the CC voted to underwrite the deficit for the Tavares cancellation and the Arlo Guthrie performance and the expected losses from the J. Geils concert at homecoming. A $12,000 allocation wouldn't be sufficient to cover these deficits and fund two more concerts.

On Nov. 8, the CC will discuss budgets for sports clubs, and political groups; on Nov. 9 they will consider religious organizations and groups labelled miscellaneous.

GUL funding postponed

by Ann McCabe

The Finance Committee voted Sunday night against making any recommendation to College Council on funding of the yearbook, Gulielmensian. On Wednesday, Oct. 27, committee member Bob Fox will present possible alternatives for funding, and CC will vote on the proposed options.

The options include: allocating $11,856 as a supplement to advertising revenue, having complete funding by student subscriptions, having the CC cover the cost of yearbooks for seniors and have anyone else who wants it subscribe.

"Our main purpose is to have a yearbook, not a senior book," stated Stew Read, co-editor of the Gul. He said he feels a full or part subscription system would force Gul to cater to seniors; "It would deeply cut into the quality of the book."

Gul is asking for funding of $11,856, the same as last year. The Gul also gained $1,100 in advertising revenue. It was one of the first years Gul had not run over its estimate, and Read said he believes costs should remain the same in the future.

Committee member Ross Cheit supported a subscription method because "the book is basically for seniors; there is not the demand from others, especially sophomores." In the past two years students have failed to pick up 200 to 500 books said Cheit. He said he believes these figures prove many students would not want the book if it was not so readily available. Bob Fox added "people who want it will pay for it"

Previously, money from the Student Activities Tax has been alloted to Gul. Read estimates the book costs about $7.50. According to Read this price could double through subscriptions because fixed costs like photography remain the same regardless of the number of subscriptions. The trouble of collecting subscriptions could end the book according to Read.

CC debates open meeting tax allocation

Open meetings and the Student Activities Tax dominated debate in the College Council Tuesday night. The representatives postponed the discussion of additional security measures until after the SAT allocation when they will meet with Security Officer O'Brien.

CC President Steve Piltch informed the Council that the Faculty Steering Committee will move that "meetings of standing committees will normally remain closed," but encourage "at least one open meeting per semester." The Council expressed its concern that the faculty had not considered the students on the committees when making this decision, and voted to draft a resolution to that effect, reaffirming previous stand on open meetings.

The Council approved a Finance committee plan reorganizing the SAT funding process. Beginning Wednesday October 27 the Council will consider the budget requests of a number of student organizations. At the meeting the Treasurer will outline the policy the FinCom used to determine the allocation. Following a FinCom statement of the club's request and the committee's recommendation, the officers of the club have five minutes in which to respond to the decision of the committee.

The CC will then deliberate and vote upon the committee's recommendation. If not approved, the Council may either set another figure, or return the matter to the FinCom.

In committee action, the council approved a Student Standing committee resolution to allow departmental majors to evaluate teachers before tenure decisions.

Students lose section choice

The Calendar and Schedule Committee decided Monday to deny section choices to students changing spring courses during the present revision period. Although approval of all course changes is virtually guaranteed, the committee decided that students who registered last spring should have priority in class hour and professor preferences in multi-section courses.

"We don't want to encourage students to make hasty course decisions in the spring," committee chairman Paul G. Clark said. By removing the option to state section preferences, the committee hoped to limit the number of course changes made during the fall revision period, according to committee member Sally Coney '78.

In remarks directed to the new committee members, Clark explained that computerizing the registration process brought out many questions of priority allocation. "When scheduling was done by hand," Clark told the committee, "there were a lot of priority decisions made. The computer program had to incorporate guidelines for making these decisions."

The program used in this fall's scheduling distributed freshmen evenly among the sections of multi-section courses. The computer then granted section preferences in the order of senior, junior, exchange, sophomore, special and graduate students.

The committee discussed the validity of this ordering system, deciding that only seniors should be given preference in granting future section requests. In scheduling of this spring's courses, the junior and sophomore classes will be pooled and the computer will consider their section preferences equally.

The decision to maintain senior priority was based on the "last chance" principle. Seniors may have no other opportunity to be in a particularly desirable professor's class and should therefore be granted priority in section requests, the committee decided.

Discussing the policy of equal distribution of freshmen among sections, the committee was unable to reach any conclusions. According to Registrar George C. Howard, the computer program initially assigned freshmen lowest priority resulting in a clustering of freshmen in the least desirable sections. Revision of the program eliminated the inequity by placing equal numbers of freshmen in each section.

Keller answers food critics

Director of College Food Services Ross Keller responded to criticisms of row house services raised at the Housing Committee meeting Monday.

Gary James, representing 16 row house presidents, indicated that the major problem in the smaller dining houses was the lack of autonomy and flexibility in planning and preparing menus. He objected to the practice of trying to run these houses as though they were major dining halls. Keller said that it costs considerably more to feed row house students than those in large dining halls and the only means of controlling the economic limitations were through a somewhat standardized menu or budgeting a certain sum per student for daily meals.

"It is ridiculous to consider the latter," Keller stated. "Therefore, there must be some standardization if we are to operate within the proposed budget. However, I am in no way trying to make the row houses identical in terms of preparation or tradition."

Dean Roosenraad added, "If a strictly economic decision had been made, all row houses would have been closed. In order to make an overall improvement, we have to accept some changes."

Keller went on to say that his principle responsibility was to provide palatable food for the students at regular dining times. He reported that this purpose was overshadowed last year by $21,000 to $22,000 worth of over-the-counter food sales, which cost the college over $5,000 in payroll. He said he felt it his job to overcome this loss through better planning and organization.

Pinello addresses WGSO

"I'm thrilled the WGSO exists here at Williams," claimed Dan Pinello '72, a lawyer and gay rights worker. "I think it is vital for the community."

Pinello, lesbian Mary Stevens and Williams Gay Support Organization co-founder John Atteridg '76 discussed homosexuality with an audience in Driscoll lounge Sunday. The WGSO-sponsored program sought to "initiate gay-straight dialogue on campus."

The discussion focused on coming out—telling family, friends and the world in general that one is gay. "It's a very personal decision," said Pinello, "and is irrevocable." Often, the results are painful: a temporary or permanent alienation from family and acquaintances. But, as an audience member noted, "Parents and family are aware of more things than we might realize. A family may work itself out without confrontation." In any case, as Pinello noted, "People have a tremendous ability to adapt. People respect honesty and candor."

Panelists cited several advantages of coming out. First of all, Atteridg said, "It ends one's two-faced attitude and gives people a chance to accept you."

"Only if we are in the open," Pinello continued, "will people be able to say that homosexuals are the same as other people. It will not come home that there is no difference until a person knows one personally."

"The basic problem is one-parent child raising, not the lack of a male figure or my attitude," responded Stevens, a mother and law student, when asked about the effect of her homosexuality on her little girl. "My parents," she continued, "tried to raise me straight, but it didn't work. I tried everything." Stevens has been married twice to men whom she "loved but not physically." A gay member of the audience said that he had "married for cover. If you're married, you're not gay." "I enjoy raising children though," Stevens concluded, "and (my daughter) seems very straight."

Participants also mentioned the rigid "American attitude towards sexuality," which views people as "either homosexual or heterosexual but not both." Europeans, it was noted by someone in the audience, have not drawn such tight lines, and bisexuality is more acceptable than it is here. Pinello continued, "Gender does not make too much of a difference. If a person is exciting and vibrant, we can have a good relationship which involves sensuality."

Living in New York City, Pinello finds that "people are developing open-minded attitudes there." In most other places, he noted, things are different, and "Show me a shmo and I'll kill him" is the prevailing attitude.

A Wasted Winter?

It is difficult to criticize the Winter Study Program at an institution like Williams where, for many, it provides a much needed respite from the educational rigors typically encountered during the rest of the year. Nevertheless, a common complaint on campus this week has come from students who have looked through the 1977 WSP catalogue and arrived at the conclusion that there are very few projects in it that they would really like to take.

The concept of the Winter Study Program has such a basic appeal to most students and faculty alike that disturbing trends in how the month of January is actually being used are easily overlooked. The WSP here has been undergoing a subtle but annoying change over the past few years. It seems that the projects being offered each year are more academic than those of the previous year while, at the same time, being less intellectually creative and stimulating.

Winter Study projects, as stated in the College Bulletin, are "designed to vary the pace and texture of the more traditional academic offerings and methods of presentation." Yet the vast majority of this year's projects will be held in normal or near-normal classroom situations. Furthermore, the trend seems to be to make their content more closely resemble that found in regular courses.

Winter Study provides a unique opportunity for students and faculty to get out of rigid classroom situations. Such opportunities should not be squandered. It's truly a shame that a college community as talented as ours can't come up with a list of Winter Study projects which will not merely be apathetically accepted, but rather enthusiastically endorsed by the student body.

Burns appointed to Carter committee

The Democratic National Committee has appointed Professor James MacGregor Burns to a committee of university educators in support of the Carter-Mondale Presidential ticket, the National Committee announced last week.

The educators' committee, composed of sixteen members associated with schools in the New England area, will concentrate its efforts in that area. Other members of the committee include Professors Henry Steele Commager and John Kenneth Galbraith.

Girl still missing; rumors unfounded

Cynthia Krizack, a 17 year old Williamstown girl missing since the night of October 7, had not been found by Monday afternoon according to Massachusetts State Trooper Jack Flaherty. The State Police are cooperating with the Williamstown Police in the search, with unofficial FBI aid, said Flaherty.

Rumors that Cynthia was found Sunday, that a book belonging to her was found near Cole Pond, and that blood was found in the Roper Center parking lot are totally unfounded, according to College Security Director Walter O'Brien.

Cynthia is 5'4" tall, with blue eyes and brown hair, and was last seen wearing blue jeans. Anyone with information concerning her whereabouts should contact the Williamstown Police at 458-5733.

Officers available at flat rates

Residential houses wishing to have parties will now pay a flat rather than hourly rate for the hiring of security officers, according to Business Manager Shane Riorden. The change involves an increase in the rates paid to hired officers, which will be absorbed by the College.

According to Riorden, the College will now consider security duty at house parties as overtime work, and payment to officers will be on a time-and-a-half basis. Houses will pay a flat rate of $21 for security at weekend parties, and $28 for parties on weekday nights. The difference between the flat rate and full overtime pay will be covered by the College.

The College initiated the wage changes in an attempt to compensate security officers on a more equitable basis, according to Riorden. Previously, houses paid security officers on an hourly basis, standard rates being $5 an hour before midnight and $6 an hour afterward.

Riorden estimated the expected extra cost to the College due to the change in the rate system to range anywhere from $500 to $1000. "Since the number and size of parties are variable, we can't really give a specific estimate," he claimed.

Rape attitude

To the editor:

From my perspective as a rape crisis counselor trained in North Adams last spring, it seems important to address myself to two groups of individuals on campus: firstly to the smug, unruffled members of our community who fail to recognize the possibility of a rape occurring on campus. Secondly, I direct myself to those who, since the "rape panic" several weeks ago are afraid to step out-of-doors.

The pristine image of Williamstown as "the village beautiful" fosters a dangerous sense of complacency which ought to be dispelled. Obviously we're not living in New York City, or Boston, or Washington, D.C. One of the reasons many of us came to Williams was to escape the brutal realities of an urban life. But the potential exists here, as in the city, for the crimes of robbery, assault and rape. How often do you leave your room unlocked? Or walk home alone at 1:00, 2:00 or 4:00 A.M.?

Several weeks ago The Record published an article with the headline: "Rape Panic Unjustified". Although the report itself was responsible and well-researched, the title was somewhat misleading. Last week a letter to the editor began, "I can't help feeling that the 'rape problem' at Williams has been blown out of proportion" and concluded, "relative to the rest of academia—the Purple Valley is the land of tranquillity". The most obvious message contained in Dana's letter and The Record headline is something we all want to hear in order to continue living our insulated lives of drowsy unconcern: "Don't worry—rapes don't occur around Williamstown very often (if at all), and the incidence of it is so small as to be practically negligible in terms of its effect on the campus community".

What is most disturbing about this attitude is the emphasis placed on the quantity of incidents rather than the impact of such a traumatic experience upon the individual. How can the Purple Valley be characterized as a "land of tranquillity" if there are reported rapes occurring frequently enough to support the existence of a rape crisis counseling center in North Adams? If there was only one victim in all Berkshire County, and she happened to be your mother, girlfriend, or little brother could you consider a rape panic to be "unjustified"?

I don't mean that paranoia is constructive, or that women on campus should go out at night carrying knives and wearing suits of armor. There is validity to the contention that this is one of the safer places to be going to school—that there just isn't going to be the frequency in the number of assaults that one would find in a more urban setting. It is important however, to realize that the possibility exists here, and to exercise a reasonable amount of caution. So if you're a woman going to Constantine's at 1:45 A.M. from Mission Park, bring a friend with you. Or if you're a Williams man at a Prospect party and know that there's a woman who has to walk over to Tyler, you might offer to hike over with her. It's important not to feel embarrassed about being afraid. As Williams women we all too often feel silly about asking our friends for protection.

If you do feel threatened, or have any questions about this issue, there are four trained counselors on campus who can be called at anytime: David Wood, Barb Tipping, Greg Campbell, and Melinda Ballou. Our numbers are in the Student Directory, and we maintain a policy of complete confidentiality. There are off-campus counselors also, if you would rather consult with them. Dean McIntire is in the process of putting together a pamphlet which will provide students with the procedures to follow in case of an attempted assault or rape.

The problem of rape is often approached irresponsibly or irrationally. As sensible human beings it's time that we grappled honestly and logically with this question, offering sensitivity and support to one another.

Sincerely,
Melinda-Carol Ballou '79

Literary compitince

To the editor:

As a compitent, perspiring, young Williams student and a Division III man myself, I am naturally very appaulled and annoyed upon an overview of the Winter Study Program course guide which kame out last week that I might find listed under "Special 12: Elementary Expository Writing", page 44. Such a deliberate, deflamatory slur and innuendo of the writing capacity and competence of Williams College students and especially we Division III-persons is entirely unexceptable, degradational, and unconformable upon this strata of education, especially on behalf of a Biology professor of all people, and just sends ripples of upwelling anger down my spine. I hope every body to boycot the course nobody wouldn't have got in here in the first place if they don't know how to fluidly use our mother tongue.

As all ways,

Bits and Pieces

Random thoughts while trying to write a Classics 101 paper in between tackles by Scott Perry and his Cincinnati Bengal defensive unit . . . With Tommy Casanova injured Scott got the call and turned in a solid, mistake-free performance. Best play was when Scott stopped Franco Harris on the one yard line early in the fourth quarter. Harris crumbled but Perry didn't budge . . . Opposing Steeler quarterback Mike Kruczeck from BC was Scott's roommate in Florida last year for the All America bowl game . . . Joining Scott on the Bengal squad are Brian MacInally from Harvard and Reggie Williams from Dartmouth. Archie Griffin must think he's playing with a bunch of professors . . .

. . . Dennis O'Shea's water polo team pulled off a stunning upset at Bowdoin this Saturday when they upended the host Polar Bears 9-7. Bowdoin had entered the game ranked No. 1 in Division II. Two hours later the natormen defeated UNH to enter the finals against BC. Playing their third game of the day with only a 15 minute rest between the last game they fell behind 8-1 but rallied in the second half to lose by a close 11-7 margin. This is only Williams third year of competition . . .

. . . Still on the subject of sports, did you know that the day our women's tennis and field hockey teams were playing bumper pool in the streets of Saratoga Springs over in Worcester Evel Knievel was successfully clearing ten buses in a Columbus Day jump before 10,000 oglers at Holy Cross' Fitton Field . . .

. . . A slap on the wrist and two tickets to the next Tavares concert for this reporter for incorrectly reporting that Cynthia Krizack had an interview scheduled at Hamilton College this past Saturday. A check with Kirkland Admissions revealed that the interview is scheduled for Saturday, December 4th . . .

. . . Food Services Director Ross Keller has encountered some rough seas in his dealings with the row houses. It seems he's trying to run them in the same manner as Greylock or Baxter, which indicates a basic misunderstanding of row house life. Although numerous meetings with row house cooks and stewards have filled his schedule the past few weeks, it's too early to tell if he's benefitted from these sessions . . .

. . . Other kitchen scuttlebut indicates that while Keller's made gains in his attempts to increase contact with the students, he's aggravated contact with his employees. Needless ordering fiascos and delivery miscues continue to abound. Several houses are also up in arms over his no rebate policy for special meals. At least the salad bar is on Mr. Keller's side . . .

. . . CEP sources indicate that the committee might have given approval to the Record's request for a reporter at meetings had not the Faculty Steering Committee entered the fray. Now we'll have to wait two months before the issue is resolved. And you thought bureaucracy was confined to Washington . . .

. . . Kudos to all involved in last weekend's musical and theatrical events. The frosh revue, especially the first act, was the best in four years . . . Likewise this year's edition of the yearbook . . . Frosh parents lent a touch of class to the Log both Friday and Saturday nights.

Sneak Preview: A Colloquium-workshop entitled "By Word of Mouth" scheduled for the 28th and 29th of Oct. promises to be one of the most innovative and fascinating ventures in quite a while.

Co-chairmen Philip Cantelon and Henry Art have assembled an impressive group of participants to lecture and discuss oral history and interviewing techniques in a variety of disciplines, including music, folklore, anthropology, psychology, and history.

The tone of the affair will be informal, featuring a number of workshops. Cantelon stresses that the weekend is being put on expressedly for students and encourages everyone, regardless of their experience, to partake in some of the sessions . . .

. . . Imponderables; Whatever happened to Gurgle? . . . Did anyone think they'd miss Ken's Market this much? . . . Why is the soccer team playing Tuft's at home tomorrow? . . . See you in Medford Saturday.

Clark to host Marlboro

On October 28 Music from Marlboro comes to Williamstown. Six outstanding soloists from the celebrated Marlboro Music Festival, which is under the artistic direction of Rudolf Serkin, will join for an evening of chamber music representative of the concerts which draw crowds from around the country to Marlboro, Vermont, each summer.

Founded in 1950 by three families bearing the famous musical names of Serkin, Busch and Moyse, the festival brings together for two months each summer leading musicians from all parts of the U.S. and many foreign countries. Both young professional musicians and mature artists come to Marlboro at their own expense to exchange ideas and explore together the vast repertoire of chamber music in an informal and intimate setting removed from the pressures of professional concert life. Marlboro is a kind of musical retreat or in the words of British critic Peter Hayworth, a place "where great musicians recharge their batteries."

The Music from Marlboro concerts since 1965 have offered a far wider audience a sample of the unusually varied instrumental and vocal programs and the spirit of music-making so characteristic of Marlboro. This year twenty-five outstanding artists are taking time from their individual activities to bring these programs to over thirty U.S. cities. The artists for the forthcoming program in Williamstown will present works by Dvorak, Wolf and Schoenberg.

The first concert in this year's series will take place at 8:30 on October 28 in the Clark Art Institute auditorium. Tickets are available at the Institute and are priced at $10 for the series of three concerts, or $3.50 for each. Students will be admitted free.

Say no and survive

How to escape a rape

HOW TO SAY NO TO A RAPIST—AND SURVIVE, by Frederic Storaska
Random House, 231 pp., $7.95

Reviewed by Stephen Bernheim

During the past few weeks there has been a lot of talk and rumour going around about rape. Most of it has concerned itself with what the college administration can do to lessen the possibility of attack by having more street lights, tighter security and the like. All this is worthwhile, but the best chance a woman has is to read How to Say No to a Rapist—and Survive, by Frederic Storaska.

How to Say No ... is a clear and mature look at rape, rapists, and how women can begin to defend themselves. The author challenges many popular misconceptions, like the use of force during rape: "87 per cent of the time the rapist used verbal coercion to subdue his victim." This leads to what Storaska calls "the singly most important statement in the book—that the rapist is a human being." This forms the basis of the author's approach; try talking your way out before trying to bust your way out.

Storaska has a list of rules to follow which go against most of what women are learning today. This includes the victim's not antagonizing the rapist by yelling or screaming, not committing her behaviour by beating him on the face, and by her not doing anything unless she is sure it will work.

This book is filled with anecdotes about the author's travels across the country, lecturing to women's groups and colleges about rape prevention. Some of the stories are of clever ways by which women have managed to escape being raped: by pretending lesbianism, vomiting, feigning convulsions, death or disease.

Other chapters include advice on rape by close friends or relatives, child abuse, gang rapes and going for help afterwards, whether or not resistance has been successful. It is in this that the book is terribly successful and necessary. It covers the wide range of assaults possible against women, and offers solutions. Never prescribing an exact procedure, the author rather suggests patterns of thought, ways to approach particular types of situations. He relies in the end on the ingenuity of the woman to survive the situation. This too is a valuable step, for neither government nor police can eliminate rape entirely. Some men will always try to rape, and some women will always be their intended victims. How well prepared for this attack is the woman can make all the difference.

Though this book is by no means all a woman needs to repel a rapist, it is a necessary part of her protection.

Tax surplus revealed

by David R. Ross

The presentation to the College Council of the budgets of organizations requesting Student Activities Tax funds (starting with next Wednesday's meeting) is the last stage of an allocation process that began last May.

In May, CC Treasurer Clarence Otis requested organizations to submit preliminary budgets with estimates of the level of SAT funding they would be requesting. Since the start of classes this fall the College Council's Finance Committee has averaged three meetings a week, two hours a meeting in considering the final budgets of these organizations.

The committee has faced fewer financial constraints than in previous years. The increased enrollment this fall has brought in at least $1,000 additional SAT revenue this semester. More importantly, reversing a recent trend, the number of organizations requesting funds dropped from over 40 last year to 35 this year. The budget that was emerging from Finance Committee debates as the Record went to press contained a substantial surplus of unallocated funds.

According to Business Manager Shane Riorden, "The Student Activities Tax was seen as a way to free student organizations from the problems of fund raising. It had gotten to the point where most organizations spent more time raising funds than participating in their activities."

Before the tax, the question of how much money organizations would receive was determined by the individual actions of students. Removing the market mechanism, has created headaches for the relatively small groups charged with allocating the funds.

Through the 1960's, two committees distributed receipts from the tax (which stood at $30 per year). A faculty controlled committee used slightly more than half the funds to cover "organizations the faculty felt might be lost in the shuffle of student financing," said Riorden. A relatively small number of organizations were actually funded by the Finance Committee and the equivalent of the College Council.

The abolition of fraternities, which were the center of social activities on campus, led to increased demands on the tax by increasing numbers of organizations. By 1970, the SAT had been raised to $50.

Since then, the number of organizations requesting funds and the size of their requests have continued to increase dramatically. Yet, the tax rose only $6. According to Riorden, the Finance Committee, which took over the task of recommending SAT funding for all non-College funded organizations, was "saved" by the increase in the College's enrollment from about 1250 to 1850. However, "the growth years are over," Riorden said.

In allocating funds, the College Council has long struggled to establish solid policies in an attempt at consistency. It endorsed a report of the 1973-74 Finance Committee setting "procedures, considerations and guidelines" for funding. But, these guidelines have never become completely binding policies. This year's Finance Committee will present the policies it used in evaluating budgets and will later take up the task of more formally setting solid policies, Otis declared.

MIT stops Eph harriers' unbeaten streak at 23

by Frank Carr

Coach Tony Plansky's varsity runners were well on their way to a second straight undefeated season until Saturday in Boston where a powerful M.I.T. squad snapped the harriers' streak at 23. The Ephs fought a hard battle over the five-mile Franklin Park course, but were simply overwhelmed by the depth of their opponents. The disappointing loss was eased somewhat by the Ephs' convincing victory over Tufts. The final tally of the tri-meet showed M.I.T. with 24 points followed by Williams with 39 and Tufts with 73.

Frank Richardson, M.I.T.'s All-American, sprinted into the lead right from the gun and blazed through a 4:30 first mile, closely pursued by Williams junior Joe Kolb. Richardson continued his scorching pace for the entire distance and won easily with a time of 24:20. M.I.T.'s second and third men moved up to challenge Kolb after 2.5 miles but Kolb broke up a possible 1-2-3 M.I.T. sweep as he kicked into third place at 25:21. Captain Ken Leinbach crossed the finish line in fifth place (25:28) closely followed by Tufts' first man.

The next Williams finisher was Frank Carr in seventh place with a 25:54 clocking. Carr was chased to the line by a trio of M.I.T. runners with Dan Sullivan following in eleventh place at 26:14. Sophomore Steve Polasky and freshman Mike Behrman (in his first varsity race) finished right behind M.I.T.'s seventh man in 13th and 14th place respectively. Seniors Ed Bacher (19th) and Chris Flavin (20th) both outran Tufts' fifth man and Bert Saul added a 22nd place effort.

The Williams junior varsity came out victorious over M.I.T. 20-40, while Tufts was unable to field a full team. Freshman Rick Lane had an excellent second-place performance to lead a purple sweep of 2nd through 6th. Following Lane were Dave Seeger, Steve St. Clair, Hans Giesecke and John Duffield all with times under 17:30 for the 3.1 mile course. Russ Anderson placed ninth.

This Saturday, Williams will host the New England Small College Athletic Conference Cross Country Championships starting at 1 p.m. in the science quad.

For those wanting to watch the race, the course proceeds from the science quad, past the row houses along Route 2 and makes a left onto South Street. After passing the Clark Art Institute, the runners bear left onto Gale Road and then enter the Taconic Golf course for two loops around the perimeter. The runners will then come back on to Gale Rd. via a path through the woods and head up South St. and back to the science quad.

Netwomen raise record to 9-1

by Evan Bash

Taking their cue from a gusting wind blowing things around outside, the women's varsity tennis team moved indoors Saturday to blow away a good Middlebury team 8-1. Mother Nature also involved herself in a match played earlier in the week as the Ephwomen trounced Skidmore 7-0 with two matches not completed due to darkness. The two wins raised the team's record to 9-1, assuring them of yet another outstanding season.

Playing in Chapman Rink for the second consecutive Saturday, Coach Curt Tong's racketwomen did not have quite as easy a time against Middlebury as the final score might suggest, as five tie-breakers were contested.

Jonnina Sadoff led her teammates to victory once again as she scored a hard earned three-set win. Playing number two in the absence of Laura Carson, Rebecca Chase proved her worth with an easy 6-1, 6-4 win. Trudie tenBroeke and Amy Demorest both also had to move up one position, tenBroeke handled the assignment with a 7-5, 6-0 victory while Demorest met an outstanding Panther and dropped the only match of the day for the Ephs, a tough three-setter.

Forsaking the relative security of her strong doubles team, Sue Guttman moved up to number five singles and turned some heads with a fine 6-1, 6-3 win. Barb Ernst made it five singles wins for the Williams as she hung tough to win 7-6, 6-7, 6-3.

For the first time in a while the usually devastating Eph doubles teams had to struggle to victory. Sally Kruse and Babe Kirk slipped past their opponents 6-2, 4-6, 7-6 and the undefeated team of Holly Prentice and Amy Sterling managed a 7-6, 7-5 victory. The new doubles combination for the day, Sherry Willcox and Marion Sherman, needed a set to adjust to each other's style before recording a 2-6, 6-1, 6-1 triumph.

This is a big week for the Ephwomen as they close out their dual meet season with matches against Smith and Springfield. Both are strong teams and it will take some more exceptional play by the squad to lift their season win column into doubles figures and also allow Williams to put a strong claim in on the best small college women's tennis team in Massachusetts.

Williams exploded for their biggest offensive output of the season in a 43-6 win over Tufts in medfors a year ago, as Don Wallace threw for nearly 250 yards, and three touchdowns.

Tufts, however, is a much-improved team and will be looking for revenge. The contest begins at 1:30 at Ellis Oval and it is fall break, should be a good Williams crowd present.

team was flat and simply not swimming. As a result, BC jumped to 5-0 and 8-1 first half leads. Williams rallied with six second half goals, only to have their efforts fall short.

For the tournament as a whole, co-captain Guy Hoelzer noted the cohesiveness of the squad and cited teamwork as an important factor in the victories. Dennis O'Shea, president of the club, stated that "the key to success was ball control . . . We were able to hang on and not panic; we had the patience to wait and advance the ball."

The club, in this tournament, exhibited encouraging signs of improvement with experience. Consistency and control are increasing with each passing game; a team unity is becoming evident in the pool. Perhaps more importantly though, the results of the weekend may lead to spots in the New Englands and Easterns later this fall.

Stickers skin Panthers, 5-1

by Nancy Rhein

In a terrific display of team effort, the Williams' field hockey team upset a tough Middlebury squad Saturday, 5-1.

Coming off an easy victory over Skidmore earlier this week, the Ephwomen used the same winning combination of a strong start and quick stickwork to defeat the Panthers.

Starting the game with aggressive drives on goal, the psyched-up offense took control of the scoring, opening with a rebound goal by co-captain Amy Kindwall.

Following Kindwall's goal, the determination of the team became clear as they hustled and moved the ball both offensively and defensively. The concentration of the Williams forwards near the Middlebury cage resulted in a visitor's foul, setting up the Eph's first short corner since the team began intense work on corner scoring this week. The practice paid off as Kindwall tallied for Williams bringing the score to 2-0 for the half.

In the second half, Middlebury crossed the ball and scored on a shot that any goalie would have had trouble stopping. After the Panthers' goal, Williams moved in on their goalie and scored on a hard drive off of the stick of inner Shailah Stewart.

Tasting victory, the Ephwomen turned it on, challenging the opponent's defense. Taking advantage of another corner situation, Stewart tallied for Williams. And, not to disappoint the cheering crowd Stewart added one more goal in the next minute to complete her hat-trick.

The three-goal second half showed the team at its best as coach Linda Wilkins noted, "They started trusting each other and backing each other up. The momentum was really forward."

Reaching their potential Saturday, the team finally let loose and really used the speed and talent they have possessed all season. As Wilkins put it, "This game was the highlight of our season."

Wrapping up their season Tuesday, Williams met Smith to finish the regular season 5-2. The team will complete the season with a North Eastern Field Hockey Association tourney October 30.

Keller also alluded to certain sanitation problems, and organizational conflicts if row house cooks were allowed to run each house on his own basis.

"Decisions involving menu changes and substitutions will be made by unit managers and myself, in consultation with the house cooks," Keller said.

Keller proposed to minimize waste by reviewing orders with cooks. However, he explained that the six weeks of experience have not yet been enough for unit managers and the cooks to clearly define a pattern of overproduction.

Footballers blank Bowdoin

by Tim Layden

One victory, sunny-side up, preferably on a silver platter is what the Williams varsity football team ordered for their trip to Bowdoin Saturday. And the Polar Bears obliged, serving up a pair of fumbles inside their own ten yard-line leading to the only scores in a 13-0 Eph win.

In topping the surprisingly tough hosts of the North, Williams evened their season record at 2-2, averted the first three-game losing streak of Bob Odell's Williams career and kept on track with the 1973 squad which went 1-2 and 6-2.

Williams was only slightly more impressive than in previous losses to Middlebury and Trinity, and only the two Bowdoin fumbles averted a 0-0 tie. "Bowdoin was not a bad football team, but they go out on to the field expecting to get beat," said mentor Bob Odell, who has never lost to the Polar Bears.

Williams launched their first drive of the game late in the first quarter, moving from their own 45 to the Bowdoin 21, almost entirely on the ground, led by Scott Harrington. Here, however things hit an impasse, and Wallace tried to hit Kurt Anderson with a short third-down toss.

The pass was overthrown and intercepted by Bowdoin safety Andy Minich, who, in an act of unparalleled generosity,fumbled the ball. Anderson recovered and Williams was back in opposition at the hosts five.

A Scott Harrington plunge from the two a couple plays later put Williams in front as Kevin Cramer added the conversion. "We were just fortunate to have the ball bounce our way," said Odell.

Early in the fourth quarter Bowdoin safety Jim Campbell dropped a Peter Unger punt on his own five, where Peter Hansbury recovered. Campbell undoubtedly had a couple grand down on the game and seven points wasn't enough. Wallace fired five yards to Kurt Anderson for the score and Cramer's placement was wide to the left.

For the fourth straight week, though, the Purple offense was lackluster, piling up just over 240 yards. Both split end Herb McCormick and quarterback Wallace were bottled up by the Bowdoin defense. "We were pleased to get on the board," said Odell, "but we're still not where we'd like to be."

The Purple defense was impressive, despite yielding a seasonal high of 269 yards, including 174 on the ground. Tackles Pete Tuttle and Mike Powers played strong games as did safties Dave Libardi and Todd Nelp.

Williams limited Bowdoin star tailback Jim Soule to just 85 yards on 27 rugged carries, but was hurt by dark horse fullback Dave Seward's 70 on 16 carries.

The homecoming win over Bowdoin laid to rest any thoughts which Eph dissenters might have held of a 1-7 season, but another tough foe lies ahead. The Ephs will make their second straight excursion to Medford, Mass. to face Tufts.

Williams will make the trip without the services of backup quarterback Bill Whelan who has suffered his second shoulder separation at Williams. The frustrated junior is out indefinitely.

"Their whole squad is better than they've ever been," says Odell of Tufts. The Jumbos have already posted upset wins over Wesleyan and Norwich and sport a 2-2 record. "They're physically much stronger than us," remarks Odell.

Leading the Tufts attack will be senior running back Tim Whelan (cousin of Bill). Whelan rushed for over 1,000 yards last year and has three 100-yard games under his belt this season. The 5'9", 180-pounder was held to (-7) yards on 14 carries in the Williams game a year ago.

Also in the Tufts backfield will be senior quarterback Bob Berluti and underrated fullback Mike Colonna, a capable sidekick for Whelan.

The most dangerous Tufts weapon, however, is seen in the person of senior defensive back Darryl Brown, who is one of the quickest punt and

Purple booters dominate Bates, 3-1 but Polar Bears rally to gain 2-2 tie

by Mark Pogue

Williams' varsity soccer squad collected a win and a tie on its businessman's road trip to Maine last weekend, beating Bates College by 3-1 before tying Bowdoin, 2-2. Led by an offense which lost 46 shots and 15 corner kicks against the Maine goalies, the Purple dominated large parts of both games while improving its 1976 mark to 3-2-1.

A lousy field and steady downpour greeted Williams as it deported the bus for Friday's game with Bates, but the Purple found its controlled-passing game unimpaired and quickly established control of the action. Starting goalkeeper Jay Loeffler was stung by a Bates score with 16:04 gone in the first half, but Williams tied things two minutes later when Pete Barra slapped a knee-high feed from Perry Nelson into the Bates net. Ephman Hank Osborne made it 2-1 three minutes later when he dribbled some stuff past three Bates fullbacks and nailed the far post. Ephman John Friborg made it 3-1 one minute later when he threw himself feet-first into a Jim Hield free kick and punched the ball by Bates' shellshocked goalie.

Williams retained command of the game in the second half of play but could not pad its lead. "The only disappointment was our failure to score again in the second half," said Coach Jeff Vennell of the Bates contest. "It could easily have been a four- or five-goal game."

The booters rolled out of the scenic Brunswick Holiday Inn at 7:00 the next morning for their game with the Bowdoin Polar Bears, a team which beat the Ephs in 1975 on the strength of only four shots. Williams intended to exploit its front-line speed by swinging the ball around the Bears' lumbering wing fullbacks, but this tactic failed in the first half because the Ephs carried the ball too far down the middle of the field before dropping it outside. Throughout the half, both teams put on a dazzling display of passwork and tackling at midfield—"beautiful" in Vennell's eyes—but with Osborne closely watched by backfield patrol Bears the Eph attack slowed and the half ended scoreless.

Jim Hield broke Bowdoin goalie Geoff Stout's two-year charm on Williams when he scored off a Friborg assist 6:56 into the second half. The Purple made the lead stand up for 30 minutes, but Steve Clark of tiny Williamstown, Mass. tied things for Bowdoin on a goal at 37:52. Ephman Perry Nelson got the lead back a minute later when he knocked in an Osborne rebound, but the Bears regrouped once more and finally evened things on a pretty shot by David Quinlin with 5:07 left in regulation. The schools called it a 2-2 draw after neither could score in 20 minutes of overtime play. The tie left the Polar Bears at 6-0-1.

In the freshman game played Saturday, The Parents saw their boys fall to the Vassar varsity by a 3-1 count. Paul Tratnyek's score for the Purple could not offset the skills of four Africans and two Greeks who sparked the visitors.

Eph polomen sink UNH, Bowdoin; outscored by BC

by Ray Porfilio

The weekend trek to Bowdoin was well worth the time of the Williams Water Polo Club. In a tournament with B.C., Bowdoin, and UNH, Williams emerged with impressive 9-7 and 18-4 victories over Bowdoin and UNH respectively, and a tough 11-7 loss to BC.

The tourney raised Williams' 1976 overall record to 3-4, with a conference standing of 3-1.

Bowdoin, second in the New Englands and Easterns last year, and currently ranked fourth in New England, had its problems with a fired up Williams club. The 9-7 final does not reflect the control of the game exhibited by the Ephs. Jeff Brinker, the goalie, was ejected with just under three minutes to play. With Phil Wild gallantly in goal, and behind John Farmakis's five goals, Williams held on to upset the highly touted Polar Bears.

The second game was nolo contendre from the outset, as seven Wild goals paced Williams to the 18-4 domination of UNH. Against BC, though, motivation was lacking; the

Astonishing performances

Rowers win bronzes

Little Williams stood the rowing world on its ear last Sunday, capturing bronze medals in both the men's lightweight and intermediate eight divisions at Boston's Head of the Charles Regatta. The performance came on the heels of an equally remarkable showing at the Head of the Connecticut a week earlier, and left smoked crews from Harvard to Coast Guard wondering just what it is Purple Coach Brian Dawe knows that they don't.

At the Connecticut race on October 10, Williams' varsity lights—consisting, stern to bow, of cox Andy Sisson, Ramsay Stabler, Jack Reynolds, Scott Stevenson, Prent Weathers, Brian Norris, John Harney, Mark Pogue and Tom Davis—settled for silver medals after an interference protest against arch-rival Coast Guard was disallowed. At the finish line Dan Fox and Matt Watkins replaced the bow pair, and the boat paddled back to the start just in time to race down in the elite event and grab fifth place. A Williams varsity women's boat, meanwhile, took 7th place in a field of 24, and two men's freshmen eights each finished 23rd in their respective events.

All this was well and good, but it was Williams job on the 3.1-mile Charles course Sunday that really opened some eyes. Rowing with the boating used in the elite Connecticut race, the Purple lights whipped Harvard, Yale, Princeton, and the Coasties to finish in 16:18 behind Penn and Cornell. Williams' heavies, not to be outdone, kicked out a 16:12 to take an astonishing third place in the intermediate race. This boat, coxed by Witt McKay and rowed by Gavin "the Human Metronome" Watson, Mike Austin, John Huss, John Snyder, Dave Hitchcock, Paul Schlanta, Peter Van Oot and Steve Pagnotta, defeated both Harvard's second boat and Trinity College, winner of England's prestigious Henley Regatta last spring.

Women's Coach George Marcus termed "remarkable" the 15th place finish (all Charles events have 40 entrants) of a heavy women's four. This group—Sue Tuttle, Gay Symington, Laurie Abbott, Martha Washburn and cox Lisa Halprin—had been practicing together on Lake Onota for only four or five days. A light women's eight also showed well for Williams but its official finish was not immediately known.

"I still can't believe it," sighed Mike Austin after the race. Williams' superlative showing at the 12th annual Charles extravaganza was indeed hard for many to fathom—particularly certain humbled Ivy League schools—and it left little doubt that in the spring Williams should have one of the classiest crews in the East.

Crew light, heavyweights named athletes of the week

For their outstanding performances in the Head of the Charles Regatta, the men's varsity lightweight and heavyweight crews have been named the Record's Athletes of the Week.

The lightweight crew, unbeaten last spring, finished third behind Penn and Cornell and beat such stalwart crews as Harvard and Coast Guard. Members of the boat are cox Andy Sisson, Ramsay Stabler, Jack Reynolds, Scott Stephenson, Prent Weathers, Brian Norris, John Harney, Mark Pogue and Tom Davis.

The heavyweights posted one of their strongest finishes in recent years finishing ahead of Trinity and Harvard's second boat. Members of the heavyweight boat include cox Wit McKay, Gavin Watson, Mike Austin, John Huss, John Snyder, Dave Hitchcock, Paul Schlanta, Peter VanOot, and Steve Pagnotta.

HONORABLE MENTION—

Dave Libardi—senior safety for the varsity football team picked off a pair of Bowdoin passes in the Ephs' 13-0 win Saturday.

Shailah Stewart—senior member of the women's field hockey team, she tallied three goals in the Ephwomen's 5-1 romp over Middlebury last week.

Phil Wild—Junior member of the water polo club, Wild tallied seven goals in the squad's 18-4 romp over UNH after substituting for Jeff Brinker in goal the previous game.

College Council opens SAT allocation sessions

'Back Talk' cut, WCFM nets extra $80

The College Council opened its SAT allocation sessions Wednesday night by voting to accept the Finance Committee's funding recommendations for the Record, WCFM, the Lecture Committee, the Free University program and Back Talk. The council also voted to allocate $11,856.00 to the Gulielmensian and to table its consideration of Pique until next Wednesday night. Four of the budgets, those of the Record, WCFM, the Free University, and the Lecture Committee passed with relative ease. Debate over Back Talk, and particularly the GUL was heated and controversial.

Finance Committee member Harry Kelly began his report on Back Talk's request by defining the magazine's objectives. "Back Talk is an alternative literary journal. It's not a Black magazine per se. Anybody on campus who'd like to contribute to the magazine may and is encouraged to do so". When asked to define the difference between Back Talk and Pique and why there was a need for two publications, Kelly pointed out that the two magazines give two different points of view and that Back Talk was "more oriented to non-fiction and political writing."

Back Talk had originally requested $3,260.00 based on four issues of 1000 24-page magazines. The Finance Committee recommended an allocation of $2,400 based on three issues of 1000 25-page magazines. Last year the Back Talk published twice. According to Finance Committee member Bob Fox, "The committee preferred a more gradual increase in the size of the magazine". The Council voted to accept the Finance Committee's recommendation 17-7-2 with the stipulation that two issues be published by the end of Winter Study.

Back Talk editor Irving Rowley later stated that he was pleased that the council saw fit to fund the magazine but was "a little disappointed in the cutback to three issues".

Back Talk does not solicit any advertisements for its publications and this issue raised a great deal of controversy among the council members. Kelly defended this practice by pointing out that "Many of the local merchants might perceive this as a Black magazine and this might make it difficult to raise funds". He added that "The Finance Committee wanted to let them first establish a solid foundation as a literary, non-racial magazine."

Several council members devoted a good deal of time to attacking this non-advertisement policy. They pointed out that the Record, Pique and WCFM all solicit advertisements and therefore Back Talk should as well. Council member Larry Mitchell argued that "Advertising is a standard means of raising money for a magazine. We should let them give it a try". Committee member Ross Cheit responded that "They don't want to advertise and we don't feel that we should dictate this to the magazine". Cheit and Otis both later agreed that the council's debate had skirted the real issue of whether a predominantly Black magazine could be expected to raise appreciable revenues from local merchants.

The council deferred its consideration of Pique's request till next week after Pique editor Anne Eldridge pointed out a mistake in the magazine's original budget request. The Finance Committee will review the budget again and Pique's request will be the first considered by the council next Wednesday.

The Record requested and received by unanimous vote $13,308. Last year the newspaper received 14,686. Editor Dave Ross attributed the decreases request to an accumulated surplus from a "very high level of advertisements and subscriptions from last year". Ross said he expected that these high levels of income would be maintained and could cover the rise in printing costs.

WCFM requested and received, again by unanimous vote, $7,550. This represents an increase of $80 over last year's allocation.

The Lecture Committee also received its full request, $8000, by an overwhelming vote. Last year the Lecture Committee received $7,500 and Finance Committee member Anne Waring stated that "the increase is due to the other organizations interest in bringing more lectures to campus".

The Council unanimously allocated $160 to the Free University program, an increase of $60 over last year. Waring attributed the increase to this year's hiring of a paid typist for the publication of Free University's catalogue.

Following the meeting, President Steve Piltch stated "I thought that there was too much repetitive discussion and that debate on most questions should have been closed earlier than it was. Overall, I think the staggered system of review is better than the system of the past". Piltch did try to streamline the debates but was repeatedly resisted by several council members.

GUL budget approved by 14-12 margin

The College Council voted 14-12 Wednesday night to allocate $11,856. to the Gulielmensian. This was the full amount that the GUL requested and means that each student paying the Student Activities Tax will receive a yearbook. The council had earlier defeated a Finance Committee recommendation and a compromise motion from the floor, both of which called for student subscriptions underwritten by council funding.

Under the plan advanced by the Finance Committee, students would

FinCom proposes Cap 'N Bells cut

Budgetary issues for discussion at the Nov. 1 College Council meeting include major cuts in the Cap & Bells and Dance Society requests and termination of funds for Williams Health, Education and Welfare (WHEW). The meeting, dealing with groups labeled entertainment and service organizations, is the second of four sessions devoted to Finance Committee recommendations.

Chairman Clarence Otis '77 said the committee eliminated three Cap and Bells projects: bringing a touring company to Williams, producing shows during Winter Study and conducting master dance classes.

"Given the attendance rate, $5200 for the Dance Society was a pretty substantial subsidy. At most 250 students went to each dance show. They couldn't justify the funding," Otis said.

WHEW, which usually coordinates activities and provides refreshments for Winter Carnival and Spring Weekend, was denied funds because "most of the things it was doing were usurped by the Housing Committee, and it (the Housing Committee) was doing a better job," Otis said. The houses didn't object to funding these events, he added.

The suggested $1,628 increase in the Lehman Service Council budget would pay for Children's Day, a picnic for disadvantaged children in the area; a high school equivalency tutoring program in North Adams and increased transportation costs. Service Council chairman Warren Pierce '77 claimed that participation in the Berkshire Farm for Boys program has doubled, resulting in doubled costs.

The Finance Committee also drafted a policy statement on funding the ACEC. "As a general procedure the College Council shall set a maximum figure for the amount of funds that can be spent on rock and jazz concerts for the year," it read. The committee reported that it was willing to absorb the losses from the J. Geils Band concert, but "is concerned lest repeated higher-than expected losses gobble up an improperly large percentage of Student Activities Tax funds."

Faculty opens student-faculty committee meetings to public

by Chip Buckner

The faculty voted to table a motion to require all student-faculty committees to close their meetings. The steering committee motion "encouraged" at least one meeting open for public participation each semester and required "a concise report" of each meeting be made available to the Williams community.

The resolution came about, according to steering committee chairman Irwin Shainman, because a number of committee chairmen asked the committee for guidance. "We do not initiate action," he said, "but rather respond where a need exists."

Dean Grabois indicated that he had an open mind, but generally favored the proposal. "If the purpose of open meetings," he said, "is better communications, we have better ways to do this." The information is available, he claimed, in the form of minutes and reports from the student members of committees. He granted the form might differ from what the Record would print, but he felt community lost no information in the process.

The other argument advanced for open meetings, he said, dealt with altering students' behavior. The point, Grabois said, was that with their peers present, student committee members might find it easier to "stick up" and "be argumentative" with rather than "understanding" of faculty positions. Grabois agreed that this might affect behavior, but not necessarily in a positive sense.

He observed that as a result of free discussion people had frequently changed their minds. "The friction of publicity," he feared, "might lock-in" certain decisions before they have been thoroughly debated. "It's good to have to justify final positions," he said, "but not each of the intermediate stages." Finally "behind the scenes meeting," just held at unannounced times and places, might result if the pressures were sufficient. "An unfortunate consequence" that might result from totally open meeting, he said. Dean Grabois concluded by stating that he is "not vehemently opposed to open meeting, but there are costs to be born. In my mind the costs outweigh the benefits."

Committee on Undergraduate Life chairman Earl McFarland noted that the motion, if passed "would not really change CUL behavior." McFarland understood the motion to allow the committees to invite specific students to participate, or act as reporters for the Record or WCFM.

George Goethals, CEP chairman saw completely open meetings as "probably not a good idea." He likened fifty extra people at a CEP meeting to a circus, and thought the "quieter atmosphere" of smaller meetings more than "offsets any losses."

Lehman service expands

Students tutor immigrants

Though Williams students obviously recognize the spatial existence of neighboring North Adams, they are often not aware of the problems which confront it as a community. For example, since a large proportion of residents in the northern Berkshire region are first or second generation immigrants and possess only a rudimentary command of English, a sizeable language barrier exists. Of the roughly 30,000 inhabitants of Adams and North Adams, approximately 11,000 speak a language other than English in the home.

Leon Shull, national director of ADA spoke Wednesday for support of Jimmy Carter. (photo by Kahane)

This fall the Lehman Service Council instituted the North Adams Tutorial Program, which provides an opportunity for college students to help ease the immigrants' language problems.

Interested students will tutor in three main areas, the most common need being assistance in preparation for the CED exam or high school equivalency test. Most people engaged in studying for this exam are high school dropouts or adults seeking improved employment opportunities. The second area, Adult Basic Education, involves both the functionally illiterate and immigrants holding degrees or skills learned in native countries. Occupation-specific vocabulary instruction helps insure that language barriers do not inhibit the usage of previous skills. Finally, basic grammatical and sentence structure is taught to immigrant children.

During the week of October 31, a lecture presentation describing the entire program and its affiliation with Northern Berkshire Community Action will be held. Interested members of the college community

Ballot Questions

Massachusetts voters will face nine questions on their ballots Tuesday. Some of these items, such as the Uniform Electric Rate question, are liable to have significant impact on the economic well-being of the citizens of the Commonwealth as well as the future of this College. Massachusetts voters would be well-advised to seriously consider each of the questions before entering the polling booths Tuesday.

A thorough study of the issues involved will hopefully lead voters to vote as we would on some of these questions:

Question 4, Massachusetts Power Authority The benefits from a state run power authority are hazy, to say the least, while the probable costs in lost tax revenues and the increased demands on a bureaucracy that in Massachusetts no longer seems capable of managing itself are quite real. Proponents of the initiative have been unable to demonstrate that a state run power authority will be any more likely to meet state needs at lower cost than one that is state regulated. Massachusetts is not ready for a state power authority; this initiative should be defeated.

Question 7, Uniform Electric Rates The proposed act would impose a general requirement that every electric utility company charge a uniform rate per kilowatt hour of electricity. College officials estimate that passage of this item would result in a $61.60 increase in room rates for students (article, page 3), but this is not why we oppose this item. Uniform electric rates will raise the costs of industrial production in Massachusetts thereby driving firms and jobs out of state. In principle, uniform electric rates may be desirable but only if they are instituted on a nationwide basis. A no vote, at least at a time of high unemployment, is in the best interest of the Commonwealth.

Question 5a, Banning Private Handguns National publications have discussed the merits and deficiencies of legislation banning private handguns, but the problem has a local touch. A Record study indicated some local merchants have handguns in their stores. In addition, at least one student has a handgun in his room. Without repeating the trite arguments, we would pull the yes lever with enthusiasm.

Question 6, Controls on Bottles and Cans It is no easy task for a concerned person to wade through the literature on a proposal which would prohibit the sale of metal beverage containers with flip-tops and would require every beverage container sold or offered for sale in the Commonwealth to have a refund value of at least five cents. There is even some question as to whether passage of this item would result in more jobs or less jobs and in lower beverage prices or higher prices. Whatever the case, a yes vote would lead to inconveniences for state consumers but would have positive environmental impacts. Although we believe the bill as currently constructed has some weaknesses, we agree with the Legislative Committee Minority Report which implied the only way to force the state legislature to take some necessary action in this area is to support this item.

'Imperialism'

When Ross Keller moved into the position of Food Service director, students and administrators alike expected an improvement in the quality and choice of food served as well as the responsiveness of food services to student needs and desires. While there seems to be little question that Keller has made some progress in the area of food choice, there seems to be some indication that he is moving in the wrong direction in regard to responsiveness.

A trivial example can be used to illustrate this. At a recent Student Housing Committee, Keller was told that some students were disappointed with the elimination of butter from the College "menu." Similar sentiments were suggested by items students put in a row house suggestion box. The suggestions were forwarded to row house unit manager Roy Clark. But the response from the top was a solid no to butter.

Keller refused to talk to the Record for even a minute or two Wednesday afternoon concerning an impending editorial on this subject. (By so doing, he became the first College official in at least two and one-half years to refuse to speak for "even a minute or two" with a Record editor prior to a deadline.)

Butter or margarine may be a relatively minor part of our daily diets but the issue is not of minor importance. Margarine may be a healthier substance, but if students perceive a difference in taste between the two, a responsive food service director should not brush aside student requests for butter as well as margarine. Butter is not substantially more expensive.

If Keller is to be a worthwhile addition to the College community, he must be more flexible than he was in this case.

FOCUS/Andy O'Donnell

The Williams Way

Director of Food Services Ross Keller found himself in the unusual and uncomfortable position of being on the firing line the past few weeks as he traded salvos with row house cooks, stewards, and presidents in a series of meetings that served as yet indictrination into the Williams way for the new administrator.

In early July Keller took over for David Woodruff and proceeded to inject new life and organization into a department plagued by both internal and external criticism. Change was in the air and the Administration seemed impressed. The reigns on the department budget became tighter but the link to the students appeared stronger.

Three months later these changes have come under strong attack by the tradition laden and traditionally stubborn row houses. What had been received with great acclaim in September by the major dining halls is now being condemned by the row houses as applied to the row houses.

The bone of contention for the row houses has not been the wisdom of Keller's changes but rather their application to the row houses per se. To the row houses, Keller's insistence on an across the board application of his policies seems to reflect an ignorance, or at least a misunderstanding, of the unique nature of row house life.

As the newly included freshman quickly realizes, row houses dining has its own unique personality, a personality that is as much a reflection of the cook in each house as it is the food served. What has irked the row houses to date has been the lack of autonomy and flexibility allowed their cooks in planning and preparing meals.

Row house cooks like to think, and with ample reason, that they know what is best for their house. Because they only cook for 30-50 people it is important to cater to those tastes and adapt the menu accordingly so that half the meal doesn't end up in Hobart at the end of the night. If fish won't sell at my house, a cook will argue, then why not give me the leeway to prepare something else instead of insisting that I cook fish? Although it has taken a great deal of convincing, Keller has begun to see the wisdom of this approach and has softened his policies somewhat.

He has also, after much prodding, adapted his policy governing the number of entrees that row house cooks must prepare. His initial demands were enough to turn the Galloping Gourmet into a neurotic nomad and had row house cooks running around with their heads cut off as they tried to cook two entrees and one vegetarian dish for each meal. "You can put all that rabbit food and talk about variety in Greylock," one cook told me. "Just let me put out one solid, quality meal."

The uproar of the past few weeks is just another stage in Keller's initiation into the Williams way. As the saying goes, when at Williams one should do as Williams people do, stressing careful and thoughtful study and avoiding hasty, ill-informed decisions.

In the case of the row houses Keller did not act wisely or knowledgeably. He incorrectly equated action with improvement and in his efforts to show that Food Services would indeed be different this year instituted rigid policies that did not reflect a clear understanding of row house life.

Keller has shown himself to be an able administrator with things that he understands, such as large dining halls. In the future let's hope that across the board dictates reflect a better understanding of the Williams way, however, and that the ability to bend a little is not forgotten.

NEWS BRIEFS

Rocky Krizack still missing

The Williamstown Police report no progress in the search for Rocky Krizack, the Williamstown high school student who disappeared three weeks ago.

They and other local police departments and the Massachusetts and Vermont State Police continue to follow up leads that have so far all been without results. Although the FBI is assisting the investigation unofficially, the bureau cannot officially work on the case unless a federal law has been violated.

Posters like those on campus, with a photograph and description of Rocky, have been distributed in at least six states.

Williamstown Chief of Police Joseph Zoito said that even the reports of psychics have been investigated.

Town parking ban toughens Nov. 1

The ban on all-night parking on Williamstown's public streets will be strictly enforced by the police beginning Monday, Nov. 1. Cars will be ticketed or, if it snows, towed away.

All-night parking is defined as parking for more than one hour between 1 a.m. and 6 a.m.

Enforcement of the law is intended to clear the roads for snow removal.

A ten dollar fine must be paid for each ticket.

Diau's Deli opens tomorrow

Diau's Deli opens this weekend. According to the proprietor, Diau, the new deli will offer fast service and good quality at the same time.

Diau hopes to bring together "Berkshire natives and students." The deli will be staffed by students and other people" with character," says Diau, in order to make it "as funky as possible."

There will be thirty different kinds of sandwiches, lox and bagels, and free pickles. Unlike the usual deli, no pounds of meat or cheese will be sold. Diau has also provided for vegetarians.

Reflections on 'The Spirit of Spirit'

by Rajendra Singh Khadka

The other day, I decided to go down to the Log and have a couple of swigs and shoot the breeze with some guys I knew. I have always been fascinated by drunks, quasi-drunks, social drinkers and even teetotalers. Something seems to burst forth when people are in the spirit of spirit. So I decided to go to the Log and get mildly drunk—if such a state of the mind and body is possible—and watch the other people who were more drunk than I was.

It was one of those days when you had to stand in line just to get in. The reason, I think, was because some guy was playing the piano. Anyway, something was happening, and you had to wait in line. You couldn't get in even if you knew the I.D. check-out guy or the bar tender. Finally, I made it in.

The minute I walked in, I was stopped by a wall of humanity. There was a lot of noise. Everyone was shouting and saying something, something profound. When you get drunk, you always say very truthful and heavy stuff, if you know what I mean. As I smashed my way through faces and bodies, some familiar, some unknown, I spied a character I think I knew vaguely. You know, one of the types of people whom you see all the time but have not said "hello" to, or at the most, you have smiled at. Anyway, you think you know him and he thinks he knows you. At other times, you might just have had walked past with a weak grin, but right now, he was high with the spirit of spirit.

"Hey man, how is it going?" he exclaims as if you were his long lost friend.

"Cool, man, cool," I say and act as if he was the guy with whom I was sharing all my sexual adventures or mishaps—intimate friends, you know.

"Hey that's great. Here, let me buy you a drink."

Sure. My policy is never to refuse a drink or food. Eastern trait. After all, the Western bastard has exploited us more than I can think. Anyway, that is what they tell me back home. So I might as well get even.

"So what will you have?" he asks, a generous guy. Drunks are always generous. This is the moment when they can be exploited the most.

"Miller, no wait a minute, make that Michelob." I know Michelob is more expensive.

"Sure."

We are trying to fight our way to the bar. Too many faces. Too many familiar. All of them plastered.

"Hey Raj baby, fancy meeting you here?" says some faggot and embraces me.

"Hey, now what the hell are you trying? Will you quit embracing me . . . Listen I'm not a faggot . . . Look, man, this is a public place. Have respect all right. Think of my reputation, man. And for heaven's sake don't call me baby." I protest vigorously.

Back home I would hold hands with my male friends and no one would bother me, but here, if you pat a guy on the back in ordinary moments, you are looked upon as some kind of a queer. So you cannot express your love. But right now everyone is drunk, and no one seems to mind if some guy kisses you or hugs you. Great!

"Hey, don't worry man. We are brothers, right. Brothers of the revolution (Jesus! Where the hell did he get the 'revolution' bit?) . . .

"Yeah, I know what you mean," I replied, but now, my beer was more important to me than a stupid, concocted revolution. Anyway, long live Che and long live Mao, not to mention the revolution.

I get out of his clutches and make a grab for the beer before the generous drunk decides to regain his senses and drink it up himself. In my wild attempt to grab my glass, I grab a girl's wrist.

"Why Raj, nice to see you here," she practically cooes. I don't remember her name, but I know her face well. She could be in my Econ. class, but on the other hand, she could be the girl who lived in Sage F last year. I was in D. Anyway, she looks radiant, and beautiful.

Before I know what is happening, she gives me a hug and says I am a great writer.

"I love your article," she tells me. There is another dude who is hanging onto her. I wished she loved me instead of my writing, but that is a beginning anyway.

"Thanks," I say. If I myself was plastered, I would probably have had said, sweetheart, you look sexy and gorgeous. But I am not gone, so I say a polite thank you.

It's very beautiful the way people interact when they are drunk, or close to it. The mask of 'proper manners and etiquette" and other forms of 'civilized' manners drops. Hidden emotions are unleashed. Even the meekest of persons become vociferous—strangers become acquaintances; acquaintances become friends and friends become lovers. "Nite" girls use "dirty four-lettered" words as they converse with us and sip red wine or beer. Everything is down to earth. Masks fall off, pretensions disappear and there is universal love.

Tomorrow, I'll probably wake up with a terrific hangover, miss an important meeting (all meetings seem to be important) and barely make it to brunch. I'll probably pass the guy who bought me the drink. I'll give him an awkward grin, and he may do the same and wonder why in the hell he bought an expensive drink for a turkey like that. If I see my friend who hugged me, I'll probably tell him about my work. He will tell me about the paper he has to write. We will keep our distance and our masks of polite society. If I see the girl who hugged me, she will pretend she doesn't know me, or maybe she will utter a brief "hi". And we will pass each other as if we were strangers, and maybe we are. We will all go back into our own shell and stay there until the spirit of spirit catches up with us again in some near weekend.

It's too bad people are like that. But look at it this way, if people did not need liquor to give them some kind of a stimulus to let themselves go, a lot of people would be out of business, including Sam Bronfman and his clan, and that would have a grave and maybe even a disasterous repercussion in the Williams College community. So here's a toast to the spirit of spirit. Keep on chuggin', brother!!

College officials call for No. 7 defeat

by Scott Hoot

Francis H. Dewey, 3rd, Treasurer of the College has predicted a "probable" increase in tuition if Referendum Number 7 is passed by Massachusetts voters. The Referendum is a citizen-initiated proposal to alter the present sliding rate for electricity to a "flat-rate" system of pricing. Today rates decrease per kilowatt hour as use of electricity increases. The proposed law would require an across-the-board rate, not dependent on amount of electricity consumed.

In a study prepared for Peter C. Welanetz, Director of Physical Plant, John C. Holden, Mechanical Engineer for Buildings and Grounds, reports that there would be an increase of nearly 33 per cent in the college's electricity bill if flat-rate is put into effect. He also reported that in 1975-76 the change would ha caused the electric bill to increase f. n $342,551 to $456,518. These figures are based on an estimate from a Massachusetts Electric Company employee.

Dewey translated this to a $61.60 increase per student (from $185.16 to $246.76). He said that it was probable that part of that amount would be met by increased room fees. He also speculated that other sources such as the college endowment would absorb part of the increased costs.

Proponents of the bill maintain that small homeowners now pay 60 to 70 per cent more per kilowatt hour of electricity than do big businesses. They complain that the present system is a "highly regressive" tax on the small consumer and a subsidy for the large consumers. "Fair-Share" rates would be 20 to 40 per cent above the average cost now paid by large industrial users.

Opponents of the bill are concentrating their attack on the possible loss of industries due to increased rates. They conclude that the "Fair-Share" bill would force the industrial user to absorb over $70 million in higher costs. This, they say, could lead to the possible loss of 41,000 jobs and the saving of only $1.99 per month for the average consumer. Dewey's study predicted a $4 per month average saving, along with a "disastrous effect on Mass. industry."

Letter: Hypocrisy

To the editor,

The latest loss in the area of student transfer options as reported in the last issue of The Record prompts me to write in defending the student's rights for making changes in his living conditions and daily habits.

Specifically, I am referring to the article "Students Lose Section Choice". Williams has always been very open-minded and encouraging about transfers, yet has suddenly decided to get tough on the issue. Changes between schools are easy enough to make, yet now course changes and house transfers seem to be "evil" in a way that does not seem fully justified. Maybe the paper-work involved in course changes is considerable, yet if we have them at all, why can't we try for the "best" section possible? As for the other issue, the students themselves, in the council or committee concerned, took a hard stand against house changes. The reason behind this was that houses would get too full of social groups and lose their randomness. Why are we allowed to join them in groups in the first place if this is true?

The only people allowed to change houses, for all intents and purposes, are those who find their present situation unbearable. This is a system based on negative incentives and has no place on a supposedly well-rounded diversifying campus.

Sincerely,
Doug Stone '79

AMT presents 'The October Project'

In the Halloween spirit, Cap and Bells will present The October Project tonight and tomorrow at 8:30 in the Studio Theatre of the AMT. The Project begins tonight with Veronica's Room, by Ira Levin, (author of Rosemary's Baby and The Stepford Wives). Tomorrow, Veronica's Room will play once again, along with Harold Pinter's Revue Sketches. This Wednesday and Thursday, the Revue Sketches will be presented in the Log at 9:00 p.m. Although admission to each of these shows is free, tickets must be picked up the afternoon of the show, between 4:00 and 5:30, at the Cap and Bells office in the AMT. If an evening performance is not sold out, tickets will be available at the Greylock entrance of the AMT, one half hour before the show starts. Tickets are not required for performances at the Log.

Veronica's Room is a chilling murder mystery in the tradition of Alfred Hitchcock. The Pinter Revue Sketches are short pieces of comedy designed to be performed in British Music Halls. Accordingly, the Revue Sketches will be performed in the Log, the bar being open before and after the show, and during intermission.

The October Project is directed by Peter Bergethon who described the Project as an invitation to anyone in the college community, with an interest, to explore the opportunities of the theatre. In the hopes of dissolving several misconceptions about "The Theatre" which give it an oftentimes unapproachable air, Bergethon presents the audience with actors who are not necessarily "seasoned," (to use one cliche.) Bergethon, however, believes that these new faces will astound the audience, their enthusiasm being the most obvious and exciting aspect of their performances. The Theatre, according to Bergethon, should not be an object of fear or awe, and Cap and Bells is trying hard this year, through productions such as The October Project, to dispel this attitude and show that anyone with the interest can find his or her place in some aspect of the theatre.

WCFM to show '2001'

Tickets are now on sale for the special "Benefit for WCFM Radio" showing of Stanley Kubrick's masterpiece 2001: A Space Odyssey. The movie, which Saturday Review called, "An extraordinary masterpiece," will be shown at 1:00, 3:30, 7:00, 9:30 and midnight on Saturday November 6 in Bronfman Auditorium. Tax deductible tickets are $1.00 in advance and are available from WCFM station members, at major dining halls, and at the WCFM studios in the basement of Baxter Hall.

This is the "second coming" of 2001. The cult film is now enjoying a popular return in major cities in the U.S. and this special showing marks the return of the film to Williamstown as well.

In 1968, the New Yorker wrote of the film, "Technically and imaginatively, what Kubrick put into it is staggering: five years of his life; his novel and screenplay with Arthur Clark; his production, his direction, and his special effects; his humor and stamina and particular disquiet. This film is not only hideously funny—like Dr. Strangelove—about human speech and response at a point where they have begun to seem computerized, and where more and more people sound like recordings left on while the soul is out. It is also a uniquely poetic piece of sci-fi, made by a man who truly possesses the drives of both science and fiction. I think Stanley Kubrick's 2001: A Space Odyssey a great film and an unforgettable endeavor."

The College Security Department is interested in talking to the student who spoke to Security Officer "Hap" Milne at the Williams-Trinity Football game on October 9, in reference to a suspicious vehicle seen in the Mission Park area on October 7. The identity of the student will be kept in the strictest confidence. Please contact Director of Security O'Brien at 597-2336.

The Tom Willits Band will perform tomorrow night at the Williams Coffee House in the Rathskellar. Admission is free for the show which begins at 9 p.m.

Willits Band set for Coffee House

Throughout the past five years, Tom Willits has performed both as a solo artist and with a three-man band along the East Coast, opening for Tom Rush, Jonathan Edwards, Jesse Colin Young, Leo Kottke, Maria Muldaur, and others. Now living in New Hampshire and enjoying the chance to concentrate on his guitar and piano work, he most recently performed solo again in clubs around northern New England, gaining increasing respect for his original music and his strong, clear voice.

Willits and his new band, which features Tom Parker, drums; Richard Wesley, lead guitar; and Glenn Good bass will perform in the Rathskellar tomorrow evening. Sponsored by the Williams Coffee House, the show, which begins at 9 pm, is free.

ON NOVEMBER 2, THERE'LL BE A MAJOR ECONOMICS TEST.

If the Bottle Bill passes, beer and mixer prices will go up. Way up.

If you don't believe us, ask somebody who goes to school in Vermont.

They'll tell you that under their similar law, beer went up $1.80 a case.

Some of that is a deposit they get back – provided no one breaks a bottle, mashes a can, or loses either one.

But a full 60¢ of that $1.80 is a non-returnable handling charge.

Look, if the Bottle Bill were a recycling measure, if it even encouraged recycling, the higher costs might not be hard to take.

But it doesn't.

If you really study the Bottle Bill, you'll never let it pass.

Question: Would you vote for a Bottle Bill when a similar law in Vermont forced the cost of beer up $1.80 a case?

Yes ☐ No ☐

Ephwomen lead pack, run to third place finish

Following Coach Bud Fisher's instructions to "go for it from the start," the members of the Williams women's cross-country team put in strong individual performances in earning a third-place team finish at the New Englands competition Saturday.

With three runners in the top 20 and all seven in the top half of the field, Williams was defeated only by the same two teams that had beaten them in dual meets during the regular season, the University of Massachusetts and Middlebury.

Middlebury upset UMass in a fierce battle for first place, squeaking out a 42-47 victory, followed by Williams (97), Brandeis (145), Vermont (162) and seven other teams.

Finishing the hilly 3.0 mile course first for Williams was Mary Hakala in 14th, with a time of 18:13, followed by Lisa Capaldini and Debbie Gregg in 19th and 20th, Michelle Cutsworth in 25th, Toni Ceckler in 36th, Corrie Johnson in 42nd and Lisa Greene in 43rd. Because of the size of the field it was important to run a fast first mile to avoid getting trapped behind a pack. Coach Fisher's last week of training had been devoted to working on a quicker than normal pace for the first mile, and then easy distance running to train down for the meet. Since all the Williams runners had their best times at this race, it appears that the training schedule had the harriers peaking right on time for their biggest meet.

Last year the New Englands were held at UMass on the same 3.0 mile course with a field of about 50 runners with the winning time of 17:57 setting a course record. At this year's competition there were over 100 runners and 12 full teams and the caliber of the competition was much higher, with the first ten finishers shattering the course record, the winning time being a 17:13. This week the harriers will resume training in preparation for the upcoming Little Three meet at Amherst on November 3. Although the team should easily win the meet, they will want to put on a strong show to finish up a fine season in fine style.

C C allocates $11,856 to GUL after defeating compromises have paid no more than $10 for a GUL. If the revenue from subscriptions and advertisements were not sufficient to cover costs, the council would subsidize the deficit. Committee member Bob Fox argued that, "The Committee wanted a procedure to determine the real interest in the GUL. People picking up the GUL at the library is not an indication that they really want it".

Gul editor Stew Read argued that "Every student should have the opportunity, as in other publications to have a copy of the yearbook." Read also claimed that he would not be able to guarantee the scope or the quality of the yearbook if it was funded according to the Finance Committee plan. When pressed, however, for a reason for this assertion, Read did eventually agree that the quality would not necessarily go down under the subscription plan. Dean Eileen Julien then stated that "If you don't fund the GUL totally, I doubt it will survive." In a roll call vote, the council defeated the Finance Committee's recommendation 17-10.

Council member Tom Ebling then offered a compromise proposal. Under Ebling's plan, the subscription price would be lowered to $6.50, the unit cost of the GUL if 1800 copies were printed. If less than 1800 copies were sold, the Council would underwrite the deficit, up to $5075. Fox called this "a good compromise with which we can still judge student demand". A roll call vote taken, and this motion failed 12-14.

Council member Lee Jackson then moved that the council fully fund the GUL at a cost of $11,856. This motion by a roll call vote 14-12.

After the meeting, Council President Steve Piltch said that "The GUL's funding is a very split issue. Some people would like to have it, some really don't care." Piltch indicated that he personally favored the full allocation and would have voted for it had there been a tie vote.

Tufts drops footballers to 2-3 not much more, the Union Dutchmen. Union, however, comes to the Purple Valley this year with a 2-3 record, two wins in its last three games, and a new-found confidence.

Union lost its first three games of the season under second-year mentor Tom Cahill, but rebounded with back-to-back victories over Colby (recent conquerors of Trinity) and R.P.I. The Dutchmen suffered a tough 28-22 loss to Hobart Saturday on the road.

Behind sophomore quarterback Andy Terranova and freshman fullback Rich Rohmer (over 200 yards in the R.P.I. win), Union has developed an explosive offense, contrary to recent Dutchmen squads.

The Union pass defense has been something less than fool-proof for five games, though, and that should suit Messrs. McCormick and Wallace just fine, thank you. Look for the Purple to keep the air filled with footballs.

All strategy aside, Williams badly needs a win tomorrow. Wesleyan and Amherst lie on the horizon, licking their respective chops and eager for a bite of the Ephs. Worse yet, Wesleyan is loaded, and Amherst isn't as bad as they should be. These next three weeks will go a long way toward determining how long the winter will be for Bob Odell.

Purple booters thrash Tufts, 3-0; march over Crimson kickers, 6-2

by Mark Pogue

Williams' Purple Soccer Show began its sprint to the Little Three finish line last week, recording Fall Break demolitions of the Tufts Jumbos (3-0) and Harvard Crimson (6-2). In the process the Ephs handed Coach Jeff Vennell his 30th career victory at Williams (against 21 losses) and raised their own 1976 mark to 5-2-1.

A hardy band of about 60 braved Friday's cold rain to watch the Ephs lower Tufts record to 8-2-1. John Friborg got Williams rolling only five minutes into the game when he headed a rebounded ball into the Jumbo goal, and from that point on the issue was never much in doubt. Fine play by Williams' defensive corps—John Lanier, Bill Roper, Geoff Klingenstein, and Bruce Camilleri—limited the Jums to just six quiet shots at Skip Grossman's net all afternoon. Second-half insurance scores came on head goals by Pete Barra and Ray Powell, from head passes by Jim Hield and Perry Nelson.

"I wasn't that impressed with any individual skills out there today," offered Jumbo captain Steve Kadish at the Log that night. "But Williams is a very well-coached team. Everyone knew just where on the field they had to be in each situation."

Kadish missed last Tuesday's Williams-Harvard game, but had he seen it he probably would have revised his first observation. Junior forward John Friborg put on a one-man show in the wind and rain, chalking up his third assist and fifth, sixth, and seventh goals of the season. Hank Osborne (two goals, one assist) and Rick Zeller (one goal, two assists) contributed to Crimson goalie Fred Herold's fun. The loss to Williams left the off-year Harvards on the short end of a cumulative 13-4 score against Little Three opposition in 1976.

With a tricky wind from Soldier Field in their faces the first half, the Ephs jumped off to a flat and listless start. Harvard, playing without its two premier forwards, had several good chances on early breakaways but were time and again caught from behind by the Williams backfield. It was only after 20 minutes had ticked away that the Ephs regained their spark and began to dominate.

After Friborg, Osborne, and Zeller made it 4-0 in the second half, Vennell pulled the starters and emptied his bench. Harvard scored twice on goals by Magee and Bowyer, but Williams answered with two 25-yard sonic blasts from Osborne to seal it. "The game wasn't as lopsided as six to two looks," Vennell synopsized. "We just hit everything we should have been all season."

Tonight the Ephmen journey to Springfield for a night-time Astroturf duel with the 5-5-1 Cardinals. That game and Williams' home contest against explosive UConn November 3 should leave the Ephs sufficiently tuned for the opening of Little Three play on November 6.

Tufts humbles gridders, 21-7

by Tim Layden

Momentum strikes again. Tufts safety Daryl Brown fields the opening kickoff on his own goal line, heads straight up the field, cuts to his left and goes coast-to-coast. 7-0 Tufts, and the rout is on.

From here on in, it was all academic, as a fired-up Tufts squad pushed Williams all over the field for 30 minutes and held on for easy 21-7 upset win. It was the first ever win for the Jumbos over Bob Odell and left Williams with a 2-3 season record.

The chilled Tufts homecoming crowd watched with great enthusiasm as Jumbo halfback Tim Whelan went up, over, around, and through the Purple defense for 205 yards on 42 carries and one touchdown.

Tufts capitalized on a Scott Harrington fumble for their second score of the afternoon, as senior quarterback Bob Berluti hit Dave Hamlar with an eight-yard scoring toss. Whelan's 19-yard screen score early in the second quarter left the hosts with a commanding 21-0 lead and Williams on the short end of the largest losing margin in Odell's tenure.

Call it psyche, call it momentum, call it whatever you like, but the Tufts offense played miles above their heads all afternoon, moving out the Purple defense and opening huge holes for the diminutive (5'9"), but rugged (185) Whelan. For the first time in five games, the Eph defense looked very vulnerable.

Whelan's longest gain of the day was just 14 yards, while he was held to under 3 only twice in his many carries. With a little help from fullback Mike Colonna and Berluti, the Jumbo offense had their most productive game of the year. With a little assistance from the Williams defense, the home squad looked like Michigan.

Despite the swirling wind which played havoc with passes all day, Williams senior thrower Don Wallace still managed his best day as an Eph, while Herb McCormick's 10 Twilley-esque catches defy description.

Wallace moved Williams 65 yards to their first score of the afternoon on the initial possession of the second half. He tossed a left-handed pass to Tom Redden to preserve the drive and eventually hit Peter Hansbury with a scrambling nine-yarder for the score.

For much of the third quarter, Williams, behind the throwing of Wallace and the catching of offensive player of the week McCormick looked like the offensive machine of preseason predictions. Yet several penalties and a fumbled punt late in the period killed two threats, and kept the Jumbos out of reach.

Wallace ended up with 21 completions in 35 attempts for 256 yards, 146 to McCormick. The Williams rushing attack could muster but a meager 78 yards.

Whelan and Colonna alternated carries through the final stanza, running out the clock between fruitless Purple attempts and assuring the first Tufts win over Williams since 1969 and raising their season record to 3-2.

For Williams, owners of season record of under .500 after more than three games for the first time since '70, it's very simply time to regroup. Anything short of a resurrection over the next two weeks will result in a Little Three embarrassment which will make Wesleyan's 44-0 loss two years ago seem close.

Next on the agenda for the floundering Ephs is a squad usually a match for the field hockey team, but

Wesleyan bombs Lord Jeffs, 20-17

Wesleyan established itself as prime contenders for the Little Three football crown Saturday with a convincing 30-17 over invading Amherst on the Cards' homecoming weekend.

Quarterback Brad Vanacore and kicker John Papa were the keys to the easy win. Vanacore, a four year-veteran, tossed for nearly 200 yards in the win, while Papa booted field goals of 21, 32, and 41 yards.

The win extended the powerful Cardinal's winning streak to four games, following a sloppy opening game loss to Tufts, 13-12. Amherst is now 2-3 on the season, having beaten Bowdoin and Colby.

Freshman quarterback Cloin Widen, a Mt. Greylock High graduate, went the entire game for the losing Lord Jeffs, completing just 7 of 22 passes. Widen has been forced into action as a result of injuries to junior Mike Newman and fellow freshman Mark Manning.

Four goals net Friborg honors

Just over a year after kicking off the 1975-76 academic year's awards, junior John Friborg of the varsity soccer team has been named the Record's Athlete of the Week. Friborg nailed four goals in the squad's convincing wins over Tufts and Harvard. Friborg now has seven goals on the season along with three assists.

Behind Friborg and junior Henry Osborne the booters are now 5-2-1 on the '76 season under coach Jeff Vennell.

HONORABLE MENTION—

Herb McCormick and Don Wallace—Both former athletes of the week, they were bright spots in the varsity football team's disappointing 21-7 loss to Tufts. Wallace hit 21 of 35 passes for 256 yards, 10 to McCormick for nearly 150 yards.

Joe Kolb—Running one of his best individual races at Williams, the junior notched a strong second-place finish in the NESCAC individual cross-country championships. Kolb broke up a possible 1-5 Bates sweep with his effort.

John Greer—One of the outstanding members of the Williams rugby football club, Greer scored one try and aided in another, while playing a fine all-around game in the team's impressive 22-6 win over Springfield Saturday.

Harriers bounce back

by Frank Carr

After heartbreaking losses to W.P.I. and Coast Guard, the varsity cross country team pulled out of its mid-season slump by placing two runners in the top dozen of the NESCAC championships held at Williams last Saturday. There was no team title involved in the meet, and this was a fortunate factor for the Ephs because a combination of illness and injury had demoted three of their top runners to spectators.

The October 20 tri-meet with W.P.I. and Coast Guard was a real disaster as the Ephs' season record took a nose dive to 8-3. Actually the score was close: Coast Guard—36, W.P.I.—40, Williams—44, however, everything that could have gone wrong for the Ephmen did, in fact, go wrong. To begin with, the weather was cold and rainy for the long haul to Worcester and junior Frank Carr was unable to make the trip because he woke up that morning with a stomach virus. Once the race started, things only got worse. Ken Leinbach and Joe Kolb were leading the field by about 70 yds. when, mid-way through the race, they momentarily took a wrong turn and ended up about 50 yds. behind a pack of runners from W.P.I. and Coast Guard.

Joe Kolb traversed the 4.8 mile Williams Course in 25:11 to finish second in the NESCACC last Saturday. (photo by Read)

Last Saturday, Joe Kolb turned in one of the best performances of his college career by placing second in the New England Small College Athletic Conference Championships. The meet consisted of 71 runners from 11 schools and was dominated by Bates (rated 9th in N.E.) who took five of the first six places. Kolb broke up a perfect 1-5 Bates sweep by sprinting past two of the maroon shirted harriers in the final 50 yds. to squeak into the runnerup slot. Kolb's time for the 4.8 mile Williams course was an impressive 25:12.

Captain Ken Leinbach also ran a fine race over the cold, wet course to place 11th at 25:49. Senior Chris Flavin ran his best race of the season, crossing the line in 26:35 for 27th place. Steve Polasky covered the distance in just under 27 minutes in 34th place followed by Steve St. Clair (54th), Cleve Thayer (61st) and Russ Anderson (63rd).

Tomorrow, the purple harriers travel to Boston for the Easterns where they will try to match their fourth place finish of a year ago.

Ruggers outmuscle Springfield

Following a tough loss to Columbia Business in their season opener, the Williams Rugby A side has come back in the last three matches to set their record at 3-1-1. In the squad's second match, Williams overcame in early deficit on Jim Stuart's try and some well executed kicks and hung on for a 9-7 win over Albany Law.

After scrimmaging the Alumni in foul weather, the ruggers again took to the road to face a much improved Siena squad and found themselves on the tail end of a 13-0 halftime score. The next 35 minutes belonged to Williams, however, as Paul Shorb's try and Tom Kondel's drop-kick cut the Siena margin to six points. With six minutes to go in the match, winger Sam Hanchett took a pass from John Greer and drove five yards for the score. Dave Levy's crucial conversion knotted the score at 13 apiece, as time ran out.

Sparked by Jamie Edwards' 35-yard drop-kick which evened the score at 3-3, the club rolled on to defeat hard-hitting Springfield College 20-6. The Williams line controlled the flow of the play but it was a surge by the scrum that netted Jim Stuart his second try of the season. The decisive kicking of Bryne Kelly and Tom Kondel combined with the quick passing of Jack Dupre and Jim Maxwell resulting in scores for John Greer and linking fullback Joe "Dewey" Power.

While the B side's record is not overly impressive, its strong season opening against a tough Columbia team is proof of the squad's potential. Unfortunately, since that game the B side has been plagued by injuries and consequently has had a difficult time fielding players. The club shows a 2-3 season mark.

English town discussed

by Bruce Doblin

In the three-lectures series entitled, "People, Land and Beauty: The English Experience," Christopher Hall, Director of the Council for the Protection of Rural England, expressed his concern over the extensive post World War II land-use alterations which threaten the existence of the traditional rural areas of England.

Hall's first talk, entitled "The Village: Function and Form," dealt with the origin and nature of the rural English village and the present pressures which are drastically effecting its make-up. "The English village", Hall said, "is indescribable. Like a camel, you know it when you see it." The original manor, he said, was self-sufficient and self-governing. Agriculture was the primary occupation of the residents and the village was both a residence and a source of employment. Each village possessed a special character apparent in the village school, pub and activities organized about the village green.

Christopher Hall, Director of the Council for the Protection of Rural England.

With the recent post-war advances in farming methods, the production of food has become increasingly capital-intensive, Hall noted. The resulting loss of employment, especially among youth, has caused several problems. As Hall described the situation, "The village had lost its original function without changing its form."

This rural movement of the young in search of work has also been a concern in America. As the young working population leaves the area there is a loss of children from the school, and of local income taxes which pay for public services. This forces serious cutbacks by the local government.

The English government has moved to aid the rural villages but in a manner which Hall said he believes "deliberately reinforces the economic pressures." The governmental planning policy pinpoints a few villages which are to receive aid, while others receive nothing. Hall stated that these moves are "more than allowing the natural process to occur and are pushing it along. They serve to exchange the indigenous population for something completely different." Those villages not selected must reduce their expenditures on all public services.

The death of the existing community is almost inevitable. Schools shut down, forcing families to bus or relocate their children to an area receiving government aid. For the remaining young couples, the village becomes a bedroom suburb. They must go elsewhere to work, shop and educate their children. As Hall showed, "These villages cannot be allowed to be 'suburbs in the fields,' because they are not in the proper form for this change."

According to Hall, not only has the government doomed the villages which are not selected, but it has destroyed the communities it selects. The village which is targeted to grow becomes so large with immigration from surrounding villages not chosen, that it loses the rural character it sought to preserve.

The government defends its policy of providing aid to a few villages on the grounds that it is too expensive to provide all of them with public transportation, schooling and services. Hall, however, contended that there are stronger economic reasons for the preservation of the rural areas, including a variety of social

College houses to begin inclusion of CDE fellows

by Keron Walker

Nine fellows at the Center for Development Economics will become associated with five row houses in an effort to include graduate students in the campus social life.

Garfield, Spencer, Perry, Fort Hoosac and Mark Hopkins houses chose to offer their resources to CDE fellows. Rita Dillon, one of the directors of the center, said, "We hope by this inclusion to encourage social interaction with the undergraduates. The houses will sponsor fellows in activities such as guest meals, informal gatherings and the like."

The separation of the graduate students from undergraduates results from the physical isolation of the center and age differences. The fellows range in age from the early twenties to the late thirties.

Iyabo Idowu, one of four women at the center, said, "The twenty-two of us feel generally isolated from the rest of the campus. The center is basically self-contained, with its own library, accommodations and dining room; we have little need to go outside. I would like to see more of the campus and the people who live on it."

"The students here have been educated in their own countries and have a great desire to see what an American college community is like," Dillon continued. "They have such varied and interesting backgrounds that it is rather a shame that there has been no real previous effort to include them and share these experiences."

The only existing link with the college has been the econometrics class, which is offered as both an undergraduate and CDE course. Two seniors presently take the course, which is taught at the center.

Fellows follow a 9-month course of study at Williams which includes statistics, international trade, development planning and the principles of development this semester. They attended an economics institute in Colorado over the summer to review principles and to improve their English. Their year of study will lead to a Master of Economics degree awarded in June.

All of the fellows hold degrees from institutions in their countries and have been employed or will be employed in government offices when they return. Applicants were interviewed by professors either on sabbatical away from the United States or associated with the Edward Mason program at Harvard, which makes post-graduate study available to foreign students.

Nancy Marrero, a student from the Philippines, explained that the program at Williams is very demanding academically and perhaps hinders interaction with students outside of the center. "We are a very close group, somewhat akin to a family. We are anxious to get to know the campus and the students, but academics are time-consuming."

Dillon agreed. "There have been a great many pressures in the last few weeks," she said, "and perhaps more will sign up for affiliation with the houses as soon as they feel more free to do so."

Director says security needs staff increase

While College enrollment has increased by approximately 500 students in the past five years, the size of the Williams security force has not grown during this period. Security is operating on a "minimum" basis according to Security Director Walter C. O'Brien. He added that he "could ideally use two more men and one more cruiser," citing budgetary problems as the difficulty in hiring additional men.

Dean of the College Peter Berek said the force, which consists of 9 officers working a 40-hr. week under O'Brien with one cruiser at its disposal, is sufficient for Williams' needs. "We want a force that is precisely as big and well-equipped as it needs to be," he stated, "and no larger." Berek added that he felt security's budgetary allowance to be adequate and that the formation of a larger and stronger force would only serve to change the character of the campus. O'Brien did not feel that a small increase in security personnel would change the campus significantly.

The campus Security force has not grown during the last five years, while enrollment has increased by 500. (photo by Read)

The busiest period for the security force is the critical period between 10 p.m. and 3 a.m., when the bulk of personnel are on duty. Although O'Brien feels that they have been "getting along alright," he is working with the College Council and the Dean's Office to see if student monitors can be employed during this time. Such monitors would possibly operate the switchboard, respond to escort calls, and handle room openings. A similar system is being put into effect whereby students will help monitor campus parties with a security officer, reducing the amount of outside help that needs to be hired

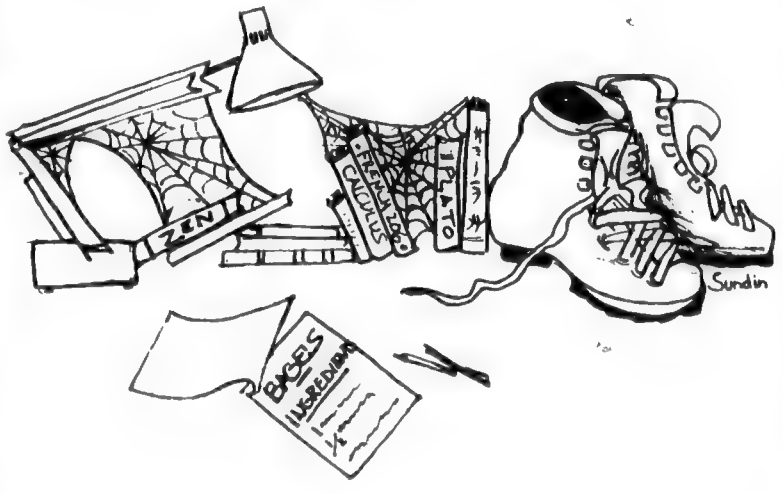
Free University plans for WSP



The Winter Study Period in January is defined by the College as an opportunity for intellectual, social, and cultural enrichment in which students have time to explore fields related or unrelated to the regular semester curriculum. Unfortunately, the increase in free time during WSP is often not used to its fullest potential, and boredom results. To some, the winter doldrums obliterate any sense of enrichment, and to others, the month of January is a much-needed rest period from the common affliction of terminal academia.

In any case, the Free University obviates the excuse of boredom. There can be no doubt that learning is infinitely more enjoyable, and attitudes more eager, when the pressure for grades is relieved. A regular semester course that proved potentially interesting, but was hastily thought of as drudgery because of academic rigor, can now be an enjoyable course in itself.

This year, the Free University is directed by three students: Anne Weismann, '77; Shailah Stewart, '77; and Sue Shellenberger, '78. Courses offered by the Free University are free of charge, and open to the public as well as Williams students. They are ungraded, have no prerequisites, and are usually taught by students or townspeople. The courses meet one or two times a week on campus in January, but length and scheduling of each course is variable with each instructor; if there is sufficient interest in the course, it may continue into the spring semester. There is great variety of courses, ranging from bagel-making, tobacco chewing, and whittling to belly dancing and origami. In addition to the craft-talent courses, there are a number of instructional seminars and forums for discussions. These include musical instruction, poetry workshops, investing and marketing, Emergency Medical Care, auto mechanics, computer programming, Zen meditation, and ballroom dancing.

The Free University not only offers an opportunity for the sharing of knowledge between students, but it gives the student teachers a taste of informal instruction. Each "amateur professor" has total flexibility in moding his or her own course to a rigid structure or to an informal discussion session.

Members of the community as well as Williams students are encouraged to contact Anne (458-5474), Shailah (458-9091), or Sue (597-2784) for more information. For those desiring to teach, course titles and descriptions are due by Wednesday, November 17 to Student Union boxes 3062, 3015, or 2451.

Cynthia Krizack found strangled near Pittsfield

Results of an autopsy conducted Monday night revealed that seventeen year old Cynthia Krizack died of strangulation on or about October 7, the date she was reported missing from her home in Williamstown.

State Police Detective Lieutenant Milo F. Brown, said authorities found no evidence of sexual assault.

Medical examiners were unsure how long the body had been in the woods where it was discovered Sunday afternoon. A trapper found the body at the base of a 35-foot embankment in Windsor, northeast of Pittsfield.

Brown refused to comment on possible suspects and authorities concede that they have found little evidence in the case.

In an article printed Monday, the Berkshire Eagle noted that the Krizack's death "recalls in some aspects" the death of an eighteen year old North Adams girl two years ago. The body of Kim Benoit was found at the bottom of a slope near the Deerfield River in Florida, Mass. after she had been reported missing from her hometown. "Detectives believe Miss Benoit was strangled, but her death remains unsolved," the article read.

NEWS BRIEFS

Tight security for J. Geils

College security at the J. Geils Band concert Friday will be approximately doubled, according to Director of Security Walter C. O'Brien. More ACEC members than usual will be on duty and Williamstown Police will also attend, said O'Brien.

This performance will be the first rock concert held in Chapin Hall since a 1973 performance by New Riders of the Purple Sage. Prevalent drinking and smoking during that concert, the extensive cleaning effort required afterward, and the slashing of some of Chapins chairs led to a decision to prohibit future rock concerts in the building.

O'Brien stated that the future of Chapin Hall as a forum for rock concerts rests on this performance.

Photocopy guidelines changed

Possible revision of the present copyrighting law prompted the College library to set new guidelines for photocopying. According to Head Librarian Lawrence Wikander, the library will not duplicate a book for multiple copies if its title page is 1919 or later, unless "the book is out-of-print or the library has the permission of the copyright owner."

The present national law does not permit copyrighting until 56 years after the work was written. The proposed legislative revision would create a waiting period of the life of the author plus 50 years.

Wikander defined two categories of copying. "Fair Use" permits one copy of any work for an individual researcher or for a borrowing library. "Systematic copying" allows printing multiple copies of the same material. These criterion, Wikander said, are set to eliminate abuse of copyrighting privileges.

The College does not presently penalize persons who use the library's xerox machines to copy works, although a notice explaining copyrighting regulations is posted near the machines.

Despite a "boom" in photocopying in the last 15 to 20 years, Wikander said the library does not regulate the amount of material to be copied. Individual departments are billed for copying materials and they define their own limits on use of the xerox facilities, he explained.

CALENDAR

Lectures

Dr. Nicholas M. Ratcliffe, Professor of Geology at the City College of New York, will lecture Wednesday at 8 p.m. in Room 111 of the Biology building. Ratcliffe (Williams '60) has conducted research with the US Geological Survey in the central and southern portions of Berkshire County. His lecture entitled "Grand Scale Tectonics in Western New England" relates the results of his work and how geological history of the region should be interpreted.

Stokely Carmichael, the former Field Marshall for The Black Panther Party and National Chairman for SNCC (Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee) and currently chairman of the All-African Peoples Revolutionary Party will be discussing African revolutionary movements and the role of the United States and Afro-Americans with respect to these movements.

Carmichael will be speaking at 8:30 p.m. in Chapin Hall. He is sponsored by the Williams Black Student Union, The Lecture Committee, The Afro-American Studies Committee and the Political Science Department.

On Friday, Nov. 5, Michel L. Balinski will give a talk entitled "U.S. Congressional Apportionment: A Case History of the Mathematics of Fair Division." The talk will take place at 4:00 p.m. in Room 104, in Bronfman.

Balinski '54 is currently the Editor-in-Chief of "Mathematical Programming," a publication of the International Institute for Applied Systems Analysis, Vienna. Balinski is considered to be one of the foremost authorities on the question of apportionment.

WBSU Repertory Company

The Williams' Black Student Union's Repertory Company will present "The One," a play directed by William Spriggs, this Friday and Saturday evenings at 8:30 p.m. in the Rathskellar. Ralph Breedlove plays the role of 'The One.' Free tickets will be distributed one half hour before the performance.

Boston Repertory Theatre

Moliere's comic masterpiece The Misanthrope is opened Oct. 21 at the new Boston Repertory Theatre, One Boylston Place, Boston. It will run through Nov. 28. The production is a glamorous contemporary version of the comedy concerning jealously, love, hypocricy and romantic intrigue. Performances are Wed., Sat. at 8:00, Sat. at 2 and Sun. at 3 p.m. For group rates, call 423-6580.

Analysis

Massachusetts Ballot

by Scott Hoot

The nine referenda on this year's Massachusetts ballot have drawn more publicity and interest than the regular elective contests. The voters are in the unique position of deciding a number of crucial issues with a few flicks of their wrist. First I'll recap the races facing Williamstown voters and then briefly explain the referenda.

The Senate contest is a non-race. Kennedy will do well everywhere, but, perhaps, South Boston. Mike Robertson, his Republican challenger, will return to Berkeley and wait to tell his grandchildren that he ran against a Kennedy.

The Congressional race in the First District also lacks suspense. Edward McColgan, the Democratic nominee, got a late start due to a complicated primary recount, and has managed to create little publicity with little funds. He has criticized incumbent Silvio Conte's acceptance of country-club weekends and his refusal to debate. Conte's constituent service is strong, his moderately liberal record is cautious, and he is generally playing it safe. He has also received endorsements from such liberal groups as the National Education Assoc., and the League of Conservation Voters.

The State Senate race, discussed in an earlier issue of the Record, has taken no dramatic turns. Senator Fitzpatrick has been endorsed by the North Adams Transcript despite his opposition to the Bottle Bill, a ban on handguns, and a nuclear power slowdown. That paper questioned his challenger's qualities to lead and persuade.

The contest for the State House has developed an interesting twist. Williamstown resident Dagmar Bubriski has entered as a sticker (write-in) candidate after her unsuccessful bid for the Democratic nomination. She nearly beat Incumbent Anthony McBride in the primary by carrying Williamstown 3-1. Her candidacy could help the Republican nominee Vincent Zajac. McBride has been accused of very high absenteeism. He was the only Representative to vote against absentee voting for religious reasons, an issue appearing on the ballot as Question Number 3.

Following is a summary of the nine questions. Most are controversial and campaign spending has been running high.

Question No. 1—The ERA. This is probably the most widely known and least understood of the issues. It simply insures equality under the law not dependent on sex, race, color, creed, or national origin. A similar proposal was defeated last year in New York and New Jersey. If it does not pass here the National Amendment will be in more serious trouble; many feel it will have reached its doom.

Question No. 2—The Graduated Income Tax. This proposal would change the Massachusetts state tax structure to resemble that of the Federal government. State taxpayers now pay income tax on a percentage basis. Similar proposals have been defeated in the past, even though all persons making less than $22,000 would benefit from the passage of this bill. One theory is that people desire an incentive to become wealthy.

Question No. 3—Religious Absentee Voting. This is a very uncontroversial proposal to allow absentee voting for religious reasons.

Question Number 4—Massachusetts Power Authority This proposal, if passed would take the distribution of wholesale electric power away from the private utilities and provide for one public authority. Proponents argue that electric power—like water, sewage, and roads should be financed and delivered on a non-profit basis. They say Massachusetts has the highest rates in the country and a monopoly of private companies. The environment is another consideration of the proponents. Opponents counter with the miserable record of the state's fiscal planning; that rate increases would be automatic; and that 99.9 per cent reliability would be sacrificed.

Question No. 5—Banning Private Handguns. Part A of this question would prohibit the possession, ownership or sale of any weapon from which a shot or bullet can be discharged and which has a barrel length of less than sixteen inches. There would be exceptions for the military, police and museums. The proposed ban is not expected to pass and supporters of other questions are fearing that this posposal will draw out many "no" voters. Part 5B would make mandatory the serving of minimum sentences for certain crimes committed with firearms. Manslaughter, mayhem, and armed robbery are amongst the crimes specifically mentioned.

Question No. 6—The Bottle Bill. This citizen-initiated proposal (discussed earlier this fall in the RECORD) would require every beverage container sold in Massachusetts to carry a deposit of at least five cents, and would prohibit the use of flip-top cans. Proponents are primarily concerned with litter and energy, and point to results in Oregon and Vermont which have similar laws in effect. Opponents are worrying over the possible loss of jobs if bottle and can production is slowed. Supporters respond that jobs would be created in recycling the containers. There has been heavy outside opposition from beverage industries.

Question No. 7—Flat-Rate Electricity. The Williams College Administration has its worries over this proposal. Even rates for electricity would eliminate incremental savings to big electric users. Today rates decrease as consumption increases.

Question No. 8—Oil Refinery and Deep Water Port. This is a non-binding question placed on the ballot by the legislature to feel this pulse of the voters concerning such construction. If a specific proposal is made it would still be subject to the approval of the communities involved.

Question No. 9—Sunday Liquor Laws. This is another non-binding referendum asking voters to make known their feelings toward Sunday opening of certain retail stores, including liquor stores. Today most retail and all package liquor stores must be closed on Sunday.

Corrections

There were two misprints in the recommendation column of the CC allocation graph found on page one of the last Record. The recommendation for the ACEC was $15000 instead of $15600 and that for the Lehman Service Council was $4728 instead of $4720.

Letter: ERA supported

To the editor:

Many issues of varying importance will be decided at the polls today. One of the most crucial to the status of women is the state Equal Rights Amendment. Consistent with a position which strives to ensure that all persons be treated with dignity as human beings, members of the Berkshire Chapter of the National Youth Pro-Life Coalition at Williams support the Massachusetts ERA.

"Pro-Life" to us means that we work to implement positive non-violent solutions to the problems we face. The ERA, by according to not only women, but to those discriminated against because of race, color, creed, or national origin, their rights under the law as individuals in our Constitution, synbolizes just such an effort.

We feel a responsibility to actively support groups in our society struggling to overthrow societal and political injustices that keep down women, minorities, the young, the elderly, the handicapped, and others. We urge all Massachusetts residents to continue making this philosophy behind the ERA a reality after the election.

For life,
Cathleen Higgins, '79
Chairperson, Berkshire Chapter

O'Brien currently receives additional help from campus employees and the Williamstown Police when needed. For example, eight or nine additional men will be hired to work during the J. Geils Band concert next Saturday. In the event of an emergency situation, such as the recent bomb scare at Greylock, outside help from such sources as the Williamstown Police is called upon. "Security can handle its ordinary workload," according to O'Brien.

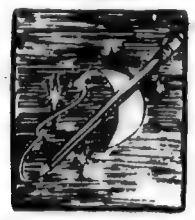
The GUL

by Larry Saunders



Last Wednesday's night council debate over the funding of the GUL was long and sometimes passionate, yet it ended without resolving the key question of the meeting: How many students on campus really want a copy of the yearbook?

The GUL presents a unique case in the funding consideration. It is the oldest publication on campus and is legitimized by tradition. Until this year, the council had always overwhelmingly supported full funding of the yearbook, no questions asked.

This year's Finance Committee tried to change this blind acceptance. They did not question the overall value of the yearbook; they only wanted to find some means with which they could determine student demand for the book. The committee concluded that offering the GUL on a subscription basis would be the best way to determine demand.

The problem with the Finance Committee's plan was that it was revealed at too late a date. Council members were not informed of this subscription option until meeting time. They had no way to discuss this new plan with their house members to discern student reaction to this plan. As is too often the case, the council members were the only students aware of the issue and therefore, the only ones whose opinions mattered. Because the members had no real facts to appeal to for a debate on the actual student demand for the yearbook, discussion centered on whether Williams students should or should not have a quality GUL. In the end, the council determined that everyone should have a yearbook and therefore full funding was in order.

All of this leaves the question of demand still unresolved. The Finance Committee's plan may have been a solution, but the students never really had an opportunity to pass judgment on it.

The Trial

by Tony Spaeth

On his twentieth birthday Joseph K. awoke to find himself on academic probation. His sleep was disturbed by a frightening nightmare which involved Barbara Walters whispering the 7:00 news to him in his sleep while holding a blazing birthday cake. It was hardly a dream, indeed Joseph K. was not alone in his Greylock single. But instead of Barbara's face he awoke to the stern expressions of Nancy McIntryre, Neil Grabois, and Henry Flynt. "What are you doing in my room?" he cried. "Quiet," said Eileen Julien as she joined the other three. "Don't make a scene." They all started to search the room, bumping into each other in the cramped quarters. K. reached for his bathrobe so he could get out of bed decently, but Henry Flynt grabbed it first. "Nope. Sorry. We need this!" "But what is this all about?" implored K. Each of them froze, and turning slowly to face K. chanted in unison, "YOU ARE ON ACADEMIC PROBATION!" K. sunk under his covers with a desperate whimper: ". . . why? . . ."

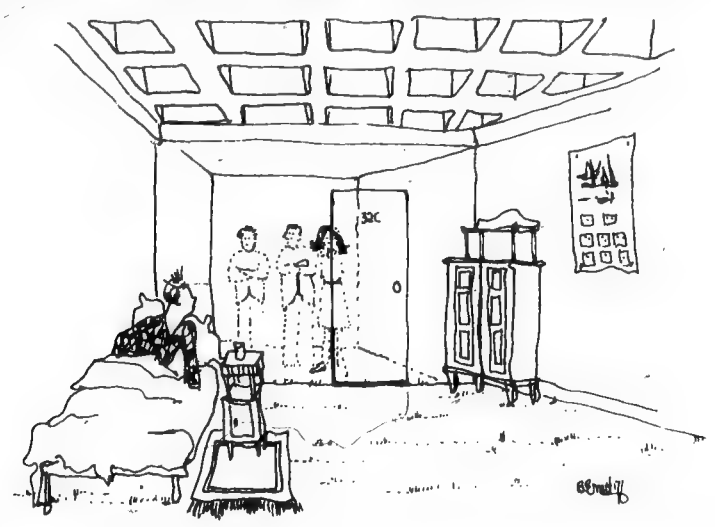
For the next few weeks Joseph K. made constant inquiries, but every door of Hopkins Hall was closed to him. He could not determine the nature of his offense. Until one day, while waiting on the "quick service" line of the snack bar, K. was approached by Ptl. Bill Busl of Campus Security. "Come with me. I am your defense counsel. I am to bring you to your trial before the . . . C.A.S.!" No one could believe it when they saw K. led from the snack bar blindfolded. "And isn't he in the Gargoyle Society?" asked one observer.

When they arrived at their destination K. was allowed to remove his blindfold. He took a long, worried look around himself. Before him sat the entire C.A.S. dressed in fur skirts, breast plates, and viking headgear. They were perched behind a twenty-foot plywood replica of the facade of Chapin Hall. Subtle make-up made them all look frighteningly mongolian. And although the light was dim and the room was quickly filling with an eerie fog (produced by a loud dry-ice machine in the corner), K. thought that he recognized the room as being located somewhere in the old stacks of Stetson Hall.

A magnified voice boomed: "JOSEPH K.: HOW DO YOU PLEAD TO THE CHARGES AGAINST YOU?"

"Wait! I don't even know what the charges are!"

"JOSEPH K.: YOU ARE FOUND GUILTY OF THE CHARGES BROUGHT AGAINST YOU."



"But wait . . . uh, isn't a reporter from The Record allowed to sit in? Uh, I'm an English major, and . . ."

"JOSEPH K.: WHAT ARE THE REST OF THE LETTERS IN YOUR LAST NAME?"

"I don't understand . . . What are the what? . . . You don't underst . . ."

K.'s sentence was to be delivered to him care of his S.U. box number, but he never received any notification. His pleas to the women in the Registrar's office (who also looked strangely mongolian) fell on deaf ears.

On his twenty-first birthday Joseph K. finally realized his sentence. It was a Wednesday, and to K.'s surprise he found himself dragged from his dorm room by three of the Drummond's linen-changers. He was tied to a grandstand at Weston field as the workers prepared to smother him with four towels. He saw a motion in the bushes near the golf course. What was it? Did the C.A.S. reverse its decision? Or was help at hand? Was it a good man? A friend? Was it one person or all of mankind? It was one person: Rudy Goff. He had lost a golf ball in the rough. "God Damn it," he said. And with that Joseph K. was executed.

CUL report on alcoholism misrepresents role of houses

by Bruce Doblin

The recent citing of the CUL of the excessive use of alcohol as a potentially serious problem on campus has received a variety of criticisms in recent weeks. The report stated, "Most houses probably spend $2,000 a year or more on alcohol. Hard drug use does not seem to be a serious problem on the Williams campus, but alcoholism may be. The atmosphere in many houses is at best one that encourages and even pressures students to become social drinkers." There has been swift and critical response to this controversial statement.

"Two thousand dollars a year on alcohol is a surprisingly large amount of money for each house to spend," commented Gene Falk, manager of the Log, "but it is an extremely misleading figure." "The average expenditure per night in the Log is between $1.15 and $1.25. This amounts to two beers and a bag of munchies, and does not seem to be excessive." As Falk explained, for an average school year of 30 weeks and a house of 75 people, this amounts to only $.88 per person per week. If all the alcohol purchased by one house was limited only to house members, the house would be providing only two or three drinks per week for each member.

One house president agreed that an aggregate figure like $2,000 is very misleading, because it gives the impression that alcohol is the primary focus of each party. When a house gives a party, it pays no rent and usually uses a tape or stereo to save money. Alcohol therefore represents a majority of the house expenses even though it is only of minor importance.

The existence of pressure on students to become social drinkers was also disputed. Dan Felizberto, president of Williams HEW, claimed that the pressure to drink occurs primarily in high school. "Once a student arrives at college their views on alcohol are usually set. These may change while here at school, but pressure to drink will not be a major reason. People here are very open minded and will respect the choice of others to drink or not to drink."

Although it may not be feasible to provide an alternative beverage for the non-drinker at college functions, most houses have become sensitive to the desires of the non-drinkers. As the CUL report contended, many houses have set lower social dues for those who do not wish to drink. Many parties have both alcoholic and non-alcoholic drinks. The CUL report expressed the fear that students could refuse to pay social dues only at the cost of being excluded from many houses activities."

Each student pays a House Maintenance Tax which is collected by the College and redistributed to the houses. Many houses have begun to keep separate financial records for funds received from social dues and the tax they receive from the College. House officers are also expanding the range of their activities to involve all of the members.

According to Professor Earl McFarland, Chairman of the CUL, alcoholism is not a major problem. "There may be a very small number of students with drinking problems, but as the house presidents have pointed out it is not the houses which are getting people into trouble. Their drinking is primarily self-supported, and not dependent on house parties." McFarland said that the general trend of house social functions is moving away from heavy use of alcohol, although there is a great deal of variation between houses.

"The aim of the report was not to portray alcoholism as a major concern of the CUL," McFarland asserted, "but to point out a potential problem area, and sensitize the house officers to the needs and the desires of the non-drinkers. The house presidents have been quite helpful and receptive to our work, and I have been generally pleased."

Many students criticized the tone of the report, which said, "At worst a small but growing number of students may have passed beyond the social drinking stage and will be on their way to becoming alcoholic. It would be tragic if for some students alcoholism were their major legacy from Williams College . . ."

Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad, also a member of CUL, replied that the tone of the report was negative because it focused only on College problems and not on the advantages resulting from the present residential housing system. He added that most of the disagreement with the CUL report has centered around the alcohol section.

'Room', 'Revue' entertain delightfully

by Thomas Herwitz

Ira Levin's quick witted and suspenseful murder-mystery Veronica's Room was pitted against Harold Pinter's masterfully witty Revue Sketches in the newly renovated Studio Theater of the AMT. The winner, of course, was the audience which was treated to both thrill and entertainment in a single evening. Though Veronica's Room—a Halloween treat—closed Saturday evening, the sketches can still be seen at the Log tomorrow and Thursday evenings at 9:00 p.m.

Veronica's Room is not only a good mystery, but, at times, a funny one as well. The references to student life in the early 70's strikes a still fresh chord today, and the technique of breaking the tension with humor is an effective one. In fact, it was the humor of the play that supported it. Anne Calcagno was delightful as the unsuspecting student who becomes the victim of a demented reliving of history. Her changing moods effectively paved the way for the changing mood of the play, and her performance was solid throughout. Cyndy Tufts, Craig Elliott, and Sally Umberger were all important factors in the success of the piece.

The four Pinter sketches The Black and White, Trouble in the Works, Applicant, and Last to Go are early works by the modern British masterplayright. Written in 1959, they are pure Pinter charm—playful Pinter. They are lighthearted training pieces for the style which would be the Pinter trademark in the later more sophisticated works. His famous pauses, meticulous use of language, and probing of the futility of human conversation all join together to make the sketches wonderfully entertaining. Sally Umberger, Ann Silvi, Mitch Katz, and Dan Adkinson group and regroup to play the different characters in the pieces.

Peter Bergethon's direction is practical. In Veronica's Room, he demonstrates his mastery of stage movement and stage fighting. In the Sketches he has created some very funny moments. And the concept of presenting the Pinter in the classic British beer hall atmosphere of the Log is an insightful and creative one indeed. Though the works were not polished they were full of life, and that factor was enough to make for a lively and enjoyable evening.

Intentional coincidence theory confirms election prediction

by Chip Buckner

At election time every four years prognosticators across the nation take opinion polls of the electroate, consult stock market price indices and analyze past voting records to try to determine the presidential election outcome. Simpler methods exist, and the best of these, 100 per cent accurate since its inception in 1960, appears below.

The Intentional Coincidence method is a combination of three statistics: the Williams mock election returns, the World Series outcome and the relative heights of the two major candidates. These figures, when correctly interpreted, never fail to pick the winner of the presidential sweepstakes.

Criteria No. 1: The Williams Mock Election.

Since 1960 Williams College has conducted some kind of poll or election to determine the students' presidential preference. (The Record shows no survey for 1956, the 85 votes of the registered voters is the only tabulation for 1952, and no one could be bothered to look for a 1948 Record.) With the exception of 1964 Williams has never picked the winner. Nixon won in a narrow contest in 1960, Humphrey and McGovern won big in 1968 and 1972. So the loser of the Williams election is virtually always the national favorite. Since Carter won a narrow victory here in October, indicator No. 1 points to Ford.

Criteria No. 2: The World Series Winner.

Without fail, from the 1960 to the present, whenever the National League wins the World Series, a Democrat captures the White House. Conversely a Republican wins along with the American League. Democrats Kennedy and Johnson followed on the bats of the Pirates in '60 and the Cardinals in '64, and Nixon won his position along with the Tigers in '68 and the A's in '72. Extrapolating to the logical conclusion, the Cincinnati 4-game sweep over the New York Yankees should assure a victory for Carter and the Democratic party.

Criteria No. 3: The Taller Man Theory.

Since the first two factors conflict, the height hypothesis will determine the winner. Throughout the twentieth century the taller of the two major candidates virtually always wins. Kennedy looked down on Nixon, who in turn overlooked Humphrey and McGovern, and Johnson measured a smidgen taller than Goldwater. Jimmy Carter gives his height as 5 foot 8, Gerald Ford is 6 foot 1. Compared to Jerry, Jimmy just comes up short. Unless the President wears elevator shoes, Ford takes the third criteria.

The system has never failed. If two or more of the criteria match, the man always wins. So before a single key precinct reports, the Record Plan picks Gerald Ford to win a full term at the Presidency.

Sloane brings new blood to OCC

by Kiki Spencer

The Office of Career Counseling has always had an important, if unobtrusive, role at Williams. This tendency may undergo an abrupt change with the addition of a new face to the office in the person of Mary Margaret Sloane.

Peggy Sloane, as she is usually known, comes to Williams after two years as Assistant Director of the Vocational Office at Smith College. With her she brings a number of years of teaching experience and graduate study in family studies and counseling.

Sloane's interest in career services and human development stemmed from growing up in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, a town in which few people went to high school or college and in which there were few opportunities for careers open. After graduating from Penn State with majors in psychology and sociology, she tried different careers, but with no guidance felt she "should be somewhere else."

Teaching did not seem to be the answer, although she tried that option at a high school in West Port, Connecticut and later at Mount Greylock High School in Williamstown, where her attempts to change the unprogressive Home Economics program were not very well accepted.

With the feeling that she still "didn't know where to go," Sloane finished her degree in Home Economics and Counseling at the University of Massachusetts and became more interested in higher educational student services and the one-to-one work that it entailed. This interest led to the job at Smith, and ultimately to her appointment at Williams, where her husband, Charles Sloane, is a member of the Athletics Department.

The Williams Office of Career Counselling as Sloane found it implemented good programs, had a very dedicated staff, yet "needed someone to help tie it together on a long time basis." In contrast to the Smith office, which had twelve staff members all year long, at Williams only the office assistant and the director worked during the summer. In the fall they had to wait until everyone arrived before work could commence. This limitation has been smoothed over with the addition of a new office member who sees to a more efficient execution of the paper work.

The main goals of the office, according to the new director, are to "know how to help people get started" on deciding on a career, and to place "emphasis on the worth and dignity of all kinds of choices." Sloane feels the greatest time and assistance should be given to those students who don't have any idea what they want to do, and to those who favor less traditional types of work.

Recognizing the diversity of students at Williams, and having a special interest in different ideas, Sloane delights in listening to students as they explore several options in "justifying their education and sorting out their values."

The process of career counselling at Williams differs significantly from Smith, according to Sloane, in that here the faculty and the specific departments have a more important role in the placement of students, while the office serves to point students in the right direction. Sloane would like to see the development of a "more visible alumni network", especially in terms of assistance programs such as mini-internships coordinated on an individual basis. Also, she feels that providing better records should be of primary importance, since the key to effective counseling is "using every source available."

With all these goals and ideas in mind, Peggy Sloane would like to see the office become a place where students can just go and talk and take advantage of the different opportunities available.

Hall fears for rural England

costs now being ignored.

Hall's second speech, "The Land: Monoculture vs. Multi-Use," dealt with the English belief that land is a common right of all. He showed slides of century-old foot paths which belong to the public. He also described the hedgerow, which originally served to boarder the farmer's field. Many of these hedges are hundreds of years old and serve as historical monuments of past battles and feuds.

Since the end of World War II, the English government has been working to make its country self-sufficient in its production of food. Due to improvements in farm technology and government incentives a great deal of previously marginal farm land has been converted into agricultural use. Agricultural land in England has traditionally served many purposes. It is important for the production of food, and for its recreational value. According to Hall, the rural character and recreational use is now being severely limited.

Economies of scale have also made the footpaths and hedgerows more of a nuisance to the farmers, and as Hall pointed out, they are disappearing from the countryside and altering the visual appearance of the rural areas. Hall said that government pressures are changing the traditional landscape into a homogeneous and monocultural area in disregard for the tradition of multi-use.

Hall's third topic, "Protection: Three Decades of Land-Use Planning Control," reiterated his concern for the preservation of rural England. He stated that the public must have a greater voice in planning policy and that more than economic factors must be considered when proposing public landuse legislation.

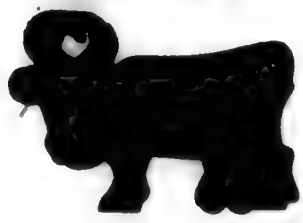
take this job to annoy them. I am very committed. I'm understanding as a person, but I can't always do what the student asks."



Since the student does not get what he wants, Jankey believes that the unhappy undergraduate views him as "rigid, unyielding, even sanctimonious." The student housing director becomes "frustrated and discouraged that I can't communicate my role to the student." Although he has attempted to dispel the preconceived notion of the student body that he is an ogre, he admits, "I don't get too concerned about what people say about me."

After dealing with all of these problems in his job, which he calls "almost amoeba-like" in regard to his duties, he spends part of his time as assistant coach for men's varsity lacrosse. Jankey considers lacrosse "a very enjoyable part of my life. It's a game I truly love." He sees himself as a lax teacher rather than a coach; each summer he teaches lacrosse for a week at a camp. His goal in teaching this "great game" is to "give kids an opportunity to work as a team. Also, through lacrosse, you find out a great deal about yourself."

Furthermore, he and his family take "delight in being able to involve ourselves in a community where you can have some impact." According to Jankey, who is active in Community affairs, they like living in Williamstown because "here you know and work with a lot of your neighbors." "I view myself as unique," states the Williams alumnus and past J.A. in Sage Hall. "I believe in what the school is doing. I support the educational goals of the College."

"As director of housing, I try to be sensitive," he insists. He feels that this sensitivity is not always obvious to the students intent on solving their own problems. Since Jankey "would rather listen than talk" when students come to see him, he thinks that they often get the wrong impression of him. While he attempts to be understanding, they view him as not committed and not caring. This has Jankey concerned with the thought that students are telling unkind stories about him. "Here at Williams," he concludes, "the rumor mill works overtime."

CC verdict forces WHEW to disband

Dan Feliztberto has disbanded the Williams Health, Education and Welfare Organization (WHEW) after a Finance Committee recommendation that it receive no funds in the coming year.

Felizberto, president of WHEW, said that the Housing Committee will take over the responsibilities formerly held by the organization, including the sponsorship of the Winter Carnival, Spring Weekend and all-college mixers. "I saw no reason to continue without money or support," he said.

Chairman of the Finance Committee Clarence Otis said that "The Housing Committee had basically usurped the responsibilities of the WHEW. We made no recommendation because the Housing Committee is now organized enough to take on the duties. In its time, WHEW initiated activities between the houses and saw that there were no conflicts. Now, though, we believe the coordination will be more efficient if the Housing Committee handles it."

According to new policy, the Houses will sponsor special functions and foot the bill for the costs incurred. Last year WHEW received $1,050 for its activities.

"I realize that the College Council is making an attempt to raise the level of efficiency of its workings," Feliztberto said, "but I don't believe that they have an accurate idea of WHEW's duties. At any rate, the total lack of funds made us an obviously ineffective organization."

Otis said that Feliztberto has nevertheless offered his unconditional help to the Housing Committee in carrying out its new responsibilities.

The vice-president of the WHEW, Andy Gerra, said that the organization was composed of many of the members that make up the Housing Committee. "The Finance Committee and the College Council in general thought that the duplication was unnecessary," he said.

Senior Tom Redden caught two Don Wallace fourth down aerials for touchdowns, capping the Purple's fourth quarter explosion against Union. (Oettgen)

Score 17 in 4th quarter

Footballers stop Union, 24-19

by Tim Layden

Nothing like a good old-fashioned, fourth-quarter, come-from-behind barnburner win to bring an up and down football team out of the doldrums and into readiness for Little Three play. This is precisely what the Eph gridders treated a crowd of 3,000 to Saturday in an exciting 24-19 win over surprising Union.

With just three minutes remaining in the third quarter, a sleeper for the first 30 minutes, Williams found itself on the short end of a 19-7 count. The hungry Union squad seemed on the verge of their first victory in Williamstown since 1948.

At this point, however, the guardian angel of Williams football sprinkled a little dust on Weston Field and the Ephs mustered a remarkable comeback. To be more realistic, the Purple offense, behind sophomore Ken Hollingsworth's two key catches, played absolutely gutty football for the game's final 20 minutes.

On a third and eight from the Eph 38, Wallace tossed a bomb into traffic near the Union 35. Hollingsworth made a diving, juggling catch which would have made Lynn Swann proud and more important, set up a first down well into Garnet territory.

Two plays later, Wallace closed out the third quarter by going deep again, hitting a wide open Hollingsworth on the Union one. The two catches "sparked the Williams offense," according to coach Bob Odell, and set up a clutch fourth down touchdown pass from Wallace to Tom Redden. Kevin Cramer's conversion brought the Ephs within five points at 19-14.

Union quickly turned the ball back over to Williams, running three plays and punting. A big 18-yard gain by freshman Gus Nuzzolese put the Purple in position on the 32, and a pass interference call against Union left the Ephs on the Union four.

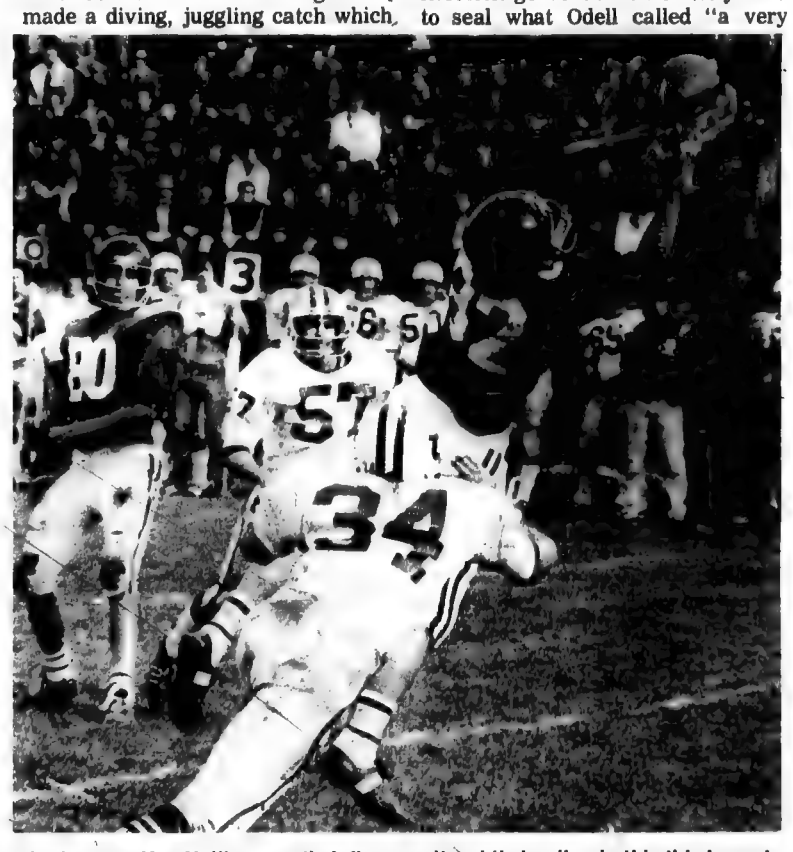
Once again, Wallace showed he has a flair for the dramatic, waiting until fourth down to get the game's winning score. The senior went to the reliable Redden again, hitting him with the game winner in the left side of the end zone.

Cramer added a conversion and his first field goal of the season (33 yards) to seal what Odell called "a very pleasing win." The Ephs have now evened their season record at 3-3, while Union drops to 2-4.

"Union is a very well-drilled football team, I was happy with the way we came back," said Odell, noting that "first-half penalties were very frustrating."

Williams scored first in the game, as Scott Harrington plunged over from the one. Union tied the game up just before halftime as freshman halfback Rich Romer (107 yards) scored from five yards out.

A pass interception and a fumble in the opening minutes of the second half led to Union scores, as Doug Nappadano, another freshman, got short touchdown runs.



Union has traditionally been a team which represented the schedule pushover for the Ephs before heading into Little Three play, but such is obviously no longer the case. Union is an improved football squad which simply hasn't learned how to win yet. With 11 freshmen starting, Williams fans can rest assured they haven't seen the last of the Dutchmen.

As for Williams, the win was one which was absolutely needed. The people who had the big hands in the clutch performance were the old hands of the team. Emmett Creahan, Tom Redden, Don Wallace, Todd Nelp, Dave Libardi, just to name a few, all played like they knew this was no game to lose.

Offensively, Scott Harrington was still not up to full strength, while Nuzzolese was used only sparingly. Bright spots were certainly Hollingsworth, whose first true trial under fire was a huge success and of course, Herb McCormick, whose six catches put him over 30 for the season.

Next on the agenda for Williams is the Little Three, a very balanced triumverate this season, as preseason favorite Wesleyan has shown their vulnerability by dropping a wild and woolly 42-35 decision to lowly Bowdoin Saturday. Amherst saw their season record dip to 2-4 with an 18-17 loss to upstart Tufts, but the Jeffs have been soundly handled only once.

So the Ephmen are now back on the winning track, and, if you'll pardon the expression, just in the nick of time. The next two weeks promise to be most interesting. Williams has five straight Little Three titles on the line Saturday, and the Union win shows the gridders have the guts to scrap with anyone. Get your Wesleyan tickets and hold on to your hats, there's gonna be some hitting goin' on.

Purple kickers slip by Springfield, 1-0

by Rich Abrams

"Anytime you beat them on their home field, it's really a big victory." Thus, Williams soccer coach Jeff Vennell summed up the Eph's 1-0 win over Springfield, Friday night. Undefeated in their previous six games, the booters raised their record to 6-2-1.

Playing on unfamiliar turf and under the lights, the Ephs had trouble getting started. Springfield controlled the ball in the early going, but the Purple began to apply offensive pressure as the first half progressed. With goalie Skip Grossmann holding the defensive fort, the Ephs set the pace for much of the rest of the period. Near misses by John Friborg and Chick Johnson deprived Williams of a halftime lead.

A small, but vocal contingent of Williams fans cheered as the Eph's took the field for the second half of action. However, superb defensive efforts by both squads kept shots to a minimum, and play was mostly confined to the middle of the field. Purple offensive thrusts were continually thwarted until Friborg knocked a chipped ball loose from the Springfield goalie's grasp. Seizing the opportunity, Jim Hield placed a perfect volley-kick into the net for the lone goal.

But, the game was long from over, as the Maroon forwards attacked the Williams net with increased vigor. Deep-back Bruce Camilleri rose to the occasion, driving the ball away from the Williams net if it came near. As the final seconds ticked away, a jubilant Vennell threw his hands up in victory, and joyous fans and players swarmed onto the field.

The win was enhanced by the fact that Williams overcame the handicap of the Springfield field. The Polyturf carpet, over six years old, showed its age. The surface was more akin to playing on asphalt, than any sort of grass field. In addition, due to its dampness, the ball actually picked up speed after bouncing, which highlights Grossman's performance in picking up his second shutout of the year. "This is the first time I've ever seen nobody get hurt on the stuff, and considering its condition, that's amazing," commented Vennell.

Wednesday, the University of Connecticut, ranked fourth nationally, visits Cole Field. Featuring an explosive offense and a solid defense, they should prove a formidable foe for the Ephs. The possibility of an upset does exist. "If we can come out strong, with a little luck I think we could beat them," says Vennell. A strong turnout could help provide the spark needed.

Pratt runners win intramural cross country

Last Friday, Pratt House won the second annual Intramural Cross Country Championships by squeaking past last year's winner Gar-Wood by a mere two points. Pratt House runners Brian Harrison, Tim Layden and Prentice Weathers finished 4th, 8th and 10th for an adjusted team score of 21 points. Gar-Wood was right behind with 23 points followed by Williams (3rd), Perry (4th), Tyler (5th), Gladden (6th), Spencer (7th), Armstrong (8th), and Dodd (9th).

Doug Greeff of Tyler was the individual winner with a fine time of 16:38 for the 3.0 mile course. Defending champ Tim Pritchard of Gar-Wood was second in 16:50 and Perry House representative Dave Carroll finished in the number 3 spot. Rounding out the top 15 in the men's race were: 4) Brian Harrison, Pratt; 5) Bob Ericson, Williams; 6) Mark Chaffee, Gladden; 7) Reed Zars, Gar-Wood; 8) Tim Layden, Pratt; 9) Geoff Kiralis; 10) Prentice Weathers, Pratt; 11) Rob Craig, Hopkins; 12) Rob Roundtree, Carter; 13) Evan Bash, Dodd; 14) Ray Porfilio, Spencer; and 15) C. Tennis, Williams.

Harriers finish fourth in Eastern Championships

by Frank Carr

Coach Tony Plansky's varsity cross country team travelled to Boston last Saturday and posted an impressive fourth place finish in the Eastern Cross Country Championships. Brandeis won the 18-team contest, followed by Bates and Springfield.

Joe Kolb and Ken Leinbach both had superb performances and received medals for their efforts. Leinbach broke out with the leaders in the first half mile, while Kolb went out easy and gradually worked his way toward the front of the 130-man pack. The two Ephmen stayed with the top dozen runners throughout the race and then in the final 500 yards, Kolb let loose with a powerful kick which propelled him into fifth place. Leinbach cruised down the final hill and crossed the finish line in eleventh place. Kolb's time of 24:45, for the 5.0 mile Franklin Park course is a personal record, as is Leinbach's 25:01 clocking.

Junior Dan Sullivan sliced 51 seconds off his Franklin Park time against M.I.T.-Tufts, which earned him 26th place and a personal best of 25:23. Steve Polasky and Mike Behrman worked together for the entire distance and both dipped under 26 minutes, finishing 50th and 51st respectively. Behrman, a freshman has done an excellent job in his three varsity races and will definitely make his presence known in the coming years. Rounding out the Eph contingent were Chris Flavin in 71st at 26:20 and Frank Carr who struggled home in 75th.

The Williams junior varsity squad were led by Steve St. Clair who finished 31st, but were well back in the team standings. Tomorrow, the Ephmen travel to Amherst, Massachusetts for the Little Three cross country championships. The purple harriers have had a stranglehold on the title for the past six seasons, and Coach Tony Plansky is "confident" about making it seven straight.

Ephwomen swim past Middlebury, 72-46

A short-handed women's swim team beat Middlebury last Thursday, 72-46, in a meet which was tight until the last three events. Carol Anne Smalley and Chantel Cleland swept the 500 freestyle to give Williams a commanding lead going into the final relay.

Keron Walker won three individual events and tied a Williams record in the 100 individual medley with a 1:07.2 swim. Her other victories came in the 50 and 100 freestyle. Smalley also won the 200, completing a Williams sweep of the freestyle events.

Joanna Monroe took the 100 fly while last minute recruit Sue Tuttle tied for first in the 50 breaststroke with a 36.0. Monroe also placed second in the 50 fly and Tuttle managed a close second in the 100 breast. The diving duet of Mary Southworth and Laurie Norton swept their event.

Veterans Marilla Pearsall and Barb Bonner could not make the trip with the team, but Williams' depth in the distance events and relays threw the Middlebury squad off. Nina Murphy, Tuttle, Monroe and Anne Youngling won the 200 medley relay easily and the team of Murphy, Monroe, Youngling and Walker won the 400 free relay.

Captain Randall Morrow, after a brief appearance in the Ephs' meet against Vassar, will continue on the injured list for some time. Pearsall and Benner, however, will be back in action against Smith Monday.

Coach Samuelson seems pleased with the progress of the team at this point in the season. "It's a strong team this year; one that's worked harder than in past years," he commented. "Practices have increased to almost double what they were last year and better conditioning is evident in the early season results."

Dance Society allocation pends

CC votes on activity funds

The College Council allocated $32,108 of the Student Activities Tax by seven organizations Monday night. The council accepted Finance Committee recommendations for Pique, the Coffeehouse, the All-College Entertainment Committee, the Lehman Service Council and Purple Key. Council members added to the Cap and Bells allotment, while postponing action on the Dance Society.

The Dance Society caused the most debate. The Committee agreed that the society's presentations were first-rate, but argued that student attendance did not warrant three dance company residencies. Dance Society president Simon Watson '77 and faculty sponsor Joy Anne Dewey pointed out that contracts with the performers had to have been signed last spring so that this allocation necessarily required either the elimination of their film festival and student performances or reneging on the existing contracts. The council did not want to allocate more money, but could not resolve the conflict. They finally sent the proposal back to the Finance Committee for a decision next week.

The recommendation of $4500 for Cap and Bells eliminated plans for a professional touring company ($1000) extra Winter Study shows ($1500) and master dance classes ($350). Cap & Bells president Jamie Spragins '77 argued that contracts had already been signed for the "Stage Movement Workshop", his term for the dance classes. The CC voted to give Cap & Bells the $350 for a total allocation of $4850.

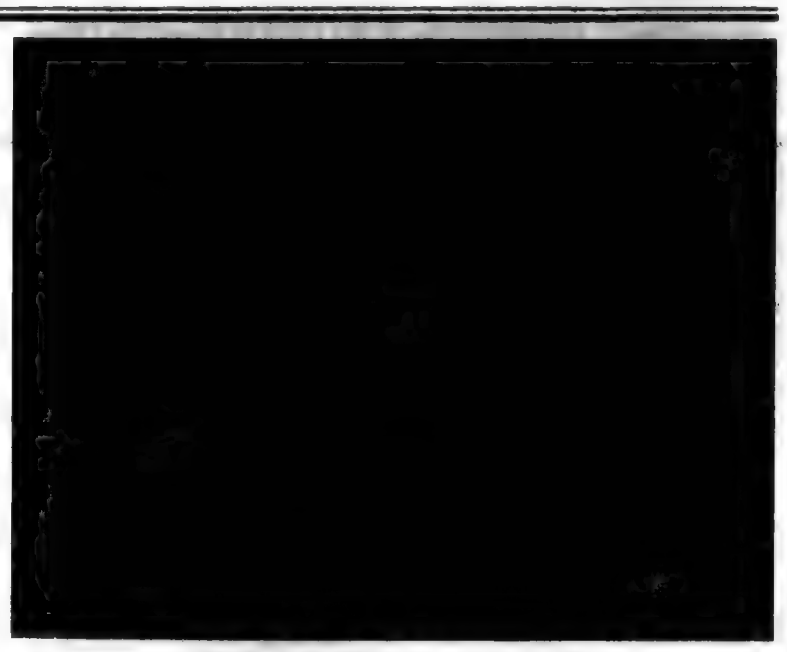
The council completed what one CC member called "the shortest discussion of the ACEC in College history," approving a proposal for a $15,000 limit for the year. After each concert, the ACEC must consult with the Finance Committee. If the Committee decides there is a reasonable chance that another concert would not push the deficit over the limit, then the ACEC may proceed. CC members hope that this procedure will protect them against any unexpectedly large deficits.

Proposals for the Coffeehouse and WHEW passed quickly with little discussion. The Coffeehouse asked and received $4100, including $225 to pay student warm-up bands. The recently disbanded WHEW received no SAT funds.

The Lehman Service Council discussion lasted less than one minute. The CC unanimously approved the Committee report which gave the service organization $4728. The $1628 increase over last year will go to "Children's Day", an all day picnic-field day for area children. This was funded last year by the Freshman Council.

The Committee recommended that the Purple Key not fund the athletic banquet and trimmed their budget from $725 to $625. Representatives conceded that $100 could be cut from their budget, but asked to sponsor the athletic banquet, anyway. The council approved this suggestion.

The council considered Pique's new, increased budget. Editors claimed costs rose, and readjusted their request. The Finance Committee reduced the number of copies the SAT would finance, but allowed for the cost increase. As a result Pique requested $2896 for 3 issues at 1800 copies but will receive $2806 for 1600 copy issues.



CC President Steve Piltch '77 pointed to two major problems with council funding. First that outside groups were unsure of the budgeting procedure, and secondly, that "we're in a bind, so you're in a bind" attitude of many groups put too much pressure on the decisions. No one proposed any solutions, but the issue will come up at the end of the finance hearings.

Stokely Carmichael addressed an audience of several hundred in Chapin Hall Wednesday night, haranguing capitalist exploitation which he wishes to destroy and replace with socialism. (photo by Kahane)

Carmichael assails capitalist exploitation

"The system I seek to destroy is capitalism, headed by American capitalism. The system I seek to replace it with is socialism," said African revolutionary Stokely Carmichael as he addressed the Williams community Wednesday night on socialism and the African struggle.

Carmichael combined his advocacy of violence as a means for relieving oppression with a belief in humanity's potential. "There is nothing that man and woman cannot do, absolutely nothing," he affirmed.

Speaking to a predominantly white audience of several hundred, the black leader at first concentrated on the conflict between socialism and capitalism and the working class revolution he said would arise from it.

"I do not enjoy anything in America," Carmichael said, as he moved to describe how the American capitalist system "exploits without mercy" blacks and laborers. A black leader since the sixties, he drew from his past to illustrate his point.

"The role of students in any given society is to perpetuate and reaffirm the values of the given society, Carmichael said, pointing his lecture at Williams students. He claimed that 95 per cent of Williams students come here only to make money and 50 per cent cheat. This results, he said, from a system which permits any means to produce profit.

Pointing to black students in the audience, Carmichael called them a "concession" forced from American universities by the black movements of the past decade. Blacks are now admitted, he claimed, not from altruism, but because universities seek federal funds and so meet quotas.

The former Black Panther leader turned again to focus on the African revolution. Ho concentrated on the relation between blacks and Africa, their "only true national homeland." He also tried to combat the confusion which blacks in America feel about this relation, which he said American capitalism fosters to hinder black unity.

Carmichael concluded his speech with a challenge to black students. "You have only one choice," he said, "to come to Williams, acquire the collected knowledge of the people, tests its validity, and deliver it back to the people. If you do not do this, then you betray the blood of your people."

A series of questions followed which concentrated on methods of indoctrination, possible entanglement of the African revolution with the Soviet Union, and the conflict inherent in building a peaceful socialist society from a violent revolution.

J. Geils kicks off homecoming days

Wesleyan is not Amherst, to be sure and Wesleyan Homecomings lack the aphrodisiac of the blood feud with Zephiniah Swift Moore's bastard son. (In 1821, Moore, Williams' second President, led a group of Williams students across the Berkshires into the Connecticut Valley to found Amherst.) Yet Homecoming is Homecoming and town and College alike are set for a touch of Little Three Nirvana, incarnated as best as it can be in the "Weekend."

The Weekend officially gets underway tonight with a J. Geils concert in Chapin Hall. As of Wednesday afternoon, the ACEC was within 120 tickets of selling out Chapin's 993 reserved seats. ACEC member Jeff Verney indicated that there was a possibility that some tickets might be held in reserve for sale on the day of the concert at $8.00 each. Verney added that off-campus sales would total no more than 100.

Tomorrow, the campus will evacuate to Weston Field for what is expected to be a hard-fought football game against Wesleyan. Kickoff is at 1:30 p.m.

Tickets are moving quickly, according to Assistant Professor of physical education William McCormick. He estimated that, as of Wednesday, about 1400 tickets had been distributed to residential housing units. Wesleyan students, however, are showing much less interest in the game, so Saturday's crowd will likely be a highly partisan Williams one.

Several hundred alumni are also expected, although far fewer than came last year to see Williams cap an undefeated season against traditional rival Amherst. Alumni are expected to fill about three-quarters of the Williams side of the field, relegating most students to endzone and goal line seats.

Security will be beefed up around campus during tomorrow's Homecoming contest, according to Director of Security Walter O'Brien. While most of the security force will be at the game, student monitors will be patrolling the campus to control thefts from the vulnerable empty dorms. "We've had some problems in past years with outsiders coming in and ripping off dorms," O'Brien explained. He said that the student monitor system was instituted a couple of years ago and has successfully curbed thefts.

Security nonetheless strongly recommends that students lock their doors for the game.

Alcohol is, as usual, banned from Weston Field, although enforcing this rule has proved more than a match for the college in the past. According to O'Brien, Security will attempt to

Williamstown voters support county trends

Williamstown followed most state and county voting trends at the polls Tuesday. Out of 3800 total votes cast, Carter received 1993 to Ford's 1667. The county supported Carter 39,337 to 27,962.

Senator Edward Kennedy was re-elected over Michael Robertson (R); Kennedy took Williamstown 2613 to 1062. The town went along with the rest of western Massachusetts by electing Silvio O. Conte (R) over Edward A. McColgan (D) for the U.S. House of Representatives and John Fitzpatrick (R) over Robert F. Jakubowicz (D) for State Senator. Incumbent State Representative Anthony McBride (D) defeated Vincent Zajac (R), Ralph Lambert, and Dagmar Bubriski (D write-in) in his bid for re-election. Williamstown's William Lepage (R) came out on top of three others for Berkshire County Commissioner.

Berkshire County resoundingly supported the bottle bill 42,588 to 27,282, which was defeated. Williamstown supported the bill by a two to one margin.

Open Meetings

When the debate over open meetings for student-faculty committees resumes at next week's faculty meeting, the Steering Committee will play a major role. A motion submitted by the six-member board last month closed committee doors and paid lip service to the open meeting concept by encouraging committees to open at least one session a semester and file "a concise report" available through the Dean of Faculty's Office. The brief motion lacked key clarifications and was tabled and returned to the committee.

Indications are that the panel will submit a detailed policy to the faculty Wednesday. Although individual clauses will be debated and changed, the underlying assumptions will probably survive.

Thus, the answer to the fundamental question—are meetings open?—is in the hands of the Steering Committee.

The committee should recommend, and the faculty adopt, a comprehensive policy expressing support for the idea of open meetings. An "out" should be available to all committees, but the presumption should be open until compelling rationale for closing is presented.

The Record proposes the following scheme, which embodies the principles outlined above.

1. Students and faculty members can attend all meetings of all committees containing students, with the exception of the Discipline Committee.

2. Any student-faculty committee may invoke executive session at any time and expel observers. Executive session can be declared only upon the majority vote of all committee members present. The motion, discussion and vote on executive session will be conducted in the presence of all observers.

3. The committee chairman may invoke executive session if unsolicited remarks from observers impair the functioning of a committee.

4. The minutes of all meetings, except for the Discipline Committee meetings and executive sessions, will be available in the Dean of Students' Office.

These guidelines embrace the open meeting principle, but allow committees to deal with issues of personality in private. To protect an accused student's legal rights to privacy and to a fair judgment, Discipline Committee meetings should remain closed.

A simple application of Roberts Rules of Order can gain privacy, but the committee must be willing to justify closing its doors.

This proposal emphasizes the belief that observers are to behave as witnesses of, not participants in, the proceedings of a committee.

Overall, this plan does not sacrifice the integrity of a decision-making body; it satisfies the demands of the campus media and the wishes of the College Council.

The Steering Committee should weigh this or a similar proposal carefully. Although the committee deals only with faculty issues, this time their decision has massive impact on the student body.

NEWS BRIEFS

Security seeks student leads

Police investigators now believe that a pickup truck or a green Mercedez-Benz may figure in the murder of Cynthia Krizack, according to an article printed in the Transcript earlier this week. The vehicles were each seen on the road near the 30-foot embankment where a trapper discovered the girl's body Sunday.

The Dean's office confirmed that the suspicious vehicle reported near Mission Park by an as yet unidentified student was also a pickup truck. The two trucks may be totally unrelated, Dean Peter Berek stressed.

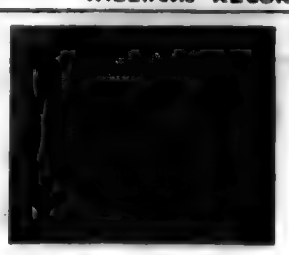
Security Director Walter C. O'Brien said he is still looking for the student who reported this vehicle near Mission Park on October 9. O'Brien refused to comment on the significance of this lead saying, "We're just helping out the district attorney and he asked us to follow this thing up."

According to trooper Jack Flaherty of the district attorney's office, a few students have responded to the call but authorities are not satisfied with the information they have received thus far.

Lighting improvements recommended

Speaking before the Housing Committee Monday night, Peter Welanetz, Director of the Physical Plant, enumerated recent lighting improvements and sought recommendations from the committee for further changes.

The program calls for relighting the entire stretch of Main Street from Cole Avenue to Field Park implementing high pressure sodium vapor fixtures. The new type of fixture sheds an orange glow which provides twice the amount of illumins as the older mercury vapor lamps, Welanetz explained.



Each of these fixtures costs about $800, Welanetz said. Wiring costs add another $200 per lamp because all wiring on campus must be underground, as stipulated by the trustees.

Watson nominees picked

The Williams Selection Committee for the Watson Fellowship nominated four seniors for this program of independent study and travel abroad. The four nominees, selected from a group of 44 applicants, are Michael Knight, Karen Leaf, Mary Mietzelfeld and Michael Rosenblum.

These four join a pool of 126 students from 50 colleges competing for 70 fellowships. Any or all of the Williams nominees could win grants of $7000 for single students or $9500 for married students. The awards, to be announced late in March, provide an opportunity for foreign independent study outside the normal academic experience.

Michael Knight's project will be theater and the oral tradition in Nigeria and Ghana; Karen Leaf will be studying family planning programs in India, Colombia and Hong Kong; Mary Mietzelfeld's project will involve translation of English and French literature into illustration; Michael Rosenblum will photograph and document the lives of European Jewish emigres in Israel and Europe.

NO. 32

Out in Cincinnati there's an alum who can't make it to the game tomorrow. It's not that he wouldn't love to come, mind you, but he's got to work. ABC has scheduled a date with him and a gang of his friends Monday night at 9:00. They've also invited the LA Rams.

Since graduating last June, Scott Perry has been learning the trade of professional football as practiced by the Cincinnati Bengals. And with eight regular season games under his belt things are beginning to fall into place quite nicely.

"I'm a bit surprised that I've done so well," he said while watching the election returns Tuesday night. "But when I look at it there's really nothing here that's overpowering me. All the players are good but I can hold my own. I know I'm not outstanding but I also know that I can fit in. It's a question of being able to stay in shape over the next three years or so and proving to the organization that I fit into their plans."

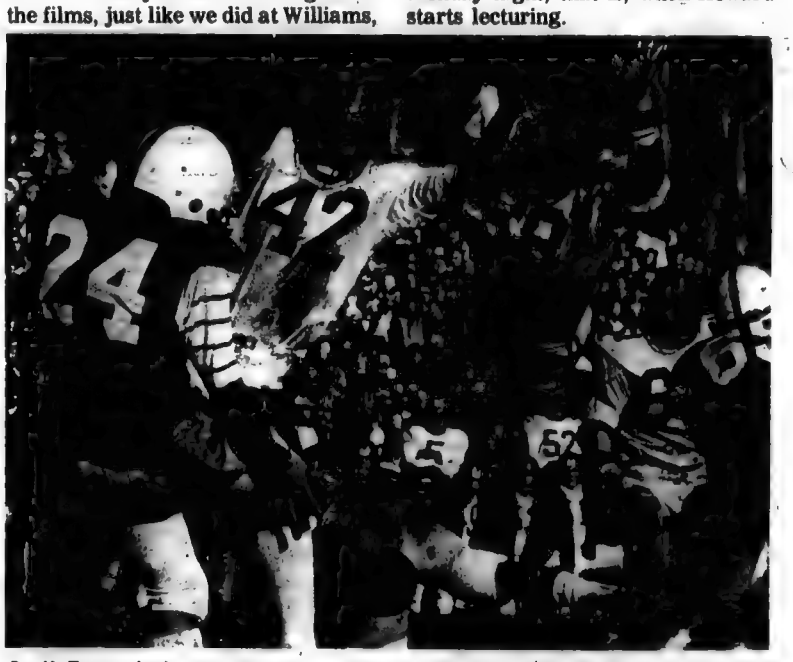
Fitting in is an important consideration of the Cincinnati management. "It's a fairly conservative organization," Scott said, "just like the city itself. The coaches like you to keep a low, non-public profile. Bob Johnson, our head coach, wants us to be a happy, healthy family and I think we are. There was no rookie stigma and the vets have been really helpful."

The problem of fitting in almost cost Perry a chance at making the team, however. "Training camp was the biggest hassle I've ever been through," he said. "You never knew what was going on. You never were told anything about your play and you had to judge your performance yourself. Besides that, we never knew the player limit."

"The grapevine also had it that I wasn't going to make the team because I didn't seem into it enough. They thought I was too nonchalant and really couldn't figure me out. I'm not so sure that they can now either but what I do now is get really fired up on Sundays and go crazy and they love it. It kind of makes up for being laid back during the rest of the week."

Currently the sixth of seven defensive backs on the Bengal squad, Perry has been splitting his playing time between subbing for the injured Tommy Casanova at cornerback and playing on the specialty teams. "You'd be surprised how important the special teams are to the coaches. We spend an entire day's practice just working on special team strategy."

As for the practices themselves, "they're ridiculously easy," Perry said. "Tuesday afternoons we go over the films, just like we did at Williams, and Wednesday through Friday we practice from 9:30-3:30, with films in the morning, practice for an hour and a half in the afternoon, and then a little weight work on the Nautilus."



"The only difficulty I've had is learning to arrive on time for everything. They've got a very heavy fine structure here, including a $50 one for arriving even ten seconds late for a team meeting. Luckily rookies can't get fined, though."

Two adjustments which Perry has been forced to make involve quickness and contact. "I've been figuring out the defenses well," he said, "and speed has been no problem, but quickness is different. I can run with anyone on the team but I've got to work on matching a receiver's position as well as keeping up with him. Covering Isaac Curtis when he's fired up for practice can be a chore in that respect but it's also really helpful."

The suicide squads are another story. "They're a trip," Perry laughed. "They're pretty intense, especially when you're playing a big game. There's a lot of heavy duty hitting that's kind of freakish. It's the kind of contact where you really don't know what's going on so you have to just start leveling people."

"It's been a lot of fun so far, though. It really hasn't been that difficult. I've been putting in a lot more football time—you have to—but I haven't really been an intense football fanatic. You have to keep your perspective."

As for Williams, well, "no one knows the school. There's no reaction when you tell people you went there. Consequently I'm not categorized. The conversation ends there." Until Monday night, that is, when Howard starts lecturing.

Scott Perry (42) attempts to block punt with help from teammate Emmett Creahan in 1974 Eph victory over Amherst. Perry will be a missing spectator at this year's homecoming game. Instead of playing for Williams on Saturday he'll be playing for the Cincinnati Bengals on ABC Monday night football.

Redbook Magazine Competition Judging

OCC has just been notified that Redbook Magazine is looking for a student interested in judging its Young Writers' Short Story Contest over 3 weeks in January. Any Williams students who might be able to work it into their January schedules are to get in touch with Peggy Sloane at OCC as soon as possible.

Enter Redbooks Short Story Contest

Open to men and women ages 18-28 who have not previously published in a magazine before with circulations above 25,000. Stories must be fiction. Entries must be postmarked no later than Dec. 31, 1976. For more information see Peggy Sloane at OCC.

Correction

In last week's editorial comment favoring the banning of private ownership of handguns in Massachusetts, we claimed a student on campus had a handgun. We have since learned the gun to which we were referring shoots BBs rather than bullets.

College concern grows over Federal involvement

In the wake of the Presidential election, the government is a subject on many people's minds. In the following two part article, the RECORD will examine the effect the Federal government is having on Williams. Part I will consider the nature of the Federal presence here, what would happen if Williams attempted to act independent of it, and what the positive aspects of the Federal presence are. Part II will look at the negative aspects of the Federal impact and assess the future role of government at Williams.

by Peter Rintels

During the spring presidential primary campaign, one of Ronald Reagan's favorite slogans was "Let's get government out of the classroom." Reagan was mainly referring to public schools, but his words could hold equal meaning for a private institution such as Williams.

Federal presence on campus has grown tremendously in recent years, both in terms of more Federal grant money and also more regulation of college affairs. As a result, college administrators show an ambivalent attitude of gratitude and wariness toward the government, with a growing shift toward the latter in recent years.

"The effects of Federal money have been very largely salutary," said Associate Provost David Booth. But, he conceded later, "concern toward the orientation of government activity at Williams has risen dramatically in the last five years. There is a radical difference."

Rejecting Federal Money

The threat to Williams' autonomy implied by increasing Federal regulation is largely, although not exclusively, a result of our receiving Federal money. For example, recent regulation requiring equal access to college buildings for the handicapped—which were estimated to cost the college $2 million in renovation costs if implemented as originally written—was directed towards "any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance." The controversial Title IX regulations, requiring equal athletic facilities for men and women are likewise tied to Federal money.

What would happen if Williams, in order to stay free of Federal regulations, were to reject all Federal money? "Williams would survive," said Booth, "but we would be very substantially affected."

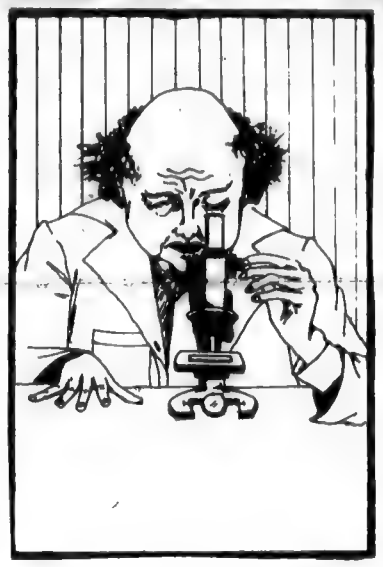
According to figures supplied by Booth, Williams is now receiving $432,000 in direct federal money. Of this, $238,000 is in the form of research grants which go mainly to lab sciences. The remaining $194,000 goes to financial aid programs. This money makes up roughly three per cent of Williams' total budget of $17 million.

If this money were withdrawn due to the College's failure to comply with a Federal regulation, it could compensate by:

a). raising $9 million in additional endowment, which would increase our present $60 million endowment by 15 per cent.

b). raising tuition by $235 per student.

c). cutting expenses, most likely in those lab or financial aid programs which are now getting government money.



The last alternative would be most likely, and its effects would not only be felt among the students. It would include barring science faculty from obtaining federal research money, which would be a serious threat to their professional viability. According to Business Manager Shane Riorden, the faculty has come to expect the availability of Federal money as a way to stay active in their field. "If we told the faculty there would be no more National Science Foundation grants, we'd have a revolution on our hands," he claims.

Tax Exempt Status

In addition, to direct Federal aid, Williams benefits from a Federal tax exempt status. This means that contributions to the college are tax deductible for the contributor. Asked what the effect of giving up the tax exempt status in addition to all Federal funds would be, President Chandler replied, "It would be suicide."

If Williams were to reject regulations tied to Federal dollars, it would not be the first college to do so. Brigham Young University in Utah and Hillsdale College in Michigan took this step in response to Title IX. While neither is the beneficiary of a direct Federal program, they stand to lose $6 to $7 million and $200,000 respectively in financial aid to their students.

According to Mr. Booth, Williams is of "about average" dependence on direct Federal aid among highly selective liberal arts colleges. "All of the great universities are totally dependent on federal funds," he said.

Merely giving up Federal funds, if viable, would still not free Williams from the impact of the Federal government. More and more, the government is imposing regulations which require compliance regardless of whether or not one is the recipient of Federal funds. For example, the Department of Health, Education and Welfare now requires the college to report the sex and racial make-up of the faculty. The administration is opposed to this measure . . . since it means "categorizing" faculty members which might be offensive to the people being categorized. If the College refused to supply this information, however, it would not only risk loss of federal funds, but Federal court action.

According to Booth, "the biggest threat is not the threat to withdraw funds, but regulation in new areas that have nothing to do with what we are receiving money for." So while rejecting Federal money would curb government regulation in some areas, it would not go far toward removing the government completely from campus. President Chandler, in fact, believes it would "have no effect."

How Federal Funds Have Helped

The federal government on Williams has a profound impact which is clearly going to remain well into the future. The issue of this impact is a two-sided coin, one side of which is a substantial positive contribution to the college, mostly from the availability of Federal money.

Federal assistance now amounts to approximately 7 to 10 per cent of Williams' financial aid money, channeled through four government programs. The most important of these is the Basic Educational Opportunity Grant program (BEOG), which accounts for about half of the Federal financial aid money. BEOG money is applied for directly by low and middle income students. Three other programs, providing additional grant money, loan funds, and support for student jobs are applied for directly by the College on the basis of the percentage of enrolled students in lower income brackets.

The College has thus been able to accept more lower income students, but it is not fair to give the government full credit for this. According to Provost Stephen R. Lewis, the college committed itself to this goal in 1969 before it knew that Federal money would become available. Williams now targets thirty per cent of tuition to go to financial aid. The effect of the government has been to "make it easier for us to accept lower income students," said Lewis.

Federal research grant money has gone a long way toward enriching sciences at Williams. "Without Federal support," maintains biology department chairman William Grant, "it would have been impossible to offer opportunities at the level of sophistication we've enjoyed." Most of the sophisticated equipment in the biology department was paid for at least in part by Federal funds, he said. Grant also stressed the need for research activity as "essential to the learning process."

Other Division III areas have also received Federal support in research and equipment purchases, although funding also comes from industry and institution sources.

Catalytic Effect

The government has produced other salutary effects aside from those possible by money. There has been what Dean of the Faculty, Neil Grabois termed the "catalytic effect" of certain regulations in making the college adopt policies which it holds to in principle, but would otherwise have moved more slowly on. Affirmative Action in faculty hiring is the best example of this.

Federal regulations in affirmative action require the hiring of faculty by an institution to reflect the relative Ph.D. production of women and minorities in the fields in which openings occur. For example, if 50 per cent of the Ph.D.'s in history were being given to women and 10 per cent to minorities, the History department would be expected to hire 50 per cent women and 10 per cent minorities as positions became available.

The Williams Affirmative Action Statement of 1975, recognizing that the isolated nature and small minority population of Williamstown make women and minority faculty difficult to retain, has set even higher goals than the government requires.

The administration stresses that Williams maintains hiring goals and not quotas. "Goals," stated President Chandler, "are targets within limits of standards". If the College does not meet a goal, it will not hire people in defiance of accepted standards to see that it is met. The imposition of hiring quotas by HEW would be vigorously opposed, he said.

As a result of affirmative action, the proportion of women at the Assistant Professor rank, where the large majority of the "tenure ladder" appointments are made, rose from 5.7 per cent in 1971-2 to 23.6 per cent in 1974-75, according to the Affirmative Action Statement. Progress with minority faculty has been "less encouraging," amounting to an increase of 5 to 7 per cent in the same period.

Affirmative Action in faculty hiring is mandated by the government, but the program has, in principle, full support of the administration.

"Affirmative action is our moral and our legal obligation," said Grabois. But while asserting the College's fundamental support of the program, Grabois acknowledged that government prodding helped motivate its implementation. Said Riorden in this regard "We would not have moved as quickly or as consciously without any government program at all."

This "catalytic" effect of government regulation has been active in other areas of College policy as well. According to Riorden, new government pension reform regulations made Williams give its pension plan what he considered to be a much-needed overhaul.

Letters: library noise, CC efficiency

Insoluble irritation

To the editor:

As a nightly frequenter of Sawyer Library I would like to call attention to a somewhat irritating problem in the form of high noise levels during prime study time. In effect a 'social center' atmosphere is pervading the library on weekday nights. Much of the problem can be attributed to the Library's interior design: the high visibility layout of the floors allows sightings of innumerable friends and acquaintances. Unfortunately the temptation to share a few words with them often results in protracted conversation, conversation that to others trying to study is very distracting. I freely confess I too have been guilty.

The problem of noise in the library is insoluble unless all concerned make a conscious effort to take extended conversation down to the lounge or back to the House. Learn the manual alphabet. Take up mime. Practice winking. But try to keep in mind where you are.

Sincerely,
Douglas Frazer '79

Amusing break...

To the editor:

Studying hard? Want a short relaxing break, something that is both educational and enjoyable? Then I suggest you stop in at one of the weekly college council meetings. With a little bit of imagination you can delude yourself into thinking that you are actually attending the meeting of an important legislative body. Parliamentary procedure, with its motions and counter-motions, is the rule for the evening. Spirited debate rages back and forth. Then, finally, the all important vote! The room becomes quiet as the voting takes place. After a few moments of tense silence, the official tally is announced: a unanimous decision not to fund WHEW, an organization that has disbanded and no longer exists. The college council, with its remarkable efficiency, makes another landmark decision.

Overexposure

To the editor:

Dear Boys,

Concerning our last issue:

I have long maintained, somewhat facetiously, that the Record would be much improved if I was allowed to write most of it. Nonetheless, I was quite surprised to find that statement tested in the last issue.

THEY WRITE BY NIGHT, like skin flics, Slim Jims, and Social Psychology, is best appreciated in small doses. Therefore, let me request a short vacation to recover from this severe case of over-exposure.

Your columnist,
Tony Spaeth

The Rathskellar comes alive

by Andy Clark and Paul Goren

It's 8:30 p.m. The smell of air freshener cancelling out the Halloween party from the night before slowly begins to clear away. The chairs have been set up awaiting an audience. The equipment is all set—a powerful sound board, a full set of drums, piano, guitars and amps all await the band. The only sounds are those of pool balls and a television from the adjacent game room.

We are sitting in the Rathskellar of Baxter Hall, waiting for the next production of the Williams College Coffee House. Co-managers Russ Hardy and Eric Pyenson are busily at work preparing the set in anticipation of a larger than average crowd. This night the Coffee House is featuring the Tom Willits Band, a four-man folk-rock group which has played with Tom Rush, Leo Kottke, and Jesse Colin Young among others.

The use of electric guitars and drums is somewhat novel for the Coffee House. On any other Saturday night one might find a folk singer or a blues guitarist. Pyenson explains that night's act is as an example of the diversity of the Coffee House which was set up as an alternative to the normal weekend party circuit. "It's a different kind of place, where people can relax in a mellow atmosphere with live, free entertainment," explained Pyenson. With a budget of around $4100, Pyenson and Hardy are able to spend between $250 and $350 per act—attracting able, professional performers. Among these in the near future will be Michael Cooney, a favorite at Williams last year, on Nov. 10, blues guitarist Roy Bookbinder on Nov. 14, and Artie Traum, Nov. 19.

It's now 8:55. Conversations have been started. The light system has been turned on. Sitting on two foam pads, boosting him in his chair, freshman Scott Lankford begins the opening act. His set consists of original compositions, interspersed with a few tunes by Simon and Garfunkel, Bob Dylan, and even Loudon Wainwright. Turning around, one finds the booths slowly filling with people. Bottles of wine and beer are opened as Lankford continues his set. Occasionally a dog or two wanders through the room, oblivious to the show, inspecting the feet of various members of the audience. By 9:45 the back part of the Rathskellar is filling up. More wine has arrived and the closing numbers of the opening set are spiced with a little heckling.

At 10:00 the Tom Willits Band takes the stage to begin the first of their sets. By 10:15 the pool room is uncharacteristically empty. Only one loyal viewer remains in the TV room. Curious observers, attracted by the sound of electronic equipment, gaze puzzledly at the group on stage. "What is this? Electric music at the Coffee House?" As they listen, however, it becomes evident that it is not the J. Geils Band. The style of the Willits Band is similar to Michael Murphy or the Eagles. Their tight harmonies and near-flawless instrumentation produces a crisp, enjoyable sound.

It's 10:45. People are relaxing on the soft, floor-level chairs which have been appropriated from the TV room. On stage a guitar string breaks. Quickly, a new guitar is found and a new song is sung. By 11:00, Tom Willits has moved from guitar to piano. The crowd, intoxicated with music and wine, responds enthusiastically.

It's 12:15 and the wine bottles are empty. The evening has come to a close. The chairs are empty once again and the band packs their equipment. It's the Williams Coffee House—a night of nodding heads, tapping feet, a little wine, good music, and nice people. For a few hours life has come to the Rathskellar. Now, it is just an empty room—until next time, anyway.

Williams Octet enthralls all ages

by Gail Hupper

Young and old attended and enjoyed a Second Reunion Concert by thirteen members of the old Williams Octet last Saturday night. Before the group started to sing, leader Warren Hunke '42 explained that the group had been together for only thirty-six hours and asked that the audience excuse any musical shortcomings; however, whatever minor mishaps occurred hardly detracted from a pleasurable evening of medleys, selections from Songs of Williams and other oldies, rounds, and specialty numbers.

Ensemble highlights were many. A medley from the musical "Brigadoon" featured Ted Safford '43 on bagpipes, and a solo by Jack Hornor '51 in "Almost Like Being in Love." Hornor's rich, powerful baritone voice easily filled the Jesup Hall Auditorium, even over the rest of the group. "I Love the Ladies" met with such enthusiastic applause that the group repeated the last verse, which told of coming to a coed school and exploring the wonders there to be found. Hornor again soloed in "Did You Ever Cross Over to Sneden's". Selections from Guys and Dolls was a highlight.

Specialty numbers featured an impromptu two-piano duet by Hunke and Lou Safford '41, Doug Buck '45's cockney rendition of "The Baby Went Down the Drain," and the ensemble's "The Adams Memorial Theater." Hunke wrote that piece for the Octet's part in the official opening of the theater in 1941: the song referred humorously to college events, trends, and staff, some of whom are still with the College.

Perhaps best illustrating the spirit of the group and the College during the '40's were the stories Hunke told about the group's experiences. He prefaced Cole Porter's "Me and Marie" by saying that Porter himself had chosen the song as part of an all-Porter concert. Apparently Porter was dissatisfied with the program that the Octet had submitted to him for approval—Hunke reported that the group had "left out some of Porter's best songs" and that the composer had suggested some of his new songs.

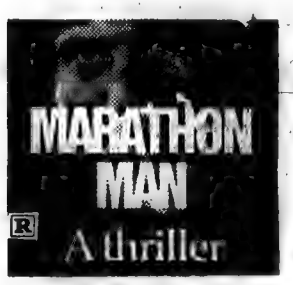
Hunke talked before Saturday's concert about the history of the Octet. The group developed in 1940 from a quartet that was an off-shoot of the Choral Society. Hunke remembers that the quartet became an octet because of the greater harmonic flexibility possible in an octet and also because "eight bad voices sound less bad together than four bad ones." In the years between its inception and its demise in 1955 the Octet's schedule included many concerts along the Eastern Seaboard, to raise funds for the college as well as periodic performances at Williams. The Reunion Concerts now are not fund-raisers, Hunke says, except in their capacity in revivifying school spirit among the alumni. Presumably revivified spirit provokes cash contributions when the time comes. Whether or not the concerts help raise funds for Williams, Saturday's concert was at least an indication that graduates are still enthusiastic about the school: the alumni turnout among singers and audience was high, members of the Octet coming from as far as San Francisco to sing.

Marching Band claims merit

by John Libertine

The Williams Band last Saturday, after a grueling contest, won a key game in their bid for the All-college Bandionship against Union College. One shudders to think of the carnage that could have resulted if Union had had a band at the game. If all goes well in the weeks ahead, however, the band, under the able direction of Mr. Francis Cardillo, could win its thirteenth straight title, an honor of dubious merit.

Despite its great success and fame, however, the Williams College Walking, Stalking, Ambling, Scrambling, Gambling (etc. ad nauseum) Moo Cow Marine Marching Band remains an enigma. Just what is this bunch of Monty Python rejects trying to prove? Answer: nothing. "The purpose of the band is to allow a motley group of musicians to express themselves and to have fun along with the spectators," says Fred Lawrence, one of the two student conductors.



One of the required methods of self-expression for all members is in their choice of headgear. It is a stipulation of membership that each member choose his own unique hat. Bizarre is the only word to describe the array of feathered hats, popcorn poppers, pith helmets, and pumpkin heads on hand.

The band's major function is to provide a half time show. During their program, the individuals march in formation (more or less), forming such objects as peanuts, cigarettes, walls, and of course, mountains, C.B. antenna optional. Appropriate music is chosen for each formation.

After listening to the band for any length of time, it is impossible not to notice, and admire, its broad versatility. No matter the musical taste, the band has something for everyone. Within the space of half an hour it will play selections ranging from Beethoven to traditional college songs to Christmas carols.

The band's philosophy about its music seems to be quite simple: When in doubt, punt. If worst comes to worst, the members can always sing "Roll out the Barrel". This philosophy of not taking itself seriously is the band's greatest asset. The members have their fun while entertaining their audience. While purists may carp about loose organization and flagrant hedonism, the Williams community couldn't care less. From all available evidence, everyone seems to like and enjoy the band; it's just that the members are a bit, er, different.

Roper seeks possible change in surroundings

The future of the Roper Public Opinion Research Center, Inc. at Williams is still undecided according to Philip K. Hastings, President and Director of the Center. The College has gradually reduced its support of the Center from a high of $15,000 two years ago, to $2,500 this year. In July of 1975 the Center took a major step towards complete independence by incorporating.

Last year the Center contacted various educational institutions about the possibilities of relocation, and Yale University and the University of Connecticut responded with a joint offer.

The UConn-Yale proposal would transfer the Center's user services to New Haven, Conn. and the data bank to the computer centers of the two schools. The computer facilities of both institutions would be available to the Center in return for free access to the Center's data bank. The University of Connecticut would defray moving expenses and both schools would supply office space and utilities.

Williams also submitted a proposal to the Roper Center stipulating that the College would give the Center $5,000 in direct funding as well as paying 60 per cent of the Director's salary for his services as a professor. The plan also provided for expansion of the Center's present facilities and assumption of utilities and maintenance costs by the College.

The major advantage of the UConn-Yale plan would be an improved computer facility. According to Hastings, however, the relocation could jeopardize the Center's relationship with both some of its American or foreign data suppliers and its International Survey Library Association membership program.

In an attempt to improve its outmoded computer system, the Center established a link with the University of Massachusetts' computer center at Amherst. UMass provides the Center a part time programmer to use their computer and in return, they are able to use the Center's data sets at a reduced rate.

The Roper Center is also investigating the possibility of creating a link with computer facilities in the Cambridge-Boston area, such as those of MIT and Harvard. Again the Center would offer cheaper access to its data bank in return for these services.

Hastings described these potential links as a first step towards creating a Pan-Massachusetts or a Pan-East Coast organization of interlocking facilities, with the Roper Center as the hub.

Weekend holds promise

check students and alumni bringing illegal drinks through the gate.

While O'Brien does not foresee a lot of drinking at the game, many students might dispute this. Commented one, "It ought to be a great game. Too bad we won't be around to see it."

Should the mood of the crowd rise to too high a fever pitch, it may become necessary to invoke the Massachusetts Goal Post law, forbidding anyone from tearing down goal posts at football games. O'Brien would not predict whether the rambunctious mood of the crowd might be a problem but said he "would probably know by halftime."

The weekend itinerary for Alumni is being kept to a minimum, according to Director of Alumni Relations Craigin Lewis. "People come back to see the game and to see friends," said Lewis, adding that alumni "just come and enjoy."

Saturday evening, in keeping with tradition, Bill Payne, '33 and his band will perform Dixieland jazz at the Log. According to Lewis, the band has been playing together since their college days and are "darn good."

Out of keeping with past years, the Log will be open to students as well as alumni during the entire Homecoming weekend. According to Log manager Gene Falk '75, the policy from last year was changed because the Alumni Society and the Log Committee "thought it would be nice to have a mix of students and alumni."

The Log will operate under normal hours on Friday night and from 11:00 a.m. to 1:00 a.m. Saturday.

College subsidizes snack bar to cover deficit

Seven to eight dollars of each student's board fee presently covers the college snack bar's deficit according to Business Manager Shane Riorden. Riorden justified the subsidy policy explaining that the Snack Bar is a subsidiary of Food Services and that it provides a service to students.

The Snack Bar grosses $110,000 per year, with costs running up to $125,000, Riorden estimated. The net loss figures around 10 to 15 per cent. If each student spent 50c more each week, Riorden suggested, the extra funds would balance the budget.

The snack bar functions as an independent unit, paying for its own electricity, janitorial service, and heat. Riorden said that the snack bar could have broken even if it were not responsible for these overhead costs.

Increased opportunities for students to obtain snacks in their own dorms, on Spring Street, or during the extended breakfast hours are blamed for the decrease in snack bar business. In effect, the College is competing with itself financially by creating eating alternatives.

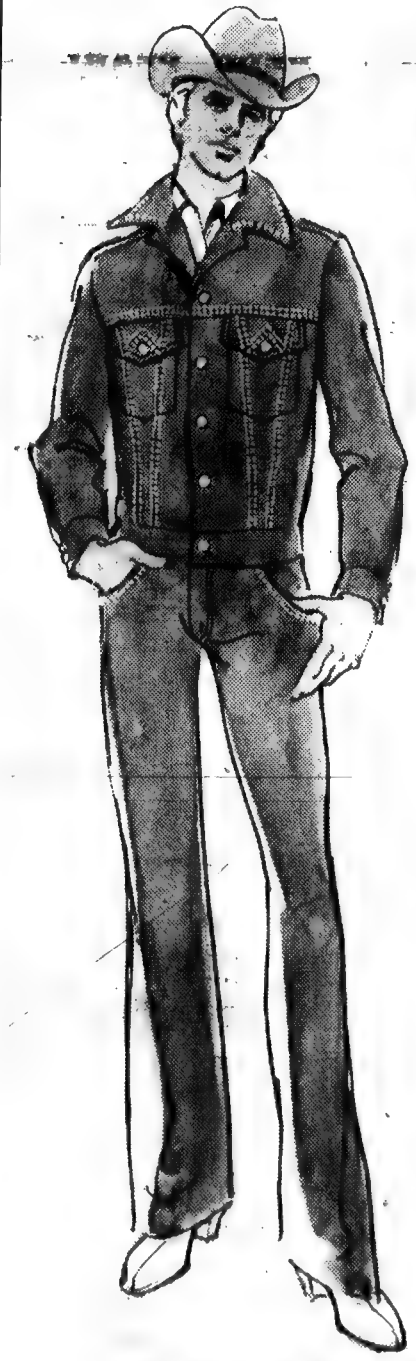
The main problem facing the snack bar however is the cost of staffing during off hours. The hours from 8:30 to 11:30 at night are relatively unprofitable, Riorden said, yet the College must pay employees to keep the snack bar open during this time.

"The matter is not of great concern," Riorden said. "It was never intended to maximize profits; the problem here is very similar to that at the Log."

Endowment up by $6 million

In what College Treasurer Francis H. Dewey III described as "an encouraging year for the financial well-being of the College," the administrative budget has a surplus for the first time in three years, and the endowment fund has increased from $62 million to $68 million, according to the 1975-76 Treasurer's Report.

The College budget has a surplus of $90,646, said Dewey. Income for 1975-76 totalled $15,967,424, and expenditures were $15,876,778.



The endowment fund has exceeded $68 million as of June 30, up from about $62 million the previous year, according to Dewey. More than half of this gain is due to "market appreciation" of endowment investments, and $2.3 million is due to capital gifts added to the endowment, he said.

According to Dewey, total capital gifts fell from $5.6 million last year to $5.5 million in 1975-76. He said the drop "should not be of concern," since capital giving usually fluctuates moderately.

The Capital Fund for the Seventies has reached $25 million, which is half the goal of $50 million by the end of the decade, according to Dewey. He said that the drive had not so far been as successful as had been hoped due to the recession, but was confident that the remaining $25 million would be collected by 1980.

The Alumni Fund exceeded a million dollars for the first time, said Dewey, with 56 per cent of the alumni participating. The Fund is not a capital fund, but is used to pay operating expenses of the College, he said.

Sawyer: helping the handicapped

Are campus buildings accessible?

With talk of millions to be spent on making college buildings accessible to the handicapped, Sawyer Library stands out as the only college building where such accessibility was planned during construction. But just how easy is it for a person confined to a wheelchair to get from Baxter Hall to a carrel on the Library's fourth floor?

1) Starting from the north entrance of Baxter the handicapped person is faced with

2) a curb with no easements. Having found the least dangerous approach to the street, the handicapped person must juggle his way onto the road and

3) wheel down to the Congregational Church parking lot,

4) and across the lawn to get to the library. Absolutely no reasonable easement access is provided to the Library from any direction. Either a handicapped person must have assistance, or he must wheel across lawns which can be wet or muddy.

5) Once in the Library, the handicapped person must find the elevator. No signs indicate its whereabouts. After attracting the attention of a circulation librarian, the handicapped person is guided through a door marked "Coats, Lockers, To Stetson Hall Tunnel" to

6) the first floor offices of the Library. Entrance to the elevator on the first floor can be accomplished only with a key.

7) Once on the fourth floor the handicapped person must reach back into the elevator to release the emergency stop button, a long reach.

8) All desks and carrels are sufficiently high to provide room for study. But when study time ends, an employee must again call the elevator to the first floor. The handicapped person may neither arrive nor leave without an employee's assistance.

The inclines to the first floor lobby pose little problem to the handicapped person when he is ready to leave.

Once inside the Library there is no problem for the handicapped person. Desks, toilets, xerox machines, all are easily accessible. Of course, all accessibility depends upon the elevator. This means the reserve room cannot be reached after 10:45 p.m., nor the entire library on Sundays until 3 p.m.

fumble and just one interception.

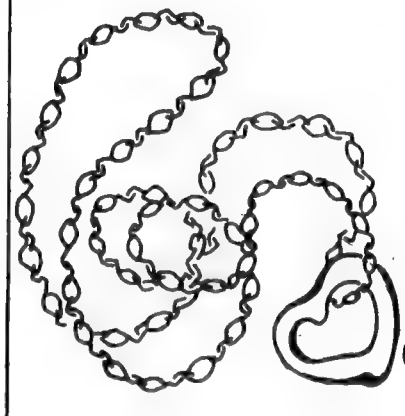
Mr. Vanacore is a fine signal-caller whose collegiate career needs only a Little Three title to be complete. Yet, the veteran must want very badly to show New England who's the top QB. Right now, Wallace is on top of the heap.

Wesleyan defensive end John McVicar was All-New England. Yet, he was considered by many the third best at that position in the Little Three, behind Williams grads Tim Mages and Jack Costello. Look for McVicar to go a little crazy Saturday.

Back to the offense. Wesleyan split end John Gaebe has been a thorn in the side of the Ephs for two seasons, yet played second fiddle to Ephman Dave Parker in the Little Three. Parker has graduated but along comes glue-fingered Herb McCormick to continue stealing fellow Rhode Islander Gaebe's thunder.

Wesleyan defensive backs Steve Imbriglia and Hank Rosenfeld have picked off twenty passes between them in the past three years. But with the likes of the Williams secondaries of the past three years, received no recognition at all.

Starting to get the idea. Wesleyan now owns a team of individuals. A team which, when these individuals put it together at the same time, is a powerhouse. But how often do 22 individuals happen to play as a team, just by coincidence? Not very often.



Williams' days of relying on individuals are behind them. The Ephs are a young squad, just starting to come of age. A strong team effort Saturday will easily neutralize the Wesleyan people who are trying to show the world that they are the Williams of the future. Wesleyan has a bunch of very talented athletes coming to Williamstown Saturday, in terms of talent, maybe a little more than Williams.

But these guys are not team football players, and they've proved it for two seasons, losing most of their close ones. Williams is a team with five Little Three titles and a lot of pride on the line. Look for pride and purple to prevail—Cardinal souffle anybody?

Good luck on Saturday!

Racketwomen reclaim New Englands

The tennis courts of New England have virtually become the women's varsity tennis team's personal playground as they proved again last weekend, frolicking through a large and talented field to capture the New England Tournament championship. This outstanding achievement tops off an 11-1 season which often witnessed the Ephs turn an expected close match into a showcase of their own talent. Over the past three years Coach Curt Tong's teams have compiled a stunning 32-2 record.

Williams was obliged to try harder in this year's tournament since they finished second last year, and try harder they did. All year long the team was, according to Tong, "a spirited and committed group," and the cold, hard practices the week of the tournament did nothing to put the team's enthusiasm and desire on ice.

Due to the system of awarding team points, a good draw is considered essential to a team's chances for success. The Eph's draw was fair, but no. 1 Joninna Sadoff was the only seed of the team's four entries, as compared to two seeds in last year's second place finish behind Yale. Before the tournament last week, however, the Yale coach became embroiled in a controversy with officials and the Elis, the only team to beat Williams in a dual match the past three years, subsequently withdrew from the tournament. Tong felt that Yale would have had difficulty retaining the team title anyway, but it would have been nice if the Ephs could have proven their superiority. If nothing else, the absence of Yale served to tighten the struggle for the championship.

Sadoff, Laura Carson and the doubles teams of Sally Kruse and Rebecca Chase and Holly Prentice and Trudy tenBroeke comprised the Williams's contingent. Other regular team members Amy Demorest, Barb Ernst, Babe Kirk, Amy Sterling, Sherry Willcox and Sue Guttman could not participate due to the four entry per school format of the tournament. The opening afternoon at Amherst went perfectly for the racketwomen; everyone captured their first two matches. These wins garnered the squad 12 points, two points for a first round win and one point for every win thereafter. No other school managed to match the Eph's strong showing and was in these first two rounds that Williams essentially captured the crown. Trinity and Brown led the pack of trailers with 10 points each.

In third round play on Saturday the Eph's finally got a taste of that unknown, defeat. Carson put up a valiant effort against the no. two seed but was just overwhelmed, as was the team of Kruse and Chase in their match with the fifth seeded team. Continuing to lead the team as she has done for the past few years, Sadoff won a close match and apparently inspired Prentice and tenBroeke who also managed to eke out a win, giving the Eph's 14 points.

Quarterfinal play that afternoon saw Prentice and tenBroeke bow out of play to a strong Dartmouth team. This loss particularly hurt as the Big Green were now hot on Williams's trail. But Sadoff came through again with a very strong showing to boost herself into Sunday's semi-final as well as award the team with another all important point, sending them home for the night with 15.

Sadoff's outstanding career ended in the semi-final as she lost a fine three set match to a very strong opponent. All Williams could do now was sit back and wait as both Dartmouth (13 points) and Trinity (13½) were still alive for the team title. But when the Dartmouth team lost a third set tie-breaker and Trinity was blasted, Williams had found its way to the championship.

Rugby blanks Albany

Travelling to the Albany area for the third time this season, the Williams Rugby Football Club A side increased its record to 4-1-1 with a solid shutout victory over Albany State. The efficient passing and kicking of State combined with a slow start by the Williams ruggers kept most of the action in the Williams zone during the early going. The Williams line attack, the team's strongest point this season, was hampered by the poor field conditions and consequently was limited in its effectiveness.

Midway through the period however, the Williams scrum, led by hooker Bill O'Reilly, shifted the momentum with some superb "loose-rucking". With about ten minutes to go in the half, standoff Tom Kondel connected on a 32 yard field goal putting Williams on the scoreboard. Sparked by the kick, the ruggers almost clicked on two more scoring opportunities before the half ended.

The second half, as has been the case all season, belonged to Williams. Relentless pressure by Williams resulted in crucial Albany miscues in the early minutes. Wing Sam Hanchett, an A side performer since his freshman year, cashed in on one of these miscues as he took a perfect pass from teammate Byrne Kelly and streaked 30 yards for the score. Kondel added the conversion making it 9-0 and the ruggers lengthened their unbeaten string to five games.

In the B side game, a Jim Hutchings try and Guido Adams' conversion propelled the Williams squad to a 6-0 victory as they evened their record at 3-3. Outstanding individual performances were registered by Marshall Partington and Mike Krikorian.

Homecoming Weekend features Boston University, most assuredly the club's toughest opponent of the season. Game time is Saturday, Nov. 6 at 11:00 a.m.

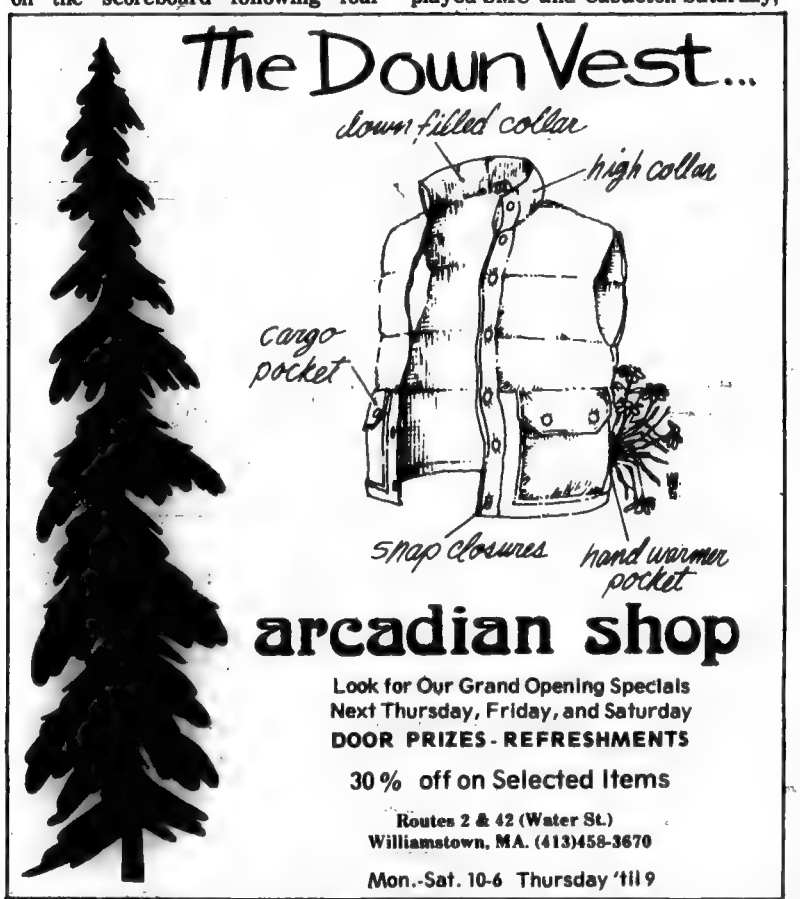
Four Ephs named to All-College team

As a result of their outstanding play this weekend at the Northeast Field Hockey Association Tournament, four Williams field hockey team members have been named to the first squad NE All-College team. Forwards Sally Kraft and Leslie Miln along with fullbacks Cammie McClellan and Laurie Ash received the honors following the team's 4-0 loss to UVM Sunday, and two earlier victories over SMU and Castleton October 30.

Against UVM the Ephwomen made a good effort, but were unable to get on the scoreboard following four breakaway goals by their quick opponents.

Commenting on the game Williams coach Linda Wilkins seemed pleased with the defensive effort despite the lopsided score. "At first the defense was playing the shot on goal rather than letting the goalie have it." Later in the game the defense put it together and, according to Wilkins, fullbacks McClellan and Ash and goalie Mimi DuMouchel played well.

Prior to meeting UVM, the toughest competitor in the division, the team played SMU and Castleton Saturday, winning both games, 3-1 and 1-0 respectively.



Coming on strong against SMU, the Ephwomen got into the game early when halfback Leigh Wilson rebounded to score for Williams. Wilson's tally was followed by a goal off of the stick of teammate Val Corning.

In the second half, the team added their third rebound goal on a shot by Dawn Bedrosian. Remarking on the excellent play of the SMU goalie, Wilkins stressed that rebound shots were "the only way to score".

Later that day, Williams met Castleton in a tough game. "They had sticks like flypaper," said Wilkins explaining the Ephwomen's frustration with the ball's tendency to go right to the stick of a Castleton player.

Realizing the need to use high flicks and scoops to overcome this problem, freshman Monica Grady, filling in for Shailah Stewart, scored for Williams in her first varsity game. The Castleton match highlighted the team's three freshmen, as Grady, Ash, and DuMouchel had an excellent game.

Following the tournament, a selection committee chose the All College first team as well as group of women for the second team. Making the second squad were Ephwomen Grady, Bedrosian, Wilson, and Corning. These selected team members will proceed to the All-College tournament play in the NE Sectionals to be held in Rye, N.Y. November 13 and 14.

Polomen eliminated from Easterns

The Williams Water Polo Club will be home for homecoming ... unfortunately. The team was eliminated in a round-robin tournament held at Brown last weekend to determine berths in the New Englands and Easterns. An impressive 3-1 record in league play placed Williams in a three-way tie with BC and Bowdoin for the two places in post-season play.

At Brown, the club dropped an 8-6 decision to Bowdoin and then succumbed 11-0 to BC. The two losses ended all hopes for participating in the New Englands and Easterns.

Offensively, a larger pool caused many passes to miss the mark. Dennis O'Shea, president of the club, noted that the increased size of the pool led to a "whole different ballgame", one which Williams had difficulty adjusting to. Defensively, the squad was a little slow on turnovers—whistles and flags—leading to recurring fast breaks. When the defense set up, however, they were unyielding.

The results, though seemingly disappointing, are encouraging. For only two years in the league, the team fared far better than expected. There was, as O'Shea phrased it, an "incredible amount of progress" which "gained us respect around the league." Wait 'til next year ...

For this year, the club will have to be content battling for the Little Three title. Williams hosts Wesleyan tonight at 6 P.M. at Muir Pool and then travels to Amherst next weekend.

U Conn nips Eph kickers, 1-0, in close game tremendous upset in the process.

The second half was somewhat of a letdown. UConn came out a little higher emotionally, perhaps due to the realization that tiny Williams College might tie or beat them. They controlled the ball much of the time, frustrating any Eph attempt to generate an offensive thrust. It seemed only a matter of time before they put the ball into the net, which they did with 20:34 left in the game.

A Connecticut forward dribbled past a number of Williams defenders and passed to a compatriot standing in front of the goal, who tapped the ball into the corner of the net. It was at this point that UConn showed why it was so highly touted. Although the Ephs were fired up, they could do nothing because Connecticut demonstrated a stall any basketball team would be proud of.

"They controlled the second half", said Vennell. "We didn't maintain pressure which is disappointing, but overall, we have nothing to be ashamed of." Both the offense and defense played exceptionally well, with Grossman, Steve Smith, and Hank Osborne being the standouts. In fact, the teams had an equal number of shots, and the difference was just that one of Connecticut's ended up in the goal.

Next in line for the booters is Wesleyan and the Little Three. Having averaged almost three goals a game while limiting their opponents to only one, over the past seven games, Williams has to be considered the favorite. But this is like a whole new season, and prior performance does not reallly count. However, if the Ephs can put on a display of skill equal to the one they demonstrated against Connecticut, they could win their first Little Three crown since 1971.

Williams looks to block Cards' goals for three quarters to keep the Cards on top.

Wesleyan is talented, deep, and hungry. Whether they can overcome their erratic ways (eight turnovers vs. Bowdoin) is another question.

Williams can be counted on to keep the air filled with footballs. Don Wallace should have the opportunity to throw to either of two fine split ends, Herb McCormick and Ken Hollingsworth. Look for no major changes in the Purple starting lineup.

Defensively, the key for Williams will be putting a lid on Vanacore and Latessa, and good play by the specialty squads, allowing Robinson no game-breakers.

Cards threaten Eph gridders

Wes gunning for Little Three

Climb into your time machine, Williams fans, and take yourself back to November 8, 1975. Imagine yourself a Wesleyan Cardinal fanatic. Freshman halfback Dennis Robinson has just brought you and 6,000 other homecoming fans to your feet with an electrifying 55-yard punt return for the lead score and it looks like Wesleyan is on the way to its first Little Three crown in five years.

However, the bubble soon bursts, as a Williams team on the verge of an unbeaten season, scores twice in the final period to pull the game out. Wesleyan's youthful team will have to wait a year.

Back to reality and 1976. Wesleyan is 4-2 on the season, fielding one of their strongest teams in years and very much wants its first win over Williams and accompanying Little Three title since 1970. Such is the outlook for Weston Field Saturday.

Two years ago, the Wesleyan football program had hit rock bottom, losing both to Williams and Amherst for the third consecutive year. But Coach Bill MacDermott came up with a bumper crop of freshmen and topped Amherst last year, and lost narrowly to an outstanding Williams team.

Take a look back on the five years of frustration which have plagued Wesleyan since last beating Williams in 1970, before Bob Odell took over the coaching reigns at Williams:

1971—Odell's first year at Williams. The Ephs strike early and hang on for their first win in three years over Wesleyan, 29-13. The Ephs go on to beat Amherst and win the Little Three.

1972—The Odell machine is starting to roll. An aggressive defense, led by senior defensive end Marty Doggett, Williams holds Wesleyan to 197 total yards and wins the Little Three title, 35-21.

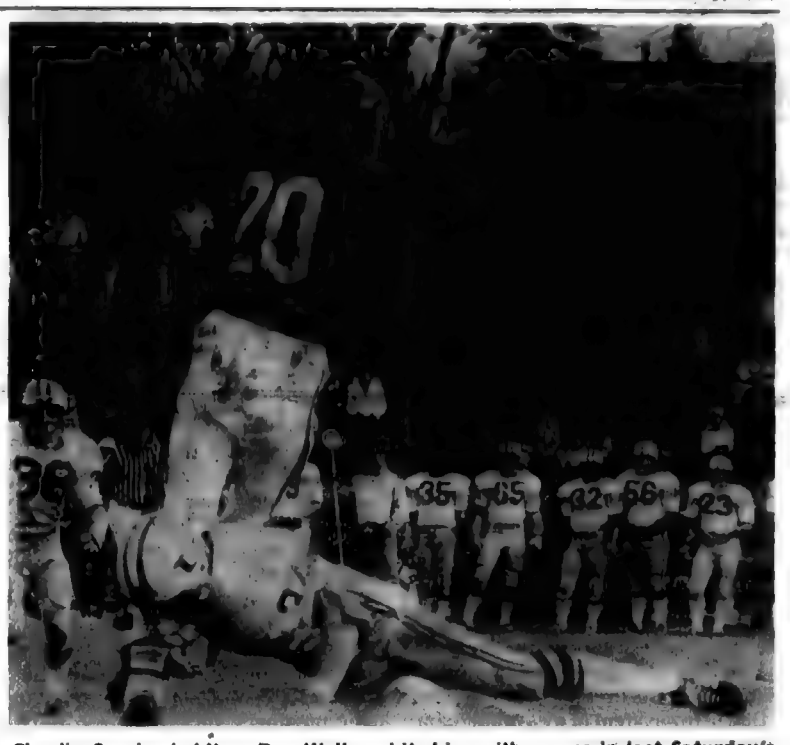
1973—The height of embarrassment. Williams had been stumbling for much of the season but puts it all together and stomps the Cardinals on their own turf, 44-0.

1974—The sophomore passing duo of Brad Vanacore to John Gaebe connects for a pair of third quarter touchdowns but late turnovers put the game out of reach. Williams wins 35-16.

1975—Wallace to Parker twice in the fourth ruins a good Wesleyan team's first legitimate title shot in three years. The Cardinals are still fuming.

There you have it, and this year, the Cards bring essentially the same team to Williamstown. Wesleyan has posted wins over Colby (38-0), Coast Guard (9-6), W.P.I. (43-21), and Amherst (30-17); while losing to Tufts (13-12) and Bowdoin (42-34).

Pacing the powerful Cardinal offense will be three-year veteran quarterback Brad Vanacore, one of the most highly-regarded signal-callers in New England. Vanacore's favorite target is fellow senior John Gaebe.



The Cardinals count on sophomores Bob Latessa and Dennis Robinson (each of whom scored against Williams a year ago) to carry the ball. Fullback Andy Darpino is an outstanding blocker who has also rushed for over 200 yards this season.

Defensively, Wesleyan will do just about anything to make tackles. A year ago, the Cardinals threw a veritable Chinese fire drill at Williams and it was confusing enough

Booters fall to UConn in best game of year

by Richard Abrams

The Williams varsity soccer team dropped a tough 1-0 decision to the University of Connecticut Wednesday afternoon on Cole Field. The defeat left the Ephs at 6-3-1 going into Little Three competition.

Coming into the game displaying an unblemished record and the number four ranking nationally, UConn. stood as Williams' stiffest competition for the year. However, the Purple remained unperturbed, and put on a fine display of soccer. From the opening whistle the Ephs controlled the pace of the first period. Although UConn players were more skilled, Williams made up the difference with hustle and aggressive play.

A superb job by goalie Skip Grossman kept UConn. from putting any score on the board. Unfortunately, the booters were unable to capitalize on the few mistakes made by a team of Connecticut's caliber, and the result was a scoreless tie going into the final 45 minutes of play.

"The first half was probably the best I've seen in six years coaching at Williams," coach Jeff Vennell commented. Indeed, the Ephs forced the opposition to play Williams' type of game, and almost pulled off a

Layden on Sports:

A Taste of Homecoming

Homecoming weekend has once again arrived and among the many privileges accorded the Williams student body will be two days of splendid cooking by the dining hall staffs. Buffets all over the campus with food enough to make proper decisions impossible and too-full paper plates abundant.

Yet, perhaps the biggest and best offering of all will be the delicacy served on Weston Field sometime around four-o-clock Saturday afternoon. As of press time, though, the exact nature of the meal was undetermined. Two menus are possible:

Cream of Latessa Soup
Tossed salad with Imbriglia dressing
Roast prime ribs of
Vanacore Au Jus
Robinson spears with Gaebe sauce
McVicar pie with whipped cream
Darpino dacquiries

Or perhaps Wesleyan rooters would rather travel north to a more Eph-like feast:

Fresh Nelp cocktail with Libardi sauce
Quiche Nuzzolese
Broiled Maine Wallace tails
Chopped McCormick with Hollingsworth juice
Carriers Jubilee
Redden on the rocks

Okay, the point here is not that any of the 7,000 or so rooters who will jam themselves into Weston Saturday afternoon actually care what they eat for dinner for that night. The point is that the contest isn't just a battle of fired-up Little three foes, though it is that. The game is also a battle of individuals.

Mathcups and comparisons all afternoon will appear which are unavoidable, and, in some cases, the players themselves will be quite conscious of their counterparts.

The first and most obvious matchup is that of the two quarterbacks involved: Williams strong-arm Don Wallace and four-year Wesleyan starter Brad Vanacore. The duo comes into the crucial homecoming battle with passing stats on the season as identical as the VanArsdale twins. Wallace—79 for 153, 893 yards, five touchdowns, seven interceptions. Vanacore—72 for 146, 849 yards, eight touchdowns, seven interceptions.

There is one big difference, however. Wallace has never played on a Williams team which has lost to the Cardinals and Vanacore is 0-3 against Williams. Vanacore has been sacked by Eph rushers 17 times, while fumbling three times and throwing five interceptions. Wallace has thrown three touchdowns, without a

Ephs near Little 3 title

by Frank Carr

On Wednesday the Williams cross country team closed out its dual meet season at 10-3 enroute to a seventh consecutive Little Three title. The Ephmen packed their six-man contingent into the top ten for a 24 point tally followed by Amherst with 47 points and Wesleyan with 61.

Senior captain Ken Leinbach was the individual winner for the second year in a row as he moved easily across the 4.8 mile course in an excellent time of 24:31. Leinbach broke out of a seven man pack after 2.5 miles and was pursued by freshman Spence Smith of Wesleyan. Meanwhile, Frank Carr and Dan Sullivan also picked up the pace and left two Amherst runners in their wake. The purple duo followed in the Wesleyan burger, with Sullivan 3rd in 24:53 and Carr 4th at 24:59.

Senior Gary James helped fill in for Joe Kolb's absence by grabbing seventh place in 25:14. Freshman Mike Behrman continued his excellent rookie season, finishing ninth with a 25:21 clocking, followed by Steve Polasky who was four seconds behind in tenth.

The J.V. squad was also successful, but was forced to run 4.8 miles instead of the normal 3.0-3.5. Rick Lane, Steve St. Clair, Russ Anderson, Hans Giesecke and Jeff Magoon, swept 2nd through 6th place to give the Ephs a 20 to 39 win over Amherst, while Wesleyan was unable to field a full team. Peter Winn (8th) Cleve Thayer (11th) and Jon Rathgeber (13th) rounded out a fine Williams effort. Tomorrow marks the end of the 1976 season with the purple harriers making their third trip to Franklin Park in Boston for the New England Championships.

Athlete of the Week Joninna Sadoff

Joninna Sadoff is athlete of week

Joninna Sadoff, number one player on the women's varsity tennis team, has been named as the Record's Athlete of the Week. Sadoff posted an impressive semi-final showing in the New England championships last weekend. The strong performance led her teammates to the New England championship.

HONORABLE MENTION:

Ken Leinbach—Senior captain of the men's varsity cross-country team, he won the Little Three cross-country championship for the second consecutive year. Leinbach moved easily over the 4.8-mile course in the fine time of 24:31.

Jim Spaulding—Senior linebacker for the varsity football team, Spaulding was one of the reasons why the gridders climbed back into the win column over Union Saturday. Spaulding had five tackles and seven assists.

Sally Kraft, Leslie Milne, Laurie Ash, and Cammie McClellan—the foursome, all members of the varsity field hockey team were named to the New England All-College team following last weekend's tournament.

Allocations to sports and politics

Council funds nine organizations

The College Council allocated $11,594 of the Student Activities Tax to nine organizations last night, and donated $200 to the Cynthia Krizack Memorial Fund, expressing its "deep feeling of regret at her tragic death." Memorial donations collected will go to Mount Greylock High School.

ACEC Chairman Jim Bowe reported that the J. Geils Band concert in Chapin Hall Friday was "an unqualified success." The estimated loss was $5940, which was about $400-500 more than anticipated, said Bowe.

Six sports clubs were funded: Outing Club received $3185, Water Polo Club was allocated $465, Roadrunners received $110, Rugby Club was given $1519, Crew received $4000, and Sailing Club was allocated $625.

Two political organizations were allocated funds: the Americans for Democratic Action received $390 and the Young Americans for Freedom were given $300.

The Pipe Band received $1000, as requested and as recommended by the Finance Committee for equipment, publicity, and concert expenses.

Allocations for the Williams Republican Club and for the Volleyball Club were postponed until next week to allow these organizations to prepare revised budgets. Consideration of the Williams Action Coalition funding was postponed until tonight's meeting. Action on funds for the Dance Society were also postponed until they met with the Finance Committee again.

Council Treasurer Clarence Otis commented that Finance Committee efforts to develop a coherent policy for funding club sports were hampered by the "inconsistent" policy of the athletic department. According to Otis, the committee attempted to fund club sports with the objective of "ensuring the survival" of these organizations.

Political organizations, said Otis, were funded according to a policy of not paying for specifically political activity. No attempt was made to "balance funding ideologically," he said, but each organization was considered "on its own merits" with its specific proposed expenditures in mind.

Crew received its entire request, matching last year's allocation. The council made no commitment to continue that level of funding. According to Council President Steve Piltch, Provost Stephen R. Lewis has said no further funds are forthcoming from the College beyond the present $600 annually.

The Rugby Club received its entire request of $1519. The Finance Committee considered $1757 of their proposed budget, covering administrative and playing expenses and not social expenses, to be "legitimate," according to committee member Dave Ross, so the club's entire request was approved.

The Water Polo, Roadrunners, and Sailing Clubs were all allocated their full requests, as recommended by the Finance Committee.

Majors to review profs

by Carl Bettinger

The Student Standing Committee has temporarily shelved plans to distribute a student questionnaire soliciting information on faculty coming up for tenure, according to committee chairman Harvey McIver '77.

The standing committee decided instead to ask all majors to express their feelings about the faculty members in their department by writing the Committee on Appointments and Promotions.

The information gathered from the questionnaire would have been summarized and presented to the CAP to provide more student input into tenure decisions. The CAP, composed of six faculty, makes tenure recommendations for trustee approval.

According to Dean of Faculty Neil R. Grabois, ex-officio member of the CAP, two factors limit the value of the questionnaire: the validity of the summaries, and what Grabois called the "one-shot" nature of the project.

By "one-shot", Grabois said he meant that "evaluation of the faculty is an on-going process", where information is continually gathered. The results gathered from the proposed questionnaire would reflect only the immediate feelings and observations of those taking it.

Standing Committee member Dave MacGregor said he felt the summaries would be valid. In response to Grabois' contention that the results reflected only immediate feelings, he claimed "You run into the same problem with the questionnaires used by (Associate Provost) Booth."

McIver encouraged all juniors and seniors to write the CAP. "It is one of the best ways of providing student input." The standing committee will provide the names of faculty up for tenure.

College Council prepares for last round of SAT allocations

The College Council will finish allocating the Student Activities Tax monies tonight. The last set of groups seeking funding are the Williams Women, International Club, Pre-Law Society, Student Art Group, Pottery, Williams Gay Support Organization, Pipe Band, Newman Association, Jewish Association and the Student Fire Brigade.

Williams Women and Pottery recommendations are less than their requests. Finance Committee chairman Clarence Otis '77 indicated that organizational problems necessitated the cuts. The Pre-Law Society requested $150 as they did last year. The FinCom maintained, again, as last year, that their function falls into the domain of Career Counseling, and has recommended no allocation.

WGSO comes before the council tonight. Even though the FinCom recommends they be allocated their full request, many respresentatives expect a long debate. Otis said the budget proposes many concrete programs designed to educate the college community.

The International Club budget has been reduced by $350, as the FinCom recommends no allocation for the two International Dinners. The Jewish Association has been cut $250. Otis pointed to a lack of outside support as the reason for the reduction.

Meals extended in Baxter . . .

Baxter Hall began serving weekday dinners from 5 p.m. to 7 p.m. last night in an effort to answer a request of "a large number of students," according to Director of Food Services Ross Keller.

Keller said the extended hours were not specifically aimed at shortening lines, but were part of a "constant effort to observe and respond to student needs."

Baxter Hall was chosen to have the extended hours because it is the "largest and most flexible dining hall", he said.

According to Vivian LePage, about 550-600 eat dinner at Baxter each weeknight, a "modest" increase over last year. Approximately one hundred fewer are served Sunday dinner, she said.

Keller did not expect a significant increase in the number of people eating at Baxter. He anticipated only a small increase in cost.

. . . but try Sunday

"Ross Keller should eat here," a freshman standing in a Baxter Hall dinner line Sunday night remarked.

Students lined up for Sunday dinner in Mission Park, Greylock, and Baxter Hall say they wait between 10 and 25 minutes, twice as long as on weekdays. On November 7, the south line in Baxter extended past the snack bar; in Mission Park it backed up near the top of the stairs; Greylock was "packed as usual" with plastic spoons and knives replacing metal.

Although food services extended the dinner hours in Baxter on weekdays, Keller said he didn't plan to lengthen Sunday meals because "no strong need has been observed."

Surveys the last two weekends showed that lines were longest between 5:30 and 6:00; in some cases lines remained long the entire hour. Students in Baxter and Mission Park remarked that the main dish frequently runs out by 6:15.

Members of two row houses claimed that people in the houses went out to dinner Sunday night to avoid the lines. Row houses don't serve meals that night.

A brief survey of students in Mission Park Sunday favored extending hours Sunday night. "Hell, yes, I'd come down when ever they start serving," a junior commented.

The Heavier Side of Eating

Williams Champion Masticator

by Eric Sundin

Two years ago Ronald "D.C." Long, now a Garfield senior, sat down at the local Friendly Ice Cream Shop and polished off 51 one and one-half ounce scoops of ice cream in twelve minutes. One may wonder what motivations prompted Ron the stomach those cold eight pounds and gasp at how he ever fit it all in—especially since he isn't particularly fond of ice cream.

D. C. Long (photo by Brewer)

According to D.C., the endeavor began with his desire to break the Guinness Book of World Records 50-scoops-in-16-minutes listing. On his first attempt, Ron swallowed "only" 40 scoops in the time allotted, and attributed his defeat to lack of training, the nuts in the butter pecan, and the viscosity of each flavor. "The going got slow and tough with the fudge swirl," Ron reminisced.

Spurned on by the failure to reach his goal, Ron began training more seriously. To accustom his mouth and teeth to low temperatures, he chewed copious glasses of crushed ice. To acclimate his stomach he drank ice-cold water. And finally, to stretch his stomach to accommodate the large volume of ice cream, he would down an eight-ounce glass of water once every minute until he reached an equivalent volume.

Cheered on by thirty members of the women's basketball team (which he managed), Ron finally broke the official world record. In addition to the training, he attributed his ability to consume such an incredible amount of ice cream to the technique of "baby scoops" (formerly huge gulps), "deep throating" of those scoops (by-passing the time-consuming tongue), zero rest stops, and the single flavor of vanilla (no problem of varying viscosities). His superb form resulted in only minor after-effects, such as stomach cramps and a frozen throat.

When asked if there had been any promotional inquiries concerning his unique feat, Ron replied solemnly, "Boys clubs . . ." He seemed disappointed at Friendly's lack of enthusiasm and recognition—no free ice cream (the basketball team treated him) and no little commemorative plaque on the wall.

So, in search of possible fame and fortune, Ron has gone onto smaller and better things—that is, large quantities of shrimp. Who will foot the shrimp bill remains to be seen. If the cost is prohibitive, however, D. C. Long, World Champion Ice Cream Eater, might have to resort to the lowly Ivy-League goldfish.

It must have been a great homecoming if everyone was on their feet watching the game. See page 4 for story of 34-7 trouncing of Wesleyan. (photo by Read)

Bites of Praise

Food Services' "constant effort to observe and respond to student needs" has shown marginal success in recent weeks.

In a long overdue response to student dissatisfaction with meal hours and line length, Food Services added an additional hour to the time during which dinner will be served at Baxter Hall. The additional hour should reduce the length of the lines which have been prevalent at Baxter. Equally, important, it will allow athletes whose practice schedules conflict with normal meal hours to eat regular meals rather than forcing Food Services to make special arrangements for them.

Student response to Saturday evening's buffets was overwhelmingly complimentary. Even some of the row house officers who had been critical of the new Food Services administration's refusal to let them alter menus were pleased with the choices they were given in establishing the buffet menus and in making changes in the menus for other weekend meals.

From an economy point of view, Food Services deserves praise for not continuing the wasteful policy of serving brunch steaks on big weekends. Students will better appreciate such steaks when their taste buds are not dulled from a weekend of drinking.

Finally, the new Food Services director, Ross Keller, has recognized that it is blatantly inequitable to fund a $15,000 annual snack bar deficit out of student board fees. Students who are not on the College meal plan, faculty, staff, townspeople and visitors constitute a large part of the snack bar's clientele yet contribute nothing to the underwriting of its losses.

Nibbles of Grief

Unfortunately, some of the same failure to observe student wishes that plagued the previous Food Services administration still seems evident. There is still no simple way for a typical student to voice a minor complaint concerning Food Services. If there were such a way, Food Services would be hearing:

—that the lines on Sunday at all four dining halls are long throughout most of the dinner period. Indeed, it is hard to believe that Food Services' hour extension at Baxter did not include Sunday.

—that Sunday dinners continue to chase students to local delicatessens and pizza houses because relative to the rest of the week, food quality is considered by many to be lower on Sundays. (Leftovers potpourri still appears to be part of the weekly menu).

—that a major source of inequity between the major dining halls and the row houses is the treatment of students eating in the major dining halls. They are often denied the opportunities to mix entrees and to obtain a sufficient quantity of food their first time through the line.

—that while food variety has improved, there has been little noticeable improvement in food quality. For example, the grease from hamburgers must still be wiped off with a napkin.

As we warned in an editorial earlier this year, if the new Food Services administration is to meet with success, it must find informal ways of seeking student input. Food Services has responded well to the College administration's target problems of food choice and vegetarian alternatives. It must now turn to addressing student perceived problems such as food quality, attitudes of food service workers and unnecessary rules.

Viewpoint

Homophobia, Williams and America

The young gay activist movement is dying, and with it the prospect of overcoming arbitrary and wanton discrimination against gay people. Homophobia masquerading as morality, on the other hand, is neither new nor diminishing in the United States. If anything, public attitudes are hardening against gays in reaction to the increased attention given homo- and bi-sexuality in recent years. Just as the tortuous, inch-by-inch battle against legal discrimination is beginning to falter in the face of this increasing opposition, gay activism is breathing its last. A return to the dark days of pre-1970 America is a considerably shorter trip than the hopeful sort would have one believe.

Williamstown, or more specifically Williams College, provides an excellent example of the granite-like intransigence of public opinion. Supposedly a good deal more liberal and enlightened than an individual from the mainstream of the American population, the average Williams student has either "never thought about" gay rights (thus lending his support to outrageously unconstitutional discrimination) or is in outright support of discriminatory practices. Insensitivity and crudeness (as evidenced by what passes for humor on campus, for example) are rampant at Williams. And these facts cannot be explained away with the familiar complaint that Williams students are "completely hung up and messed up about sex," no matter how true that popular wisdom may be. Williams' "hang-ups" are probably more obvious because of its strange and artificial social arrangements, but its students certainly demonstrate no more (though no less) homophobia than the American public as a whole.

What can be done? Williams has given birth to the Williams Gay Support Organization (WGSO), a group whose two most striking characteristics are its obsession with secrecy and its inability to evoke a substantial response from the student body. What, then, can be done?

Nothing. We witness the end of an era, the end of perceptible progress for many oppressed peoples. The hopes of America's gay people for simple justice will inevitably be dashed in the onrush of callous reaction and mass sexual panic. Not only will America continue to refuse to yield anything of substance, but soon she will discard even the condescending platitudes about "tolerance" which she had taken up in a fit of liberal guilt. And damned little resistance can be expected here at lovely Williams. We'll be lucky if we get a moratorium on applause.

Letter: Free U.

To the editor:

Dear Readers,

Do you know how to jitterbug? Have you considered making your own bagels? Do you know the basics of Emergency Medical Care?? These are but a few of the course offerings for this year's Free University. Our list is growing daily as more people become enthusiastic about sharing their skills and interests.

In case you still don't know what the Free University is, here's the scoop. It provides the opportunity for all members of the college and local community to participate in informal, non-credited courses during the month of January. Those interested in initiating courses are contacting us and are now submitting brief course descriptions. A course catalog will be compiled for distribution on January 3, 1977, and a registration night will soon follow.

The scope of Free U. courses has expanded greatly in the past couple of years. Of the sixty offered last year, several of the most popular included winter camping, ski and showshoe touring, ethnic traditions and cooking, musical instruction and ensembles, yoga, meditational practices, dance, needle crafts . . . We hope that some of these and others, of course, will be offered again. But, who is going to teach them? WE NEED TEACHERS!

Why not give it a try? If interested, please contact us by November 17. This date is not far off, but you still have time. All you have to do is give us a general idea of what you have in mind. Let your imagination go!

Lectures

Shulamith Firestone will address "Communism and-or Spiritual Revolution: Religion in the Future," Wednesday in Room 111, TCL at 8 p.m. The radical feminist is the founder of New York's Red Stockings, a member of the N.Y. Radical Feminists, and author of The Dialectic of Sex; The Case for Feminist Revolution.

Professor Gerald Hellainer of University of Toronto's political economy department, lectures on "Transnational Firms and Trade Problems of Developing Countries," Thursday at 8:15 in the Center for Development Economics, Main Street at Field Park.

Roger Revelle, Saltonstall Professor of Population Policy at Harvard University and Phi Beta Kappa Visiting Scholar 1976-77, will lecture Thursday at 8 p.m. in Jesup Hall Auditorium. His talk, entitled "Give Us This Day Our Daily Bread," is sponsored by Phi Beta Kappa.

Revelle has had a varied career as an oceanographer, a professor, and a science advisor and administrator. One of his ten advanced degrees is a L.H.D. from Williams, received in 1967.

He became science advisor to the Secretary of the Interior in 1961.

News and Notes

Mead Government Summer Internship Meeting

There will be an open meeting on Thurs. Nov. 11th at 4 p.m. at OCC to discuss the Mead Summer Internship Program which is open to any qualified sophomore and juniors interested in a summer experience in government.

NEWS BRIEFS

Mead Internships

Approximately fifteen Williams students will be government interns this summer as part of an on-going program supported by the Mead Fund. The fund provides financial support for those students selected who choose to accept non-paying or low-paying internships.

Previous Mead Interns have worked in a variety of paid and volunteer jobs in Congressional offices, cabinet departments and organizations such as Common Cause, according to program coordinator Sue Little.

Students are responsible for finding their own jobs, but according to previous interns, the Mead title is an asset in finding a job.

Little said most interns work in Washington, but a few choose jobs outside the nation's capital.

A committee composed of three faculty members will select the interns after examining their academic records, recommendations and the interest in government of the candidates. Most of those selected are juniors, but a few sophomores have participated in the program.

In past years, the Mead Interns have sponsored a series of seminars in Washington. Last year's group met with Attorney General Edward Levi, Karen Davis of the Brookings Institution, Kevin Delaney of ABC News and other prominent persons working in Washington.

A meeting will be held on Thursday, November 11, at 4 p.m. in the Office of Career Counseling to discuss the program with perspective candidates. Several 1976 Mead Interns will be present to share their experiences of job hunting, living in Washington and on-the-job "happenings".

Applications are now available at the Office of Career Counseling. The deadline for applications is November 24.

College receives science grant

Williams College recently received a grant from the Research Corporation of New York City. The $4,200 grant was made under the foundation's Cottrell College Science Grants Program, which supports academic research programs in the natural sciences at private, predominantly undergraduate institutions.

The grant will support research on "quark binding in strongly interacting elementary particles." The principal investigator of the project is Dr. Stephen Blaha, an assistant professor of physics. Blaha received his B.S. from Notre Dame in 1966 and his Ph.D. from Rockefeller University in 1971, and is currently in his first year of teaching at Williams.

Corrections

The November 2 Record article, "College Houses to Begin Inclusion of CDE Fellows" incorrectly refers to Econometrics as being taken by two seniors, taught at the Center, and being the only link between the College and the Center for Developmental Economics. Several CDE courses are open to undergraduates, although Econometrics, taught in Hopkins Hall, is primarily an undergraduate course, with 12 undergraduates and 5 CDE fellows enrolled.

Record announces promotion of 30 to staff positions

The editors of the Record today announced the promotion of 30 students to the positions of Staff Reporter and Staff Photographer. Their names appear in today's masthead. In addition, Chip Buckner has been promoted from Staff Reporter to Associate Editor in the news department.

According to Record Managing Editor Scott Fenn, the promotions were based on the paper's policy of naming students to the staff after they had produced consistently good work for a period of at least six weeks. He added that the new staff members are now eligible for editorial positions when a new editorial staff is composed in January.

Arch-Villainess Lady Sneerwell and her companion in Slander, the insidious Mr. Snake appear in the Williams College Theatre's 1920's-style production of Sheridan's comic masterpiece "The School for Scandal." Performances November 12th, 13th, 18th, 19th and 20th at the Adams Memorial Theatre. Tickets at the AMT box office.

Updated 'School for Scandal' opens Friday

Gregory Boyd's rendition of School for Scandal takes to the stage starting this weekend at the AMT as Sheridan's classic comedy once again comes to life. Approaching a bicentennial of its own, Boyd reaffirmed that that fact had nothing to do with the reasons for producing the 199 year old work. "We're doing the play mainly for the actors," Boyd commented. "There are no less than fifteen terrific roles; characters extremely well drawn and exaggerated with language so robust and boisterous that there is a lot for the actors to sink their teeth into."

It also offers the opportunity for a lot of farce business, mistaken identity, etc.—interesting directoral things. I'm having a lot of fun directing it."

The biggest innovation of the production is taking it out of the 1777 setting and putting it into the early 1920's. "The reason for the shift," according to Boyd, is not to make the play more palatable to the audience or inject life into a venerable script, but rather to see if the considerations are necessarily locked into that period."

It seemed to Boyd and the designers that the 1920's was an equally frivolous and artificial period. It was the most recent period which could cope with the play. It is still a period piece—not a modern dress version. The text, which is unchanged for this production, sits well in the 20th century setting.

J. Geils plays thundering rock

Reviewed by Bill Dahling

"Sure, we've played in smaller places," Peter Wolf, lead singer for the J. Geils Band, commented after one hour and twenty minutes of searing rock and roll, "but tonight was a real blast. Hey, we would've played all night," he continued, "but the main office told us to shutdown."

If you can figure out who or what the "main office" is, you will know how the J. Geils Express was finally halted.

The J. Geils Band sings about lonely, estranged love. The power of love to hurt is monumental, but too strong to avoid. Their concerts showcase the verbal, musical, and physical attempts to confront love, to set it straight.

At 9:45, a tape-recorded siren wailed out of the monstrous P.A. system. The band slipped onto the dark stage, and announced a state of emergency.

In the first song, "Love-itis," Wolf bemoaned that "the feelin' I got, is like a disease," and "my family doctor, could find me no cure." The band crescendoed along with Wolf at the end, crying out for relief from the affliction.

As the set progressed, dancing and partying music provided a break from the troubles of love. Wolf introduced "Southside Shuffle" as the group's "first message song." The audience answered his query of "Do you wanna dance?" by using the aisles, chairs, anything. The sliding guitar runs of Geils and the shrieking harp blasts of Magic Dick physically incited the audience to boogie.

Two funky numbers, "Raise Your Hand" and "Detroit Breakdown," featured some fine drumming by Stephen Jo Bladd. Broken sticks arced over the stage and into the audience, as Bladd's relentless assault on the drums took its toll.

Wolf announced, "This next song is about L-O-V-E." His extended story about "a man who abused and misused his young lady" culminated in his kneeling on the stage, introducing "Musta Got Lost."

Wolf was off his knees and began wheeling across the stage. Finding no room, he leapt into the main aisle, dancing and singing five rows into the audience. Back on stage, he resembled a floppy, loose-jointed marionette. Whenever he grasped the microphone stand to begin his gravity-defying vaults, however, his whole body stiffened, apparently drawing strength from the electricity and metal.

"Houseparty" followed—a rocker highlighted by Geils and Magic Dick playing off each other, trading leads and solos, each pushing the band faster and faster.

The last three songs of the set kept the frenzied crowd yelling and clapping. The old Supremes' tune "Where did our Love Go?" showcased the wonderful piano skills of Justman. Wolf began the song by giving a gift "from the J. Geils Band to everyone," sprayed mist of Dom Perignon that shot seven rows into the crowd.

On "Whammer Jammer," Magic Dick's trump card, the harpsichord blew up a one man storm, making the harmonica sound like a trumpet and a violin, and everything in between, Wolf conducted the rest of the band with a baton, but Bladd needed no help in keeping the beat.

The band immediately launched into, "Looking for A Love," delighting all the "Full House" aficionados. Geils' brief solo was well executed, and nicely balanced by Magic Dick's omni-present harp. Bladd kept driving the group harder with his restless rhythms, while Justman pounded the keyboards, his head swaying back and forth over the keys, following his hands running up and down the scales. Wolf scrambled under the piano and peered into the audience, "lookin' here and there, searchin' everywhere."

The encores provided a marvelous ending to the throbbing, slam-bang main set. Magic Dick soloed and sang briefly; "he's only 17 miles from home . . . let him do it alone," Wolf announced. "Give it to Me" came next, and marked the emergence of bassist Danny Klein whose work on the jam section of this particular number was exceptional.

The second encore showed the versatility and range the band is capable of. Geils and Wolf appeared alone on stage for "Start All Over Again," a slow ballad that put the audience back in their seats. Wolf crooned the familiar theme of heartaches, but realized that "love makes you want to sing about love." The last song of the night "First I Looked at the Purse" left the crowd breathless and drained, too tired to ask for more.

The J. Geils Band seems to conceive of themselves as fighters, banging out hard rock and roll by sheer effort and strength. For the first encore, Wolf introduced the players like an announcer at ringside running down the night's card.

After the show, Wolf said, "Watch for our new 45. It's going to be called 'Welcome to the Christmas Party.'" When asked if a new album was planned, he said that one was nearly finished, and would be ready for release later next year. The name of the album? "The Fighting has Just Begun."

In a play which typified the Williams hustling defense all afternoon, Greg McAleenan (28), John Dombrowski (86), Todd Nelp (44), Emmett Creahan (66), Mark Eckert (30) and Dave Libardi surround Wesleyan runner John Gaebe. (Oettgen)

New offense key to victory

Ephs pummel Wesleyan, 34-7

by Tim Layden

Honest folks, this wasn't the way the script was supposed to read at all. The new kids on the block (Wesleyan) were going to come up the street and finally give the big bullies what they deserved. Unfortunately, Williams still seems to enjoy being the big bully and Wesleyan will have to wait another year.

Very few of the 6,000 or so fans who ventured to Weston Field Saturday afternoon could have expected anything along the lines of a rout. Wesleyan came into the homecoming game as a one-point favorite to capture their first Little Three crown in six years and left with only a smattering of pride still intact.

"There are very few times when I've ever seen a team get so emotionally ready for a game," said a very happy Bob Odell after the win. Indeed, not even the most optimistic of rooters could have said Williams was merely 27 points better than Wesleyan, but the Ephs were certainly 27 points higher.

The 34-7 Williams win was a brilliant piece of strategy by Odell. His hurry-up, two-split end, two slot-back offense sent Wesleyan defenders scurrying to the sidelines after just three plays asking what was going on. The Cardinals probably awoke Sunday morning asking themselves the same thing.

Williams, senior quarterback Don Wallace had his finest day in a purple uniform. Never one to shy away from the forward pass, Wallace was placed in a veritable heaven by Odell's game plan, which called for Williams to throw and throw and throw. The one-time mad bomber responded brilliantly, hitting a fine 27 of 42 passes for 269 yards and four touchdowns, and even got in a few appropriate jabs at the more than hostile Wesleyan crowd.

As for the anticipated duel between Wallace and Wesleyan standout Brad Vanacore, well, it just never materialized. Vanacore did manage to hit 20 of 44 passes, but most of them came after the game was out of reach. The four-year veteran spent his third straight Williams game picking mud out from between his teeth and peeling Williams linemen off his jersey. Williams rushers sacked Vanacore nine times for losses of over 70 yards.

A weak John Papa punt gave Williams good field position on the Wesleyan 37 midway through the first period. A third down Wallace to Ken Hollingsworth completion was good for 29 yards and set up the first Eph score of the day. Wallace threaded a third and goal pass to Charlie Carrier, who was wearing safety Hank Rosenfeld in addition to his jersey, for the touchdown. Pass interference was called and declined as Carrier held on to the ball for an outstanding grab.

This was the way the first half ended, but only the greasy fingers of Wesleyan split end John Gaebe (who finished with 14 catches) kept the score intact. Gaebe turned Greg McAleenan completely around on a corner pattern only to drop the perfectly thrown Vanacore aerial.

In the third quarter, however, the floodgates opened, and the Wesleyan crowd fell silent. A 12-play, 73 yard drive by Williams early in the third period started the onslaught. Gus Nuzzolese got the Purple running attack going with his best performance of the year (58 yards) and Tom Redden capped the drive with a one-yard Sam-bam dive for the score. Kevin Cramers conversion put Williams on top, 14-0.

Wesleyan junior Paul Nelson fumbled the ensuing kickoff and the Ephs were back in business on the Cardinal 24. Wallace was quick and merciful, using just one play to hit Nuzzolese over the middle for the six. The conversion attempt was wide and the fun wasn't over yet.

On the first Cardinal play following the kickoff, John Theil nabbed the first of his two interceptions and rumbled down to the Wesleyan 12. One play later it was Wallace to Herb McCormick for another score and 27-0, Williams.

From 7-0 to 27-0 in just 27 seconds and the Cardinals are still trying to get the license number. "We just got the breaks and then hit 'em when their morale was down," said Odell.

The remainder of the contest was purely academic, as Vanacore and the Cards simply tried to avert a shut out and just get out of Williamstown with some semblance of pride remaining in what was once a promising season.

A four-yard touchdown pass from Vanacore to Gaebe with under two minutes remaining in the game got Wesleyan on the board.

As for Williams, credit is due all around. Middleguard Emmett Creahan made his last Wesleyan game one to remember, sacking Vanacore like he owned him all day. Ends John Dombrowski and Bob Staiger were outstanding, making the fans forget about Cardinal end John Mc-What's-his-name long before the final gun.

The much-malinged Williams offensive line, Joe Maguire, Brian Fales, Steve Maier, Bruce Wilson, Kenny Schoetz, Tim Dunn, and Dave Maltzan gave Wallace time enough to brush his teeth before throwing most of his passes. Charlie Carrier, in the tight end spot for much of the game, equalled McCormick's two-week-old school record with ten catches.

It was a win of which all the players can be very proud. As Odell put it, "We really got ready." Boy, did they ever, and one more week of getting that ready will insure an up and down but never out Williams team of a sixth straight Little Three crown. Next week, of course, is . . . oh hell, we all know who it is.

Purple clips Cardinal kickers, 3-1

by Richard Abrams

Williams varsity soccer took a giant step toward its first undisputed Little Three championship in five years by defeating Wesleyan 3-1 on Cole Field Saturday. The victory, raising the Eph's season record to 7-3-1, insured Williams at least a part of the title, because the Cardinals have already defeated Amherst.

Field conditions were well below optimum when the game begun, due to a layer of snow which covered the surface. In addition to being very slippery, the concise passing game both teams rely on was hindered. Nevertheless, Williams controlled the ball from the outset.

Some superb saves by the Wesleyan goalkeeper prevented the Ephs from opening up a large lead very early in the game.

However, the Purple tide was unable to be stemmed for long. Midway through the first half, Henry Osborne slipped a ball into the Wesleyan net, assisted on the play by an excellent pass from Steve Wertimer.

But the Cardinals struck back just minutes later as Stanley Hamilton tied the game up with an unassisted goal. Tight defensive play by both teams followed, and the score remained tied at halftime.

The second period was greeted by a warm sun. Unfortunately, this served to melt the snow, which in turn totally changed the playing conditions. Now, the ball skipped after hitting the ground, instead of getting stuck in the snow. Once again, the teams had to adjust. Williams accomplished this first and began to apply offensive pressure.

Displaying a well coordinated passing attack, the booters broke the deadlock when Jim Hield tallied off a long cross only ten minutes into the half. This apparently demoralized the Wesleyan team as they began to consistently lose the ball at midfield, which greatly endangered their chances for a comeback. John Friborg applied the icing to the cake when he took a long pass from Steve Smith, dribbled past one defender, and beat the goalie low with an outstanding shot.

"It was one of the best pressure games we've played", remarked coach Vennell. "In fact, it was probably the best entire game we've played all season." Indeed, Williams did not demonstrate the spotty play they have shown in the past. They kept the pressure up for the full ninety minutes.

Saturday, the Ephs travel to Amherst to do battle with the Lord Jeffs. Despite a 1-9 record, the Jeffs are not a bad team. "The Amherst coach says it's the best group he's had", said Vennell. They will definitely be up for the game, and try to salvage something from a disappointing year.

Women swimmers unbeaten

After beating both Tufts and Smith soundly last week, the women's swim team will meet last year's archrival Holyoke Thursday night at the Muir Pool.

With four victories to their credit, the Ephwomen are presently undefeated and haven't been seriously challenged so far. Last year the team lost to Mt. Holyoke in a close meet against them and UMass.

"We have a stronger team this year," one member said, "so it's going to be very close."

Last Friday Tufts fell to Williams 79-44 in Medford. Keron Walker had a share of four victories, including the 50 free and the 100 fly, while Sue Tuttle and Marilla Pearsall counted in three firsts apiece.

Tuttle copped the 50 and 100 breaststroke, with a career best of 1:19.7 in the 100. Hilary Hodgeson also posted her best time of the year in the 100 breast, finishing third. Marilla Pearsall took the 100, 200, and 500 freestyle events and Nina Murphy won the 100 back. Barb Bonner placed high in both backstroke races.

The team travelled to Northampton last Monday and had no trouble subduing the Smith squad in their own territory. Murphy, Walker and Joanna Monroe led the team.

Runners place 15th in New England

by Frank Carr

The varsity cross country squad wound up the 1976 season last Saturday by placing 15th out of 34 teams in the New England Championships. Coach Tony Plansky was pleased with the outcome considering the Ephs were pitted against teams such as Providence, UMass and Northeastern, all ranked among the top 15 in the country.

Leading the purple pack was junior Joe Kolb who remained healthy for the entire fall and completed his first full cross country season at Williams. Kolb was injured at last year's big meets at Franklin Park but on Saturday he cruised over the 5.0 mile course for 55th place at 25:10. Dan Sullivan matched his 25:23 clocking of last week's Eastern race but due to the large field of over 200 runners, his efforts only netted him 70th place. After a disappointing race at the Easterns, Frank Carr got his act together and conquered the Franklin Park course in 25:36 for the no. 84 spot. "Mr. Dependable", Mike Behrman picked up finishing stick number 100 with a fine 25:53 effort.

The number five man for the Ephs was Steve Polasky in 121st, 11 ticks of the watch over 26 minutes. Freshman Steve St. Clair got his first taste of varsity competition on the Boston course and closed out his season in 182nd place at 27:56.

Captain Ken Leinbach was leading the 7-man Eph contingent at 3 miles but dropped out shortly after. Leinbach will be the lone Williams representative at the N.C.A.A. Div. III meet to be held next Saturday in Cleveland.

CUL considers randomizing house transfer

Members of the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) and four representatives from the Student Housing Committee began refining a proposal that would randomize the house transfer system Monday. The committee decided early this fall to introduce randomness into the transfer process to protect the diversity of the housing system and to prevent "special interest" housing.

The revised transfer process under consideration would be very similar to freshman inclusion. Transfer applicants would list each of the four housing categories in order of preference. The Housing Committee would transfer all applicants but not necessarily to the category of their choice and not to any specific house chosen by the applicant.

The CUL reached a consensus on limiting the size of groups applying for transfer together to no more than four persons. Transferring blocks of more than four friends could threaten the diversity principle, the committee agreed.

Transfer inclusion should follow freshman inclusion in order to maximize the number of freshmen who can be given their first choice, the committee decided. "Running freshman inclusion first should lessen the demand for transfers in the years to come," CUL chairman Earl L. McFarland said.

The committee decided that it would not interfere in the room draw procedures of each house. Establishing room draw policy will, as always, be the responsibility of individual houses.

In upcoming meetings, the CUL will review the existing housing categories with consideration of possible realignments. As presently organized, the houses fall into four categories: Dodd-Fitch-Prospect, Greylock, Mission Park and Row Houses. Some members believe that in order to make the inclusion choices more meaningful, Dodd should be categorized with the Row Houses. Fitch and Prospect would be placed with Greylock and Mission Park under this proposal.

Council funds five groups

The College Council accepted five Finance Committee budget recommendations Tuesday evening. These recommendations resulted in full funding to three groups, the Newman Association, the Student Art Gallery, and the Williams Gay Support Organization. The Council's action also resulted in significant cuts to the Williams Action Coalition and Pottery Ltd. Four groups whose budgets were scheduled to be considered failed to send spokesmen to the meeting and the Council voted to table these considerations till their next meeting. The no-shows included the Jewish Association, the International Club, the Pre-Law Society and Williams Women.

WAC received the biggest funding cut of the evening when the Council voted 17-3 to allocate $1000 to the group. WAC had requested $2000 this year and had received $1500 last year. Treasurer Clarence Otis attributed the cut to WAC's "Lack of specific ideas." He also stated that "Full funding would be a disincentive to seek outside funds".

WAC co-chairman Paul Schneider argued that "We don't see our job as holding dances and charging for films". He claimed that WAC had provided speaker funds for other campus groups and that the cutback would seriously impair this practice. Finance Committee member Ross Cheit disputed this claim by stating, "As far as we could tell, WAC never funded another group's speakers".

The debate over Pottery's funding was marked by confusion in the group's Budget figures. Pottery Ltd. had requested $1900, but admitted that this still would leave them with a $400 deficit. The Finance Committee recommended an allocation of $1100. This reduction was due to the committee's policy not to provide any organization with funds for instruction or wood or clay materials that would be kept by the organization members. The Council accepted the Finance Committee's recommendation 17-6.

WGSO requested and received $750 by an overwhelming vote. WGSO co-chairman Ginny Long later stated that "I believe the Council sincerely

Faculty hear reports

Meetings remain closed

The faculty approved a proposal Wednesday keeping student-faculty committee meetings closed, but allowing committees to open sessions at their discretion. The faculty also endorsed the trustee's statement on residential housing and heard reports from three committees.

The Steering Committee motion, passed 54-20, read, "That meetings of faculty-student standing committees will normally be closed, but that each committee may, at its discretion, vote to open up individual meetings to students and faculty who are not members of that committee." At its Oct. 20 meeting, the faculty returned a motion to the committee that stated in part, "The meetings of standing committees will normally remain closed, but that committee chairmen are encouraged to hold at least one open meeting per semester."

Steering Committee Chairman Irwin Shainman contended that the new motion was more liberal and defined what he called "local option."

Speaking for the motion, committee member Gary Jacobsohn stated, "One important issue is at stake that has not received much attention: the principle of effective representation." He outlined four underlying assumptions:

—faculty and students on committees are representatives of constituencies.

—being represented means being present in a sense;

—a presumption of privacy does not "render a representative unaccountable to constituents";

—representatives may legitimately feel that discussion and deliberation may be more productive if constituents aren't present and preliminary decisions are not reported in the press.

Kurt Tauber attacked the resolution, arguing for open meetings. "One thing Williams lacks is involvement of students in their own education. An education should lessen dependence on paternalism." Open meetings, he said, would create an opportunity for interested students to find out what goes on.

"The faculty shouldn't feel it is represented by committee members—they are selected, not elected."

The motion does not limit a committee's capacity to invite guests. Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) Chairman Earl McFarland commented that he would continue to allow a Record reporter to attend meetings.

After the meeting, College Council President Steve Piltch said he was disappointed by the decision. He said he would bring the issue up at the next CC meeting and planned to meet with College president John W. Chandler "to discuss alternatives."

The faculty also passed by voice vote a motion by Fred H. Stocking that "vigorously endorses the action by the Trustees on 9 October re-

Dean decrees no limit to hour tests

by Garrick Leonard

"There are no longer any guidelines on the use of hour tests," declared Dean of the College Peter Berek. Administration of hour tests is under the control of each professor.

"I've always had the impression that there was a limit of two per semester," said Associate Professor George R. Goethals, Chairman of the Committee on Educational Policy. "But I don't think it is written down anywhere. It's a sort of rule of thumb around the department."

Registrar George C. Howard said he was unaware of a two test limit or any other present rule.

Until recently, administration of hour tests was explicitly restricted. Before 1971 (the date of the Honor Code's revision), the Honor Code had specific limits on the number and type of tests allowed in a course. These limits apparently date back to the inception of the Honor Code in 1897.

According to Berek, the Code was initially written as a treaty between the faculty and the students. The teachers agreed to give only certain tests in return for the students' pledge not to cheat. The test provisions were dropped in 1971 with the consent of both faculty and students who agreed that they were too restrictive.

The number of hour tests given in a course during a semester varies from none to as many as four or five. "It depends on the individual course and what the professor thinks is best," Berek said.

The one college-wide practice in administering hour tests deals with multiple section courses. Tests in these courses are often given in the evening and the next meeting of each section is cancelled to compensate for the time spent in the test. Even this practice, however, is not defined.

Goethals expressed concern for the lack of policy on this issue. "There ought to be a file somewhere with all the regulations governing academic affairs: major exams, hour tests, theses, and so on," he suggested.

Chapin Phase I to be completed by Thanksgiving

The first of a three-phase renovation project for Chapin Hall will not be completed until Thanksgiving, music department chairman Irwin Shainman announced. The opening of twenty-five practice rooms in the basement of Chapin was targeted for mid-September but late delivery of materials delayed completion of the renovations.

Work is now proceeding on soundproof music practice rooms in Chapin Hall basement. (photo by Kahane)

"The contractors had to find new carpenters when their cabinet making firm went bankrupt," Shainman explained. Soundproof doors arrived late from California and strikes in various industries slowed down the construction.

Phase two, construction of the proposed Chapin Hall addition, will be underway by September of 1977, according to Shainman. The addition, designed by Cambridge Seven Associates, will house music facilities.

The design calls for a two level structure situated on the library side of Chapin. The bottom story will contain listening rooms, studios, offices and three classrooms. The top level will hold a 250 seat recital and lecture hall, a 105 seat choral and lecture hall and a rehearsal hall.

The second story will connect with the ground floor of Chapin through two passageways, one in the front of the complex, the other towards the rear. In a space between the addition and the side of Chapin Hall, the architects have placed a small, open courtyard.

The facade of the addition will be scored concrete, intended to resemble the stone foundation of Chapin, and to suggest continuity between the two structures. The concrete will also provide a visual break between the brick of the library and Chapin's own brick facade. The architects have been careful to keep the height of the addition in scale with the surrounding buildings.

The completed facility will represent the culmination of hours of research and discussion. The architects' plans were first evaluated by a committee composed of students, representatives of the Buildings and Grounds department, members of the music department and others. Once this committee approved the design, the proposal was considered by the Buildings and Grounds Committee of the Board of Trustees. The final vote remains with the entire Board.

The Board of Trustees will not authorize the building until the College obtains the funds needed for its completion, including money for maintenance. Construction costs for the Chapin addition are estimated at two million dollars with one million in endowment required for upkeep.

"The money will have to come from alumni donations," Shainman said. "The donations will have to be specifically earmarked for the music building project," he added.

The architects have just completed the "research and development" stage in their plans. What exists on paper are specifications, which are drawings of the general spaces. Although the design of the structure has already been approved, the architects need the final approval of the trustees before they draft working drawings which contain the technical details needed for actual construction.

The final phase, reconstruction of Chapin's main floor, remains in the early planning stages. The three-phase project will cost 4.5 million.

An artist's rendition of Chapin Hall as it will appear after completion of all renovations. The first phase, modification in the basement, will be finished by Thanksgiving.

'Sort of'

The faculty's wishy-washy decision "sort of" closing student-faculty committee meetings does little more than create headaches for committee chairmen. The faculty has dropped the question of whether committee meetings should be open back in the laps of the committees, from which the Steering Committee grabbed it early last month.

The faculty resolution states in part that "each committee may at its discretion, vote to open up individual meetings to students and faculty who are not members of that committee." The problem with this is one of logistics. At what point is the committee to decide that its next meeting will be open? Will members be allowed to present their reasons for wanting the meeting open to the committee? Will the committee's decision be presented as just a vote or as a statement on why it is not in the College's interest that that meeting be open?

The faculty failed to produce a statement, and we believe that most committees will be hard pressed to do so. The fact is that, although committee activities are being much more effectively reported this year in the College Council and campus media, this news is going through too many layers before it reaches students and faculty.

The faculty's resolution creates problems for committee chairmen by giving them the touchy task of interpreting and attempting to justify it. But the resolution is even more of a challenge to students, faculty and the campus media. The Record, WCFM and College Council representatives are challenged to do a more thorough job of reporting on committee activities so that students and faculty will know when committees are discussing issues that should not be hidden behind closed doors. Additionally, students and faculty are challenged to fight for what should be theirs by right—the right to see their representatives at work and hold them accountable for the positions they propound.

Committee meetings over the next few weeks will determine the response.

Ode to Pratt Field

Back in 1904, even though the game was played on a Wednesday afternoon and the only safe way to get to Amherst was a two hour train ride over the mountain, there still wasn't any acceptable excuse for not making it to Pratt Field according to the editors of the Record.

"Is it nothing to you," they demanded of their schoolmates, "that the Amherst eleven will have every encouragement which cheering and singing can afford, and that our eleven must have the same if we are to win?"

Their logic seemed incontrovertible. Team records didn't really matter in those days. National polls had yet to be born and newspaper editors somehow found things other than statistics to fill their sports pages. A team's success was measured in terms of one game—Amherst—and be it home or away it was every Ephman's moral duty to attend.

Williams president Mark Hopkins realized all this and was instrumental in setting up the contest, the first Williams-Amherst clash since 1901. He even went so far as to try to persuade the faculty to postpone all recitations after 10:30 the Wednesday morning of the game. The faculty balked—this was 1904, after all—but over 350 loyal Williams men, many of them using up the last of their allotted class cuts, still shelled out $1.96 and filled six cars of the 11:30 A.M. special to Amherst, destination Pratt Field.

"It is indispensable," wrote the editors in their best pre-Hunter Thompson style, "that such a large crowd of men 'heel' the team that all the advantages which naturally acrue to a team playing on its home grounds may be discounted by the volume of the Williams cheers."

Williams tried its best, the Record relates, but alas, lost by a 22-6 count. Yet the tradition established by those roadtripping Ephs still lives on today, seventy-two Novembers later. For over the years afternoons at Pratt Field have become as much a part of the Williams experience as nights at the Log, haircuts at St. Pierre's, the Mixer on the Green, and English 101 papers.

Part of the reason, I guess, has to do with the fact that these afternoons only come around twice in our four years here. It's hard to believe that the sophomore and freshman classes have never been to Pratt Field. Part of it is because Homecoming now seems two weekends long, with Wesleyan only serving as a tune-up. A lot of it has to do with the sheer fun of road-tripping to Pratt, of trying to find a package store in a strange town, and, of course, pusing on the Amherst frats in their futile efforts to be macho. Some of it has to do with the seating arrangements, where alums are healthily and haphazardly mixed with students in a first come, first seat basis. And much of it has to do with the proximity of Mt. Holyoke and Smith, always good for parties both Friday and Saturday nights.

But most of all it's all of these things and one more—a last opportunity to say well done to the fall teams and their graduating seniors. And what better way to bow out than with a victory over Amherst and a Little Three title. For if you haven't noticed already, victories in soccer and football tomorrow will give Williams a clean sweep of the fall crowns. When's the last time that's happened?

So put aside that history paper, catch up on that econ reading later, and high tail your derriere down to Pratt Field tomorrow. Go see Grossman, Lanier, Hield, Zeller, Roper, Smith, Powell and the rest of the seniors on soccer team who went 10-0 as freshmen end their careers with Williams' first Little Three title in five years.

And then venture over to Pratt Field and help Wallace, Redden, Creahan, Spaulding, Carrier, Dunzo and the rest show that while they may not be the most successful Williams team in the past five years they may have more desire and determination than all the rest.

Don't worry about tickets—the last time I was there they didn't even collect them. Just think about what one of those Record editors wrote back in 1904: "Can you conceive of any reason save physical disability or an absolute inability to secure the funds needed which you, as a man, can present squarely and honestly to yourself and to your fellows as justification for not attending (Saturday's) game?"

Spring Street draws business

Ann McCabe and Jane Adams

The consensus of store owners is that Spring Street is the only location in town. Most find the economy on Spring Street as booming as anywhere else and competition lacking. It not only exemplifies the town—it is the town.

While Spring Street is the life support system of Williamstown, it would be only fair to say Williams is accountable for Spring Street's prosperity. More than half of the establishments depend upon the college and its activities year-round.

The News Room, like most of Spring Street, has been in existence since the turn of the century. The afternoon salesman concluded that their location "is better than the other side of the street" due to traffic counts he conducted, and therefore, business is better. The News Room is on college property. The College owns all property on the east side of the street except for the block housing King's and the Nickelodeon. Lasell Gym replaced stores when it was originally built and future expansion could absorb others in the proximity.

Joe Drummond '58, who recently moved his dry cleaners, is not worried about possible expulsion as he has heard threats of Lasell expanding for "twenty-five years." Drummond classifies Spring Street as "the best location in town." Since he moved off the street to the back of King's "business has improved." He attributes this to easier accessibility and parking. Williams students also receive a 10 per cent discount. Drummond is "quite happy" with the location economically; he has also expanded into Bennington and Hoosac Falls.

Four other alumni found Spring Street so alluring that they have stayed. Harry Sheehy has managed Discoveries for the past three years. Spring Street is a good location according to Sheehy because "you have to be where college kids can walk." Most of his business is with students; he offers "all types of music" and is pondering selling art supplies. Though he remains open year-round, his summer business is poor.

Ralph Renzi '43 and Joseph Dewey '52 run the two bookstores. Lawrence Urbano '45 has located his Attorney office on lower Spring Street.

Clothing stores change hands frequently. Country Casuals (next door to Discoveries) took the place of another store in August of '75. The proprietor says that "business-wise the other store doesn't hurt us." She believes one "needs variety." The other store, Penny's Place, also caters strictly to women. The owner finds business slow in the summer. Students "don't buy much except in the spring they come with their fall wardrobe." Her cleintele consists mainly of professors and townspeople.

Burt Marcus assumed proprietorship of Co-op's the year women were admitted to Williams. Quite satisfied with business, Marcus says the "Williams Co-op has no competition." What about Goff's? "We were here first. We have our customers and they have theirs." The Co-op (1901) caters to students.

The salesman at Goff's feels "there's definitely competition" as stocks overlap. He believes "location-wise we've got it." Goff's does its best business in the winter, like the Co-op. Both stores find summer trade consists mainly of tourists buying Williams t-shirts and tennis equipment.

The House of Walsh came to town about 1930. Like other stores, the women's department has expanded considerably in the past few years. The House does more out of town business yet 70 per cent of the total is "a direct result of Williams," according to the proprietor. He feels "we're really not in competition with other stores except Talbots and Carol Reed."

The Clip Shop exudes an avant-garde air for Williamstown. Business has thrived so that there are now six operators and two apprentices and two other stores in Pittsfield and Bennington. Compared to St. Pierre's, mostly male customers, the Clip Shop has an equal number of male and female customers. One of the owners said, "There is no competition—different clientele." Contrary to the general rule of Spring Street, business is best in the summer with tourists and special activities at the college.

Constantine has recently expanded his already booming business. Besides the two pizza houses on Spring Street he now owns five others in a 15 store chain. Constantine justifies the recent price hike saying, "For good food you charge more. Anyone who says he can have cheap prices and good food is a liar." Explaining why he purchased the other store, Constantine said, "my place used to be packed. Now we can keep the customers happy with two locations." Diau's Deli hopes to give C & E Pizza a run for quality and atmosphere.

Bette of Bette's Coffee Shop also considers the street "the best location." Most of her trade is with tourists and townspeople.

The First Agricultural National Bank is scheduled to open soon, taking the place of Ken's Market. The bank could pose some competition for the Williamstown National Bank which does a large business in student checking accounts especially if it offers better hours.

The Gallery, a small showcase of art prints and jewelry, opened this summer. Owner Helen Davis said she feels location would not affect the amount of business she does as her clientele are more discriminating. She also feels merchants on Spring Street need to "add some style" to the street's facade.

NEWS BRIEFS

The J. Geils Band concert last Friday lost approximately $5940, which was about $400-500 more than anticipated, according to ACEC Chairman Jim Bowe. Most of the unexpected loss was due to increases in security requested by Security Director Walter O'Brien, said Bowe. Four Williamstown Police officers, including a sergeant, were hired at overtime rates, in addition to 14 College security personnel, he said. Bowe estimated that this raised security costs from about $200 to $600.

He praised the work of student monitors at the concert, at which no damage was done to Chapin except one broken chair. He described the report of College Security as "completely positive."

Security considers student escorts

by Jane Adams

The possibility of a "student monitor" service, working in conjunction with security to provide walking escorts for students at night, is currently under consideration, according to Walter O'Brien, director of security.

Dean Peter Berek has asked O'Brien to implement students as escorts to shift the load from security while providing a faster, more efficient service. Security presently offers 24-hour escort service, but Berek stressed that "students should understand that security can't guarantee immediate pick-up and delivery." He added that "students should feel free to call security at anytime if they have any apprehensions."

The proposed student monitor system would employ a few paid students—male or female—who would be on call to accompany students. The students would also fulfill some of the other responsibilities security has allocated to students such as answering the switch board. O'Brien and Berek said they plan to meet next week to discuss the plan further.

Berek sees a direct correlation between the rise in student awareness about safety and the death of Rocky Krizack along with the various rape rumors. "I'm pleased that students are having a sensible concern for personal safety. I don't think there is very much more reason to be worried in Williamstown than there has been in the past 5 or 10 years."

Student concern for safety has not been translated into calls for security which presently average 2 or 3 for escorts an evening. O'Brien attributes the low incidence of calls to "the prevailing buddy system. Male students are very much aware of and concerned for the safety of women at Williams. This was more or less established when women came to Williams.

Berek said he is wary of a publicity drive to acquaint students with either the current service or the proposed student monitors. "I don't think students should be alarmed. I wouldn't want to frighten them." He said he feels that security information contained in a rape pamphlet currently being prepared by a group of students working with Associate Dean Nancy McIntire will sufficiently cover publicity.

asserting both their firm commitment to a residential house system and their opposition to fraternities on or near the Williams campus." He stated, "a gesture from the faculty is appropriate."

Committee on Appointments and Promotions member John F. Reichert presented a plan to extend the length of a second contract given to an assistant professor from three years to four years, allowing a faculty member with this rank to teach here seven years rather than six. Tenure decisions would be made in the sixth year rather than the fifth.

Calendar and Schedule Committee Chairman Paul Clark reported that a calendar for next year would be ready for the next faculty meeting. Committee on Educational Policy chairman George L. Goethals reported that the group was preparing motions concerning double majors and registration procedures for a fifth course.

Women's volleyball suffers two defeats

Williams women's volleyball suffered two defeats last Friday at a tri-meet with Connecticut College and Smith at Northampton.

Williams went the full three games with Connecticut, losing to them 6-15, 15-10, 13-15. Both sides played fine volleyball—spiking, serving and setting were all done with precision. The Connecticut squad was consistent however whereas Williams seemed to lose their momentum in the final game; they had been leading 11-0 at one point.

It was an exhausted, demoralized Williams team that faced Smith immediately following the Connecticut match. They were defeated in two games, 15-5, 15-12.

"They are still playing much too defensively," explained Coach Susan Hudson, "They have yet to learn to work together to produce a strong offensive unit."

The Council also overwhelmingly approved an allocation of $325 to the Student Art Gallery. The one issue discussed in this consideration involved the relatively high cost of publicity for the Gallery.

The Newman Association requested and received $800 in a unanimous vote. The group was credited with being the most thorough in detailing their budget before the Finance Committee.

Amherst's playing field is also of some concern; its splotchiness could disrupt the Ephs' fine-tuned passing game. "It's slippery on top and hard on the bottom," says Vennell. "It's butter on ice," says English major Paul Gismondi, the team's manager. Look for Williams to control it in any case.

Ode to Pratt Field

Back in 1904, even though the game was played on a Wednesday afternoon and the only safe way to get to Amherst was a two hour train ride over the mountain, there still wasn't any acceptable excuse for not making it to Pratt Field according to the editors of the Record.

"Is it nothing to you," they demanded of their schoolmates, "that the Amherst eleven will have every encouragement which cheering and singing can afford, and that our eleven must have the same if we are to win?"

Their logic seemed incontrovertible. Team records didn't really matter in those days. National polls had yet to be born and newspaper editors somehow found things other than statistics to fill their sports pages. A team's success was measured in terms of one game—Amherst—and be it home or away it was every Ephman's moral duty to attend.

Williams president Mark Hopkins realized all this and was instrumental in setting up the contest, the first Williams-Amherst clash since 1901. He even went so far as to try to persuade the faculty to postpone all recitations after 10:30 the Wednesday morning of the game. The faculty balked—this was 1904, after all—but over 350 loyal Williams men, many of them using up the last of their allotted class cuts, still shelled out $1.96 and filled six cars of the 11:30 A.M. special to Amherst, destination Pratt Field.

"It is indispensable," wrote the editors in their best pre-Hunter Thompson style, "that such a large crowd of men 'heel' the team that all the advantages which naturally acrue to a team playing on its home grounds may be discounted by the volume of the Williams cheers."

Williams tried its best, the Record relates, but alas, lost by a 22-6 count. Yet the tradition established by those roadtripping Ephs still lives on today, seventy-two Novembers later. For over the years afternoons at Pratt Field have become as much a part of the Williams experience as nights at the Log, haircuts at St. Pierre's, the Mixer on the Green, and English 101 papers.

Part of the reason, I guess, has to do with the fact that these afternoons only come around twice in our four years here. It's hard to believe that the sophomore and freshman classes have never been to Pratt Field. Part of it is because Homecoming now seems two weekends long, with Wesleyan only serving as a tune-up. A lot of it has to do with the sheer fun of road-tripping to Pratt, of trying to find a package store in a strange town, and, of course, pusing on the Amherst frats in their futile efforts to be macho. Some of it has to do with the seating arrangements, where alums are healthily and haphazardly mixed with students in a first come, first seat basis. And much of it has to do with the proximity of Mt. Holyoke and Smith, always good for parties both Friday and Saturday nights.

But most of all it's all of these things and one more—a last opportunity to say well done to the fall teams and their graduating seniors. And what better way to bow out than with a victory over Amherst and a Little Three title. For if you haven't noticed already, victories in soccer and football tomorrow will give Williams a clean sweep of the fall crowns. When's the last time that's happened?

So put aside that history paper, catch up on that econ reading later, and high tail your derriere down to Pratt Field tomorrow. Go see Grossman, Lanier, Hield, Zeller, Roper, Smith, Powell and the rest of the seniors on soccer team who went 10-0 as freshmen end their careers with Williams' first Little Three title in five years.

And then venture over to Pratt Field and help Wallace, Redden, Creahan, Spaulding, Carrier, Dunzo and the rest show that while they may not be the most successful Williams team in the past five years they may have more desire and determination than all the rest.

Don't worry about tickets—the last time I was there they didn't even collect them. Just think about what one of those Record editors wrote back in 1904: "Can you conceive of any reason save physical disability or an absolute inability to secure the funds needed which you, as a man, can present squarely and honestly to yourself and to your fellows as justification for not attending (Saturday's) game?"

Spring Street draws business

Ann McCabe and Jane Adams

The consensus of store owners is that Spring Street is the only location in town. Most find the economy on Spring Street as booming as anywhere else and competition lacking. It not only exemplifies the town—it is the town.

While Spring Street is the life support system of Williamstown, it would be only fair to say Williams is accountable for Spring Street's prosperity. More than half of the establishments depend upon the college and its activities year-round.

The News Room, like most of Spring Street, has been in existence since the turn of the century. The afternoon salesman concluded that their location "is better than the other side of the street" due to traffic counts he conducted, and therefore, business is better. The News Room is on college property. The College owns all property on the east side of the street except for the block housing King's and the Nickelodeon. Lasell Gym replaced stores when it was originally built and future expansion could absorb others in the proximity.

Joe Drummond '58, who recently moved his dry cleaners, is not worried about possible expulsion as he has heard threats of Lasell expanding for "twenty-five years." Drummond classifies Spring Street as "the best location in town." Since he moved off the street to the back of King's "business has improved." He attributes this to easier accessibility and parking. Williams students also receive a 10 per cent discount. Drummond is "quite happy" with the location economically; he has also expanded into Bennington and Hoosac Falls.

Four other alumni found Spring Street so alluring that they have stayed. Harry Sheehy has managed Discoveries for the past three years. Spring Street is a good location according to Sheehy because "you have to be where college kids can walk." Most of his business is with students; he offers "all types of music" and is pondering selling art supplies. Though he remains open year-round, his summer business is poor.

Ralph Renzi '43 and Joseph Dewey '52 run the two bookstores. Lawrence Urbano '45 has located his Attorney office on lower Spring Street.

Clothing stores change hands frequently. Country Casuals (next door to Discoveries) took the place of another store in August of '75. The proprietor says that "business-wise the other store doesn't hurt us." She believes one "needs variety." The other store, Penny's Place, also caters strictly to women. The owner finds business slow in the summer. Students "don't buy much except in the spring they come with their fall wardrobe." Her cleintele consists mainly of professors and townspeople.

Burt Marcus assumed proprietorship of Co-op's the year women were admitted to Williams. Quite satisfied with business, Marcus says the "Williams Co-op has no competition." What about Goff's? "We were here first. We have our customers and they have theirs." The Co-op (1901) caters to students.

The salesman at Goff's feels "there's definitely competition" as stocks overlap. He believes "location-wise we've got it." Goff's does its best business in the winter, like the Co-op. Both stores find summer trade consists mainly of tourists buying Williams t-shirts and tennis equipment.

The House of Walsh came to town about 1930. Like other stores, the women's department has expanded considerably in the past few years. The House does more out of town business yet 70 per cent of the total is "a direct result of Williams," according to the proprietor. He feels "we're really not in competition with other stores except Talbots and Carol Reed."

The Clip Shop exudes an avant-garde air for Williamstown. Business has thrived so that there are now six operators and two apprentices and two other stores in Pittsfield and Bennington. Compared to St. Pierre's mostly male customers, the Clip Shop has an equal number of male and female customers. One of the owners said, "There is no competition—different clientele." Contrary to the general rule of Spring Street, business is best in the summer with tourists and special activities at the college.

Constantine has recently expanded his already booming business. Besides the two pizza houses on Spring Street he now owns five others in a 15 store chain. Constantine justifies the recent price hike saying, "For good food you charge more. Anyone who says he can have cheap prices and good food is a liar." Explaining why he purchased the other store, Constantine said, "my place used to be packed. Now we can keep the customers happy with two locations." Diau's Deli hopes to give C & E Pizza a run for quality and atmosphere.

Bette of Bette's Coffee Shop also considers the street "the best location." Most of her trade is with tourists and townspeople.

The First Agricultural National Bank is scheduled to open soon, taking the place of Ken's Market. The bank could pose some competition for the Williamstown National Bank which does a large business in student checking accounts especially if it offers better hours.

The Gallery, a small showcase of art prints and jewelry, opened this summer. Owner Helen Davis said she feels location would not affect the amount of business she does as her clientele are more discriminating. She also feels merchants on Spring Street need to "add some style" to the street's facade.

NEWS BRIEFS

The J. Geils Band concert last Friday lost approximately $5940, which as about $400-500 more than anticipated, according to ACEC Chairman Jim owe. Most of the unexpected loss was due to increases in security requested Security Director Walter O'Brien, said Bowe. Four Williamstown Police ficers, including a sergeant, were hired at overtime rates, in addition to 14 llege security personnel, he said. Bowe estimated that this raised security sts from about $200 to $600.

He praised the work of student monitors at the concert, at which no mage was done to Chapin except one broken chair. He described the port of College Security as "completely positive."

The football game and parties or the paper and exams?—the eternally undecided Williams Student

Thursday, November 5, is a warm and pleasant day and a lot of people unofficially start their weekend blast. I go to my class instead. Some people cut classes. The professor asks if there are any questions on the reading matter. No one answers. He thinks maybe we should rearrange our chairs in a circle and discuss the readings. He doesn't realize that the majority of the people have not read the book. Anyway, no one talks during the discussion, except the professor. He is puzzled. He doesn't realize this is the big weekend. When will professors ever learn about student priorities?

It is lunch time Friday morning. A friend joins me at the table as I slurp some lukewarm soup.

"Hi, how is it going?" I ask.

"Too much work. It's unfair," he protests, as if I were Dean Berek or someone.

"Sure, I know what you mean," I say and try to cheer him up.

"There is no way I'm going to work, though," he says with a determined set of the jaw. Man, he's opposing the dictates of the Establishment. "Plus, my girl friend is here. And even though I have three papers, hell, I have to give her a grand treat, don't I?" he grins.

"Definitely," I assure him. "I mean, if my girl friend were here, I'd do the same too. In fact, even though end of ephemeral euphoria

Grinds always have answers to everything. At least they think they have, and that is what messes up this world. But I say, "Listen, that is one reason why you should go to the game. To prove your own hypothesis to be correct."

"Yeah, maybe I should," he says, but by the way he shuffles towards the library, I know he will not go the game tomorrow.

I go to Baxter Hall. Last day of the painting sale. I never did get into paintings. I find them bizzare, especially Picasso. A guy I think I know is browsing around. He is clutching a bottle of red wine in one hand and an oh-so-gorgeous-gal in the other. Even though I don't really know him, I say "hi" to him. Hell, I wanna know the gal, not him. So we make small talk.

He tells me he is going to go to the concert tonight. The J. Geils thing at Chapin. First, they'll drink some wine. And then they will head for the concert. Wouldn't it be better if they sipped wine in his dimly lighted room, listened to Bach or Mozart and whispered sweet nothings into each others ears, I suggest.

"That would be nice, but Sheila here came all the way from Smith. She really digs J. Geils," he says, regretfully, I think. "Plus, we are not involved, you know . . ." he adds even more ruefully. "Oh, Smithy, huh?" I say trying to ingratiate myself with her.

"What did you say?" demands the gal aggressively. Bitchy, bitchy. An explosive element, is how she may be described.

"Watch it," puts in her beau.

"Hold it folks," I say quickly. "No offense meant. You know, Smithy is just like Skiddy. Imparts intimacy and familiarity. And I'll tell you something else. Smith is much better than Skidmore. I've made trips to Smith three times. Only once to Skidmore." I finish. I hope the "faux pas" has been remedied. They depart with a sullen goodbye.

Saturday. Great day. Bad brunch. Lots of new faces, and some ancient faces. Class of '75, that is. They all try to look mature, like people who have overcome the ordeals of the cruel world. They shake your hand lamely and talk to you paternalistically and say goodbye condescendingly. "I've seen it all," is what they are trying to say.

Even though the sign at Weston field says "No food or beverages allowed", somehow everyone seems to be drunk. Must have smuggled booze in through those huge down jackets. And we whip Wesleyan. Only natural. 37 to 7. Somebody shouts, "We're number 1!" We sure as hell are. The fans are wild. A motley crowd tears the goal post apart thirty seconds before the game ends. There is a flush of victory on everyone's cheeks. Could it be the implacable weather, though? Maybe both. As I walk out of the field, some guy again shouts, "We're number one!" With a score like that, even a corrupt referee has to agree.

Saturday nite. Parties, dances and fun. I'm determined not to fall asleep. So I call up some friends.

"Hello, I'd like to speak to Jill."

"Just a minute." Long pause. Too long, in fact.

"Hello" comes tentatively from the other side.

"Jill, this is me. I was wondering . . ."

"Who? Oh, Raj."

"Right. Anyway, I was wondering if you wanted to come to a party with me. That is if you aren't doing anything else."

"I'd really love to, but I just have too much work. Maybe some other time." Click.

God! What is wrong with these women anyway? Studying on this grand weekend. Jesus gals! This is Saturday nite of the big weekend. Sweetheart, you have your priorities screwed up. Well, another try.

"Hello, may I speak to Sally please?"

"Speaking." A business-like tone.

"Hey, Sally, remember me? . . ."

"No I don't." Assured.

I hang up. Damn! Any woman who has the guts to say "I don't" even before you can explain who you are has to be messed up in life. Baby, kiss your life goodbye. You just missed a grand evening with a dashing chap. I try another shot. Final one. This woman is no casual acquaintance. I know her pretty well. Met her on the bus as I was returning from the Big Apple.

"Hello, Mary? Guess who?"

"Don't have the faintest idea." Jesus H. Christ!

"Uh, well, I met you on the bus. Coming back from New York, remember?"

"Yeah, yeah, sure. I think I do."

"Good. Listen, if you aren't too busy, how would you like to come to a party with me? Open bar, live band and all that?"

"Gee, I wish I could, but . . ."

"Is it someone else?"

"I don't understand you." Click.

So it is someone else. So what? I'm determined to freak out tonite. And lack of a partner is not going to stop me. I desss up and go to one of the parties. The music is good. The drinks are good. The dancing is good. I'm dancing with some gal I've never seen before. I don't know how I ended up dancing with her, but after two screwdrivers, one whiskey sour and a glass of beer, you don't remember such insignificant details.

Somewhere in the distance the clock strikes one, or is it two? The dancers are weary. The band is missing the beat. The bar is empty. And I am telling this gal that she's intense, sensuous and absolutely gorgeous. I also ask her what is a pretty gal like her doing at a crummy party like this. She is disgusted and tells me to go to hell. I do that. I go to my room and get a good sleep.

Sunday evening at five o'clock it's all far away. The unfamiliar faces disappear among bundles and suitcases. There are kisses, hugs, and promises to see each other during Thanksgiving or Christmas, or maybe same time next year.

The local folks are sober now. At least they try to act sober. The euphoria is over. People regain their serious demeanour. Books and papers postponed have to be completed. Maybe some guy will get an extension. On grounds of having lost his senses during the weekend. One more glorious homecoming is over. The library is full, the campus subdued.

Exhibit features Kindersley lithographs

Alphabets as Art Forms

by Charles Janson

You must enter through the old swinging oak doors, move past the shadowed bust of Abraham Lincoln, and stroll leisurely up the marble stairs to the second floor at the end of Stetson Hall. Here, unknown to many, is the Chapin Library of Rare Books, the finest undergraduate collection of its kind, and through December 15 the scene for an unusual exhibition entitled, "The Alphabet Through The Ages."

On view are an intriguing variety of examples of the systems and series of symbols that have come to represent our written language. A broad history of the development of the alphabet is presented with unique items of the past such as heiroglyphics on mummy wrappings, important examples of early script and printed books, ending with modern works, including a study by David Parsley for the slate name plate outside the library. The main feature of the show, organized by librarian Richard Archer and assistant librarian Wayne Hammond, is, however, a stunning series of lithographs of freely drawn alphabets by David Kindersley of Cambridge, England.

The main exhibition room of the Chapin Library with its high arched ceiling, corninthian columns, and pink marble floors, is a suitably grand setting for the show. Entering the room often brings surprise to the unacquainted, as it takes one to a Williams typical of the 1920's. A large, bright Finnish print on fabric, hangs below the main windows. Kindersley's alphabets are along the walls and are bold examples of modern, creative work, showing that alphabets, in fact, are not just alphabets, but also forms that allow eyecatching, artistic expression.

The entire show has been assembled from the holdings of the Chapin Library, and reflects the diversity of Alfred Clark Chapin's (Class of 1869) original gift of 9,000 books, manuscripts and prints to Williams in 1923 which has grown to a fine and priceless collection of nearly 20,000 items. The Kindersley series, a comparatively recent purchase, is an example of Archer's own efforts to have the library grow in quality in the area of graphic arts.

The first exhibition case takes the viewer from a palm sized clay tablet from ancient Mesopotamia, which records in cuneiform a list of sheep and goats presented as a religious offering, to a fifteenth century volume of travels in the holy land. The latter is the earliest known attempt to capture in illustration foreign lands and people at the moment of seeing. Small woodcuts illustrate natives of the holy land eating and conversing, accompanied by woodcuts reproducing various alphabets.

Alongside are examples of the earliest hand-set types—a leaf of The Book of Luke from the 42 line Guttenberg Bible, the first complete book printed by the inventor of moveable type. Nearby is the first volume of the Biblia Polygotia, a massive six volume multilingual bible in Greek, Latin, Hebrew, and Chaldee, 1502-22. The uniqueness of such a monumental work is only compounded by the beautiful layout of its text and the various alphabets.

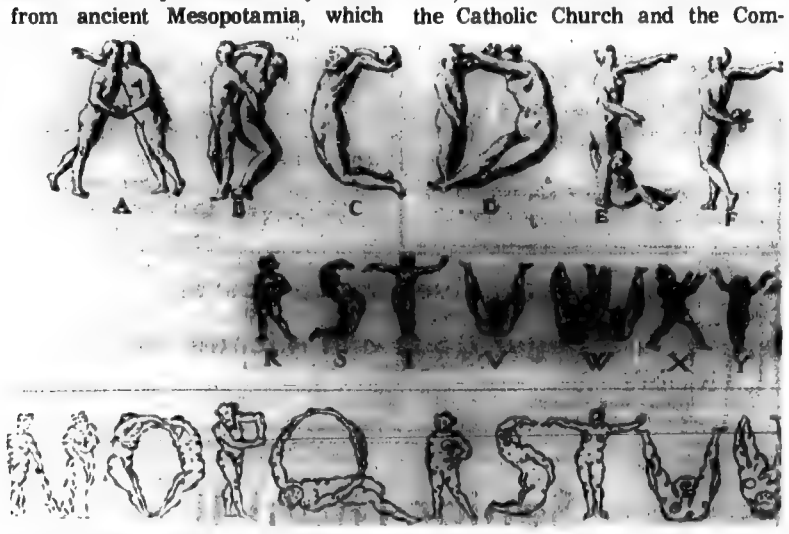
In another case, sixteenth century manuals containing alphabet designs are placed side by side. The fluid and cursive Italian letters of Luca Paccioli seem quite different from Albrecht Durer's narrow and more severe German forms. A 1947 facsimile translation of Verni's Luminario on the Construction of Roman Capitals, reveals the ties of present day calligraphers and type-designers to such early and important works.

David Kindersley's alphabets without a doubt, however, steal the show. Designed and executed over a period of two years, the fifteen prints are part of a freely drawn alphabet series with letters adapted from historic examples of type.

David Kindersley's Workshop is located in a medieval house in Cambridge, England, and is dedicated to the principle of, "The Craftsman's release of life force in true cooperative work." Examples of his own and of his assistants' lettering in stone, glass, fiberglas, and for film titles, are found throughout the world.

Often called the finest letterer and engraver in the British Isles, Kindersley is a large, deep voiced, and humorous artist, who freely acknowledges his debt to his instructor, Eric Gill. He is also quick to thank his father for never discovering that Gill, a fine craftsman who dedicated his work, "To the Glory of God," was also a devout member of the Catholic Church and the Communist Party.

All of Kindersley's alphabets on view are unique. His English Alphabet, with letters outlined in black, filled with gold leaf, and presented atop a mottled green background is but one example. Nearby, an op-art alphabet promises to blur the vision, with its concentric black lines on a pink background.



Kindersley's technique is unusual. First he draws his letters on the paper surface, and then adds background color with lithographic processes. Variations in background textures are infinite, from spatters of purple and red in the classic alphabet, to a royal purple background for arabic numerals. In other prints placing letters beside one another is most important. The strikingly eastern Reed Alphabet has long verticals that overlap and exotically intertwine.

"The alphabet through the ages," is a show that should not be missed. It offers an escape from the blurring monotony of college texts, and promises to impress and educate the viewer in aspects of the basic form of human communication.

And moreover, where else will one ever find examples of the human body as alphabet, in distorted, acrobatic positions, that are funny, unbelieveable, and in some cases obscene, or pages showing 96 examples of the letter "A" spanning from the tenth century B.C. to German type designs of the 1940's?

'Music' plays Beethoven, Messaien

by Valerie A. Sarantos

Music in the Round, the chamber music series at Williams College founded and directed by Julius Hegyi, will give its third concert of the year tonight, at 8:30 P.M. in Thompson Memorial Chapel. The program consists of a Beethoven Serenade, and two twentieth-century works: Kirchner's Trio, for violin, cello, and piano, and Messaien's Quartet for the End of Time for clarinet, violin, cello, and piano. Williams students are admitted free.

The Williams trio will perform the Beethoven and Kirchner works, with Julius Hegyi on violin, Douglas Moore on cello, and Stephen Dankner, piano. Completing the list of performers, the Messaien piece will include Susan St. Amour on viola, Charlotte Hegyi, piano, and, making her Music in the Round debut, Susan Hohenberg on clarinet.

The traditional Beethoven Serenade Opus 8 is a "polite" work which is so light it sounds as though it should be played by a guitar. On a more contemporary note, American composer Leon Kirchner wrote his two-movement Trio twenty-two years ago. Besides winning various prizes and awards, fellowships and grants, Kirchner's music has been critically acclaimed as being "a rare combination of sensitivity and strength."

In Julius Hegyi's words, the Messaien Quartet for the End of Time is a "monument to chamber music of the 20th century." Messaien, a frenchman born in 1908, was captured by the Germans in 1939 and held prisoner in Stalag VII-A at Gorlitz. During that time he composed the quartet for the instruments immediately available, and gave the first performance with three of his compatriots in the prison camp on January 15, 1941.

'Hay Fever' staged

Cap and Bells cordially invites the Williams College community to catch Hay Fever, by Noel Coward, directed by Michael Knight, '77. This biting comedy, concerning a chaotic weekend for four guests at the country estate of a celebrated actress and her rather disorganized family, will be presented for the edification and enjoyment of the campus on the 15, 16, 17 and 18 of November at eight p.m. in Dodd House living room. As there is limited seating, tickets will be distributed on a first-come, first-serve basis one hour before the performance.

Markart, von Stuck drawings highlight Clark exhibition

A loan exhibition of nineteen German and Austrian drawings has recently been placed on view in Gallery D at the Clark Art Institute. The current exhibition ranges over a four-hundred year period, with the earliest drawing an anonymous representation of a knight wearing a ducal headpiece dating from the second decade of the sixteenth century. The latest is a brown chalk portrait of the actor Emil Jannings (1884-1950), who was the co-star with Marlene Dietrich in the legendary 1930 film, The Blue Angel. The sketch, by Rudolf Grossmann (1882-1941), was executed sometime in the nineteen-thirties when Jannings was the most famous actor in the German cinema.

Other drawings are by members of the Nazarene group, a school of early nineteenth-century artists brought together by a common desire to revive German Christian art. The Nazarenes are not well represented in American museums, although their influence on French and English art was important. Johann Overbeck (1789-1869) dominates this group with a powerful pencil drawing for the upper half of a famous picture executed for the Basilica of St. Francis in Assisi. The rarely seen Hans Makart (1840-1884) and Franz von Stuck (1863-1928) are also represented in the exhibition. Egon Schiele's portrait of Dr. Ernst Wagner is a fine example of his beautiful late drawing technique.

Concert to perform Mozart, Mendelssohn, Schumann

Griffin Hall Concerts will present soprano Judith Reichert and baritone Daniel O'Connor with pianist Victor Hill tomorrow evening at 8 p.m.

The first half of the program will be devoted to vocal duets of the Romantic period, including three works of Mendelssohn, five of Schumann, and one each of Saint-Saens and Faure. The second half consists of four songs of Mozart, and solo and duet excerpts from "Don Giovanni," "The Marriage of Figaro," and "The Magic Flute." All selections will be performed in the original German, French, or Italian, but the artists will give brief, informal snyopses of the texts.

Judith Reichert graduated from Smith College and has studied voice with Dorothy Stahl and Judith Raskin.

Daniel O'Connor, professor of philosophy at Williams, studied singing in Germany with Otto Gogl and Herma Kramm.

Victor Hill, associate professor of mathematics at Williams and organist-choirmaster of St. John's Episcopal Church, has been active as a vocal coach and accompanist for twenty years, including work at the Universities of Wisconsin and Oregon, Carnegie-Mellon, and Union Seminary in New York.

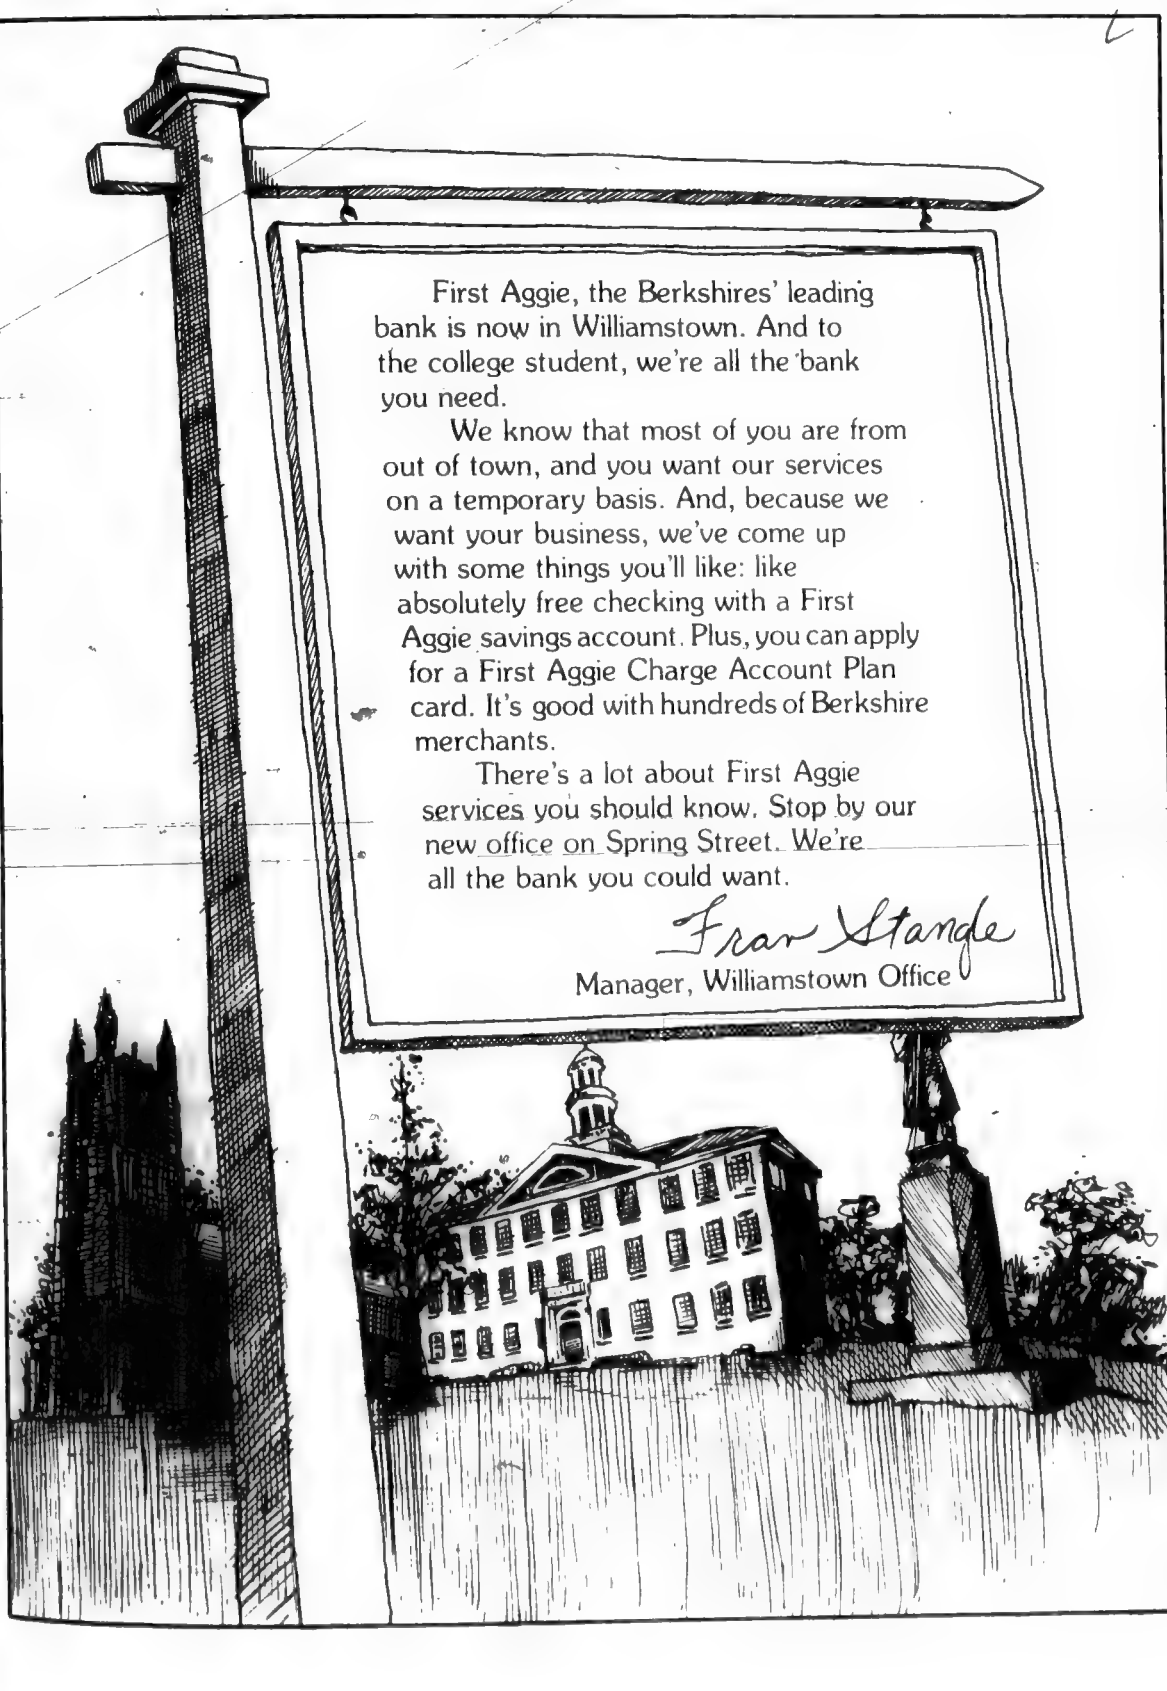
Security cons

by Jane Adams



The possibility of a "student monitor" service, working in conjunction with security to provide walking escorts for students at night, is currently under consideration, according to Walter O'Brien, director of security.

Dean Peter Berek has asked O'Brien to implement students as escorts to shift the load from security while providing a faster, more efficient service. Security presently offers 24-hour escort service but Berek stressed that "students should understand that security can't guarantee immediate pick-up and delivery." He added that "students should feel free to call security at anytime if they have any apprehensions."

The proposed student monitor system would employ a few paid students—male or female—who would be on call to accompany students. The students would also fulfill some of the other responsibilities security has allocated to students such as answering the switch board. O'Brien and Berek said they plan to meet next week to discuss the plan further.

Berek sees a direct correlation between the rise in student awareness about safety and the death of Rocky Krizack along with the various rape rumors. "I'm pleased that students are having a sensible concern for personal safety. I don't think there is very much more reason to be worried in Williamstown than there has been in the past 5 or 10 years."

Student concern for safety has not been translated into calls for security which presently average 2 or 3 for escorts an evening. O'Brien attributes the low incidence of calls to "the

Ephs set for stumbling Jeffs

by Tim Layden

"Third-place in the Little Three not an unrealistic possibility . . ."

Jeff Klein in the Amherst Student in a pre-season football prospectus.

Only one big problem with the above quote. The astute Mr. Klein was not talking about his beloved Lord Jeffs, but rather about Williams. Injuries would surely combine with fate to put the Ephs in their proper place, assured the Lord Jeff prognosticator.

Well, since the initial printing of the above prediction, Amherst has rolled to five losses in seven games, lost two quarterbacks, one tailback, one defensive end, and been crushed by Wesleyan, making a win over Williams on Pratt Field Saturday imperative if the Jeffs are to avoid the Little Three cellar for the second straight year.

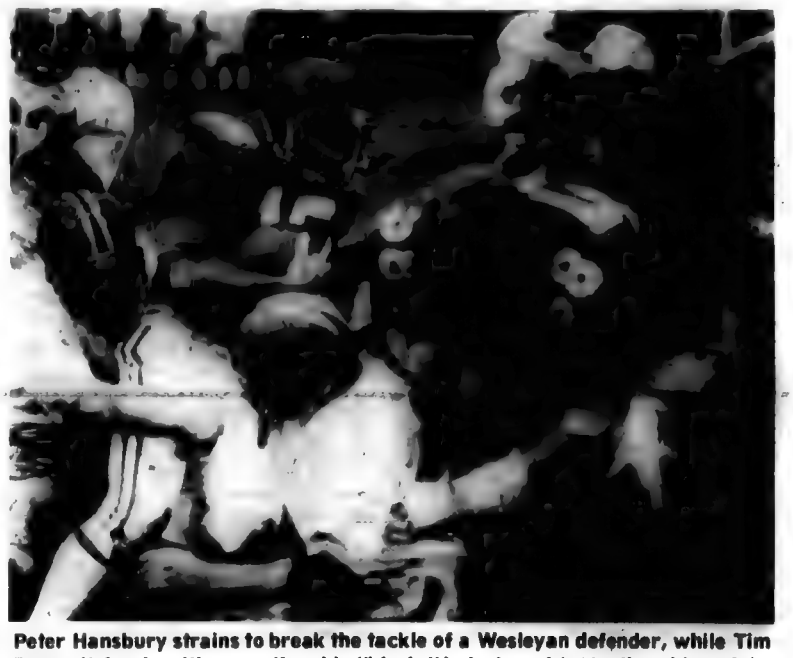
On paper, the game figures to be as lopsided as the Carter-Ford race was close, but with Amherst, you can never be sure. A win over Williams would salvage the season for Amherst and head coach Jim Ostendarp, and create a three-way tie for the Little Three championship.

1976 has not been a vintage year for the Lord Jeffs. They show wins over just two weak opponents from Maine, Bowdoin (42-7) and Bates (7-3). Amherst has lost to AIC (7-0), Springfield (22-12), Wesleyan (30-17), Tufts (18-17), and Trinity (24-17). Injuries and inconsistency have been the prime enemies for the Jeffs.

Ostendarp and Co. lost starting quarterback Mike Nueman to a shoulder separation in the first game of the season, and shortly thereafter lost backup Mark Manning, a freshman. Fellow freshman Colin Widen, a Mt. Greylock high grad, quarterbacked the Jeffs through the middle part of their slate. Manning is expected to get the nod Saturday, but don't count Nueman out; the sly junior wasn't expected to play last year, either, and was in the contest early in the second quarter.

Defensively, Dave "two-ton" Comerford underwent knee surgery last week, vacating one end spot, while the rest of the Amherst defense is shaky at best. Tackle Mike Fiori is the most consistent performer on the line. The Amherst secondary, featuring veterans Bill Wallace, Sean Clancy, and Dave Schertler should enjoy hitting Herb McCormick, Ken Hollingsworth, Charlie Carrier, etc., after they make catches, 'cause they aren't going to keep anyone covered.

Amherst has not won the Little Three title outright since 1969, and Coach Ostendarp is oh-for-Odell. Three times since 1971 the Jeffs have faced Williams as a heavy favorite and twice as an underdog. The result has been the same for five consecutive years—Williams wins the game and the Little Three title.



Odell and company seem to have rounded their act into top shape just in time to make it six Little Three titles in a row, extending their own record in that area. The convincing and emotional upset of Wesleyan last weekend not only served to put Williams at an emotional high but must have the Amherst people wondering to themselves "What the hell is Odell feeding them up there?"

Nothing at all, guys, Williams has simply put pride and guts over all else. Quarterback Don Wallace, in the midst of a hot streak, leads a group of four offensive seniors into the game. Wallace, Co-captain Tom Redden, Charlie Carrier, and Tim Dunn have never lost a Little Three game in varsity competition at Williams. Look for Wallace to keep the ball in the air again Saturday, complementing the passing game with Gus Nuzzolese and Tom Redden on the ground.

Defensively, six seniors will be closing out their Williams careers. Emmett Creahan, Mike Powers, Jim Spaulding, John Dombrowski, Dave Libardi, and Todd Nelp were the keys to a Purple defense which held the team together while the "O" was still getting untracked. Look for more of the same Saturday. Rumor has it Brad called the Amherst offense earlier this week and told the Jeffs to stay in their rooms and listen to the game, it's safer there.

What it all boils down to is that Williams has Amherst outclassed this year, and the game shouldn't be close. But, of course, this is the tiny triumverate, and supposedly anything can happen. (Similar warnings in this space a year ago preceded a 25-6 embarrassment of Amherst).

Regardless, load up the cars and head down to watch the remarkable Mr. Odell and company try to wrap up number six. If it's a rout, drown in it and enjoy it, and if it's close, scream like hell, the guys on the field deserve it.

Booters seek Little 3

by Mark Pogue

Williams' red-hot Purple soccer team buses to Amherst tomorrow for a game to decide the 1976 Little Three Soccer Dominator. The Ephmen (7-3-1) must face an enigmatic Lord Jeff squad which is 1-8 on the season, yet boasts its strongest assemblage of pure booter ability in the last 10 years. "I'm scared," says Coach Vennell.

Williams' recent experience in Little Three play cannot be described as rosy. Not since 1971 have the Ephmen captured the Little Three trophy, and one must go all the way back to the turn of the decade (1970) to discover when last the cagey Jeffs lost a regular season contest to the Purple. Overall, the yellowing Soccer Chronicles give the Jeffs a 30-13 historical bulge over their northern founders.

Here it is proper to observe that anything can happen in a Little Three athletic affair, but in this event the smart money is riding confidently with Williams. Presently the Ephs are on an eight-game tear in which they've lost only to national power UConn while outscoring the opposition by 22-8. Forwards John Friborg (8 goals), Henry Osborne (6), and Jim Hield (4) have jelled into an opportunistic attack unit while co-captains Skip Grossman and John Lanier, who play their final game for Williams tomorrow, have sparked the defense to a measly 1.2 goals-against average.

Amherst, unsurprisingly, is not as bad as 1-8 looks. Five of their losses have come by one goal, and for most of the year they've played without

Athletes funded for nationals

Two recent developments have considerably brightened the chances that Williams athletes of national caliber will have the opportunity to pursue their talents in the various national collegiate championships. First, the Executive Committee of the NCAA in its August meeting set up and established guidelines for a championship travel fund which will pay 80 per cent of the travel expenses of medal winners in NCAA individual championships like skiing, wrestling and swimming.

Second, Provost Stephen R. Lewis announced that a separate category had been created in the Athletic Department budget to cover room and board for both men and women qualifying for national level competition.

In the past, College policy has been that individuals qualifying for and wishing to compete in national championships (College and conference rules prohibit team competition) had to pay their own travel costs while the College picked up the tab for most of the living expenses. This placed a real burden on Williams skiers, whose championships have been in Colorado two of the last three years, and swimmers, whose national meet has recently been held as far west as Long Beach.

Under the new NCAA system, a $100,000 surplus from the 1974-75 budget plus $700,000 generated from new football and basketball TV packages is earmarked to reimburse participants in championships that don't support themselves as Division I basketball, lacrosse or track do. Any event that draws a sufficient gate will pay the remaining 20 per cent of travel costs plus a per diem allowance from its own revenue.

What it all comes down to is that the Association has finally decided to share some of its TV wealth with minor sports and smaller colleges, and to base participation in the nationals on performance rather than ability to pay.

It's a good thing, and there's no doubt it'll be a big help to teams from schools like Williams. Under the new system ten of the 14 Eph swimmers who went to last year's nationals in Washington, Pa. (no short hop at B&G's 13c per mile College car charges) would have qualified for travel reimbursements.

Still, you can't help but feel a little uncomfortable that the payments go only to medal winners. According to NCAA controller Louis J. Spry there's no question of professionalism because reimbursements are awarded on the basis of "placing, not where you place."

As much as the NCAA would like to extend the program to all participants, Spry adds, it's too difficult to determine in advance just who's qualified for a national wrestling, fencing or gymnastics tournament. If every sport could have qualifying standards as clear cut as the cut-off times in swimming and track it would be far easier to limit the field and include everyone in the travel payment program. As of now, it's impossible.

Somehow, though, it doesn't seem quite in the tradition of the glorious amateurism of American collegiate sport extolled by Roone Arledge's boys every Saturday afternoon to be paying off the winners and sending the losers home penniless. Spry views establishment of proper entry qualifications for every sport as an important goal "someday down the road."

As far as I'm concerned, the sooner the better, not only for a bunch of pretty talented athletes but also for the oft-tarnished credibility of the NCAA.

Athletic Director Robert Peck contends that the new nationals expenses category of the College athletic budget is no change in policy at all but "a guarantee of what we've already been doing" that saves him the trouble of robbing Peter to pay Paul when Nationals roll around. The level of funding is exactly the same; the change merely simplifies procedure.

Several coaches are extremely pleased with the idea. Men's ski coach Bud Fisher calls it "fantastic—in effect it means more support for our program," Fisher explains that now he needn't worry about cutting as many corners in the regular season budget to save for the nationals. According to him, the new procedure brings Williams in line with what other area skiing schools are doing.

Fisher expects his squad will send between two and six skiers to this year's NCAA's, and that the women's team will qualify up to six for their own nationals. Add to that a dozen or so swimmers, five squash players, and maybe a couple of runners or wrestlers and you've got a pretty fair nationals representation for a dinky little school full of grinds stuck in the frozen wilds of frontier Massachusetts. Let's hope these programs encourage even wider participation.

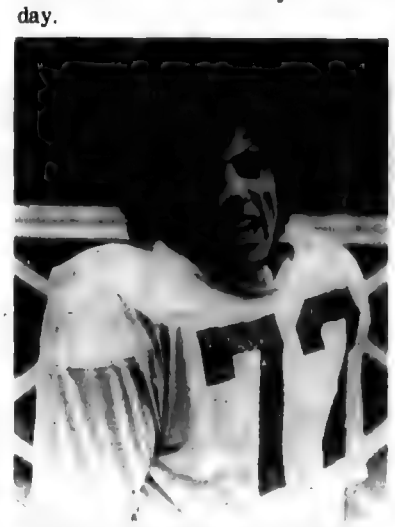
Random thoughts: You just can't know how it made a senior feel to see those Weston Field goalposts come tumbling down for the fourth year in a row. Now let's get the ones on Pratt Field . . .

A pair of Foster-Grants and a matched set of Excedrin tablets to the Wesleyan soccer goalie who stuck his eye between an Eph-initiated bullet and the Cardinal nets on Saturday morning. The talented Wesman made a slew of spectacular stops but the Purple O was much too much for his defense to handle . . .

A committee appointed by the President to look into new athletic facilities to supplement that micro-gym and sardine can swimming pool on Spring St. began meeting a week and a half ago. Committee Chairman Peck appointed Sub-committees to investigate options for a pool, a gym and related facilities. The committee should have expansion needs pretty well assessed by sometime next semester.

Wallace named Athlete of Week for Wesleyan game



Senior quarterback Don Wallace of the varsity football team has been named the Record's Athlete of the Week for his outstanding performance in the Ephs' 34-7 upset rout of Wesleyan.

Wallace, operating an offense coach Bob Odell designed specifically to fit his talents, completed 27 of 42 passes for 269 yards and 4 touchdowns. Wallace tossed two touchdown passes within 20 seconds of the third quarter when the Ephs blew the game wide open.

HONORABLE MENTION—

Charlie Carrier—Senior running back for the same varsity grid team, Carrier adjusted to his new role as a slotback-tight end Saturday by grabbing ten Wallace passes for 69 yards and a touchdown. Carrier's ten catches equalled Herb McCormick's school record, set earlier this season.

Skip Grossman—Goalie and co-captain of the varsity soccer team, Grossman is one of the prime reasons why Jeff Vennell's booters are having one of their finest seasons in years and bidding for the Little Three Crown. The senior allowed just one goal in Williams' 3-1 over Wesleyan Saturday.

Berek urges exchange cut to alleviate overcrowding

by Lisa Hartigan

Dean of the College Peter Berek will recommend to President John W. Chandler that next year's enrollment be reduced by cutting the number of exchange students attending Williams.

"We can't be as small as we would like to be next fall, but we will shrink to an 1880 and 1890 range and grow progressively smaller in successive years," said Berek.

The ideal fall enrollment is 1860 students. This year, however, there was an unexpected bulge in enrollment of about 45 students, due to an unusually low attrition rate for students invited to join the freshman class, the decision of many students planning to study elsewhere for the year to remain at Williams, and the return of many students who had taken time off.

In formulating its recommendation for reducing next year's enrollment, the Admissions Committee considered several alternatives. According to committee member Lawrence Wu '78, cutting the size of next year's freshman class, reducing the number of transfers, limiting the number of exchanges, and combinations of these alternatives were discussed. Since the bulge in size of the freshman class is considered singularly unusual, and the College wishes to retain its policy of accepting approximately twenty transfers, the committee's final recommendation to Berek was a reduction in the number of exchange students.

According to Berek, there are presently more exchange students (about 60) from other schools attending Williams than there are Williams students spending a year elsewhere (about 50).

While the Eph football team went down to defeat at Amherst last weekend many maintain that the Ephs won the competition in the stands where verbal abuse toward the Lord Jeffs reached new heights.

Student attrition levels remain fairly constant

The attrition rate at Williams College has remained relatively constant for the last few years, according to Peter Berek, Dean of the College. Last year's attrition, the number of students withdrawing minus those being readmitted, was abnormally low, and contributed to this year's crowded housing situation. In Williams' fully coeducational classes an average of 20 students have withdrawn at the end of their freshman year, 51 after sophomore year, and 23 after junior year. The College's attrition rate is equivalent to the rate at similar colleges, according to Berek.

The greatest number of withdrawals occurs at the end of each semester, while a few students generally withdraw within the first two weeks of classes. Eight students, according to Registrar, George C. Howard, have withdrawn since last semester, including three who never returned to register for classes. The highest percentage of withdrawals occurs after sophomore year; apparently, said Berek, no correlation exists between the student's sex or field of study and propensity to withdraw.

The Student Handbook acknowledges that students may wish to withdraw from the College for sound educational reasons and states that no student may withdraw from the College and remain in good academic standing after the sixth week of each semester. Others may be readmitted with the approval of the Dean, and according to Berek, they may return with relatively little difficulty up to three years after they have withdrawn.

Students withdraw for academic, personal, disciplinary, and medical; reasons, said Berek. Personal reasons predominate, he said. Students commonly cite lack of direction as their motive. Many students feel they will get a better sense of their own goals in a year away. Most of those who return, said Berek, report that they're glad they took the time off; they generally do better academically, and are happier with the quality of their lives.

Oxfam fast set for Nov. 18

Donations eliminated to foster deeper thought about hunger

Oxfam-America's Fast for a World Harvest, co-ordinators hope, will promote serious thought on the world's food problem. Mary McCord '78 and Julie O'Leary '78 announced that people across the nation will fast November 18, the Thursday before Thanksgiving. Oxfam raises funds to relieve the hungry throughout the Third World.

Unlike previous years, the money saved from not eating will not go to Oxfam. The organizers felt that this circumvented the main purpose. "The last fast was a failure in anything but making money," observed McCord. Many people fasted just to give a donation, and then went out to eat, she said. "It's too easy to give money and forget about it," added O'Leary.

In addition critics complained that giving money seemed a "one-shot, band-aid" solution that did nothing to solve the problem. Proponents claim that by eliminating the donation they will stop people thinking about money, and start people thinking about hunger.

Last year, WHAP sponsored numerous lectures and panel discussions on food and the Third World before and during the fast. Low participation discouraged organizers so no events have been scheduled this year.

WHAP disbanded since the last fast. Co-ordinators McCord and O'Leary have maintained their contacts with Oxfam and will accept donations to be forwarded to the organization.

Fitzpatrick predicts revival

Drinking bill fails

by Margaret Phillips

Massachusetts may still raise its drinking age to 19, according to state Senator John Fitzpatrick. Although Governor Michael S. Dukakis pocket vetoed the bill two weeks ago, the legislature may override his decision by a two-thirds vote.

"I'm sure the bill will be brought up again and I feel certain that there are enough votes in the Senate to overrule the governor," Fitzpatrick said in an interview last weekend. Fitzpatrick strongly supports the bill because it might decrease teen-age driving accidents due to alcohol.

The Senator claims that statistical evidence exists showing that the number of such accidents has increased significantly since 1972, the year the drinking age was lowered from 21 to 18.

"I made a study after the first year that we went from 21 to 18 and the number of deaths rose markedly," Fitzpatrick said. Although he could not remember the numbers, in the fall of 1975 the Record quoted him as saying that "accidents and deaths have increased 134 per cent "among 18 year-olds since 1972."

The Highway Safety Bureau in Boston claimed "we have no statistics to show that traffic accidents would be lower (under the bill) and the Governor gave that reason when he pocket vetoed the bill," a bureau employee said.

The Williamstown police state that "No such records are kept" on local accidents.

Support for the bill comes from various sources, including high school administrators. "I got many calls from high school principals to keep liquor out of the schools," Fitzpatrick said. "The high school principals and superintendents believe that this would be a help to them and I didn't need any more to help make up my mind."

Representative Anthony McBride, who opposes the bill, takes a different view. "Pressure to pass came from police authorities, peer groups and parents who couldn't handle the problems themselves and wanted them given to the courts. It was a cop out."

McBride, who previously supported lowering the drinking age to 18, explained that "My rationale on the 18 year-old drinking thing is that a lot of people were going over the state line thirty or forty miles and coming back and having driving accidents."

Connecticut, Vermont and New York set their drinking age at 18.

Steve Riorden, Williams College Business Manager, commented, "We're relieved it didn't pass. Given Williams' geography we have always thought that buying your beer right here in Williamstown was good."

The administration, however, took no official position on the bill. "By the time we heard that it had passed we heard that it would probably not be signed by the governor. On the whole their view was that the colleges should not use up their legislative potency on that issue," Riorden said.

The bill bounced several times between the House of Representatives and the Senate, gaining final approval on Oct. 16, during the last session of this year's legislature.

CAP convenes for tenure

by Ann McCabe

The Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP) is currently evaluating tenure recommendations submitted by individual departments. Letters on the tenure candidates from juniors and seniors will serve as additional guidelines in the CAP's decision. The CAP will then make its recommendations to the Trustees in February.

After being hired as an assistant professor for three years, a professor may be reappointed at the end of his second or beginning of his third year. If reappointed, he is considered for tenure at the beginning of his fifth year. Exceptions include those who go on leave (the decision is postponed a year).

John Reichert, acting chairman of the English department and CAP chairman said that if a proposal under discussion by the CAP is adopted a professor would come up for tenure in his sixth rather than fifth year.

According to the Student Standing Committee, faculty being considered for tenure are Joseph Beatty in philosophy, Michael Bell, Lynda Bundtzen, and Robert Bell in english, Lee Drickamer in biology, Gary Jacobsohn in political science, Michael Katz in Russian, Jay Pasachoff in astronomy, Sheila Rinehart in art, Mark Taylor in religion, and Tom Tietenberg in economics.

The Record has confirmed this list but could not determine its completeness.

Each department has its own way of evaluating junior members. Departmental recommendations are then submitted to the CAP.

Interviews and course evaluation surveys are usually the most important criteria considered by departments in regarding tenure candidates. Overall effectiveness with students and behavior within the department are also taken into account.

In English the chairman summarizes student course evaluation questionnaires for each junior member annually. "A rather formal system of interviews with students conducted by all senior members" was instituted last year, stated Reichert. English has each junior and senior member visit each other's classes for a week. Through this contact, weekly departmental meetings, and colloquia, Reichert said they get a general impression of the professors over five years. In addition, each junior member's progress is discussed by senior members.

Like the English department, political science reviews the candidate's recent scholarly work. Chairman Kurt Tauber stated that the tenure decision "depends on a variety of areas including scholarly activity, teaching, and service to the community." Junior members are included in tenure discussions in political science.

Henry Bruton, chairman of economics, said "We have observed them (tenure candidates) for four years." He conducts a series of interviews with 25-30 students a year including political economics majors and non-majors. In addition to this file on the instructor, the department "takes very seriously the course evaluations." By the time of tenure, the chairman and senior faculty members have seen seven or eight surveys. Each member in meeting with students informally often hears comments they "store away," which according to Bruton is "a little less precise, but we often learn something we would have otherwise missed."

Biology has an independent student committee which chairman William C. Grant said "gives a fairly detailed evaluation of our junior staff." Each year the students evaluate half the staff through interviews with past and present students, faculty, and the tenure candidates. Astronomy has a committee of faculty from a number of departments which uses the evaluation sheets, interviews students, and visits classes.

Inclusion Reform

The residential house system at Williams has been formally endorsed by the Board of Trustees and faculty, and was supported by students responding to a Committee on Undergraduate Life questionnaire last spring. According to the College catalogue, the goal of this system is "residence within a pattern of living that provides for the meeting and mixing of all members of the academic community."

The operation of the system depends on the successful operation of the procedure for including students in particular houses. Under the present system, "although the student is not able to choose a particular House, the inclusion process attempts to meet his or her preference for a particular type of campus housing to the greatest extent possible," the catalogue notes.

Until this year inclusion for freshmen involved assignments based on preferences for four housing types: Docc-Fitch-Prospect, Greylock, Mission Park and Row Houses. Inclusion for upperclassmen desiring to transfer out of their present house involved assignments based on preferences for particular houses. The CUL now proposes to apply a random assignment system to upperclass transfers similar to that applied to freshmen and is considering changing the preference categories for houses ("CUL considers randomizing house transfer" Record November 12).

CUL members indicate that the change in the transfer inclusion process would protect the diversity of the housing system and prevent special interest housing. A realignment in the housing categories would be designed to make the categories more meaningful, and in the case of a reduction more random.

These proposals before the CUL involve an interpretation of the conflict between the desire of students for a particular housing situation and the desire of the trustees, faculty and students for diverse housing. Whatever proposals the CUL finally adopts must be justified concretely in terms of how they better deal with this conflict than the present situation.

In particular, will randomizing the transfer system adequately deal with the dissatisfaction with earlier housing assignments indicated by the record number of transfer applicants last spring? Much of this dissatisfaction can be traced to inadequate information for freshman inclusion choices, changing desires of students for housing situations over their four years, and less than pleasant inter interactions of some of the diverse elements found in houses.

In categorizing houses by type, what criteria should be adopted? Should popular and unpopular housing be linked to "maximize" apparent first choices and avoid the existence of reject housing?

The CUL is to be praised for coming to grips with these issues well before actual inclusion decisions need to be made next spring. We hope their proposals will prompt greater discussion of their implications for the residential house system. There is certainly room for inclusion reform.

CALENDAR

Pianist Stanley Hummel will give a recital on Thursday, November 18, at 8:30 p.m. in Chapin Hall. His program will consist of Haydn's Sonata in E Flat, Schubert's Impromptu, Opus 142, No. 3, Mendelssohn's Song Without Words and Scherzo in E Minor, Chopin's Sonata in B Flat Minor, Debussy's Valse "La plus que lente" and Doctor Gradus ad Parnassum, Glinka-Balakirew's The Lark, and Liszt's Dance of the Gnomes. This concert will dedicate the Steinway concert piano presented to Williams College by Louise Rogers Kniffin in honor of her husband, Leonard Dodd Kniffin, Jr. '26, on the occasion of the fiftieth reunion of his class in June. Admission is free.

Thanksgiving Clothing Drive

A Thanksgiving Clothing Drive will be conducted during this week, sponsored by the Williams Newman Association in conjunction with St. Patrick's Church on South Street.

The drive is being run as a special effort to help needy Williamstown families through the winter. Students are asked to give any articles of clothing they don't use, especially shoes, socks, shirts, dresses, trousers, and sweaters.

Boxes will be placed in each house for the clothes to be put in, and students can refer to the house bulletin board for the locations of these boxes.

Viewpoint: Homophobia

Williams, America, and Hope

by John Atteridg '76

On June 27, 1969, the New York City Police organized a raid on the Stonewall Inn, a gay bar in the heart of Greenwich Village. That the bar had indeed been illegally serving liquor after hours was not seriously at question, but neither was the fact that it had been singled out because of its clientele. For the first time, however, the crowd of lesbians, transvestites, gay men, and curious onlookers began to fight back. Such was the beginning of the modern gay liberation movement.

It's dying, you tell me? ("Homophobia, Williams and America" Record Nov. 9). Not in New York, not in Houston, not even in Williamstown. Where previously marches and protests were seen as the be all and end all of gay liberation, many activists have turned to more sophisticated methods of persuasion. The way to end "outrageously unconstitutional discrimination" (which unfortunately is constitutional) is to have it declared illegal by judicial review or made illegal by legislative action. Bella Abzug has introduced a bill to do just that in the House; Pat Moynihan has promised to sponsor a Senate counterpart. Since 1970 some eighteen states (as diverse as California, Colorado, Iowa, and New Hampshire) have legalized consensual sex between adults. A petition to repeal California's new law failed to get even the support to place it on the ballot. The town of Amherst has prohibited discrimination against homosexuals.

Legal protection isn't worth a damn, however, unless it's accompanied by societal acceptance (which is a far step above mere tolerance). Here is where you've lost hope. Since there are very few specifics in your essay, there's not much I can respond to. True, many Williams students have "never thought about gay rights," which is one reason Williams Women et al. invited Elaine Noble here last spring. I disagree, however, with your complaint about the "intransigence of public opinion (at Williams)." Not at the Williams I attended. People who in March had called "healthy homosexual" a contradiction in terms were in May very supportive of the WGSO's existence. Friends who in April referred to "the fag letter" were still my friends after they learned of my involvement with it. Where five years ago the questions at a college panel were "vociferous and insensitive," I felt that the discussion four weeks ago was characterized by a genuine interest. Granted I was pointed out in the Log last weekend as the campus homosexual, but, too, a number of friends and acquaintances expressed their support of my having taken a stand as a gay person and also their support of that stand.

People who disagree are too polite to voice their opinion, you say? To an extent that may be true. And yet people who expressed some of the most homophobic attitudes while I was a student have remained cordial during my visits back. I might have expected at best strained avoidance or even hostility. I would hope my friends would talk freely of others' reactions. They report expressions of puzzlement or curiosity, but most often of support.

Your observations about the WGSO merit special attention. Its "inability to evoke a substantial response from the student body"? What response were you waiting for? The one I've seen has been, as I noted, one of support and understanding. By its nature that's not very vocal, but I would still characterize it as substantial. And I might consider WGSO's "obsession with secrecy" to be more a "healthy paranoia." Seriously, you've shown by withholding your name that you understand the fears that prevent gay students from coming out on campus. What you mean is an obsession with anonymity, not secrecy. And yes, they have remained unknown to the campus as a whole. All, however, have gained the strength from the organization to tell their close friends. "Coming out" is a process with many stages and degrees, two of which are being known to other homosexuals and being known to heterosexuals, the former generally preceding the latter. Frequently the problem is less the individual's fear of reaction to him than his simply not being able to handle others' knowledge of The Secret. With no accepted paradigm for guidance, it's easier to continue the status quo. My own suspicion is that more and more gays will arrive at a healthy openness with the students around them (not just close friends), while perhaps avoiding the role of spokesperson.

Enough of Williams: what's in store for America? I don't see an "onrush of callous reaction (reaction to what?) and mass sexual panic," or a "return to the dark days of pre-1970 America." The fastest way we'll change the attitudes is to change the stereotypes. They are finding that we are investment analysts, professors, policemen, and, yes, a few hairdressers. I have been the first admitted homosexual many of my friends have known. Had my sister known others before me, she might have been better able to accept me; now perhaps she will be able to accept others. I hope my coming out has forced people who knew me to start a re-examination of their opinions. The thesis of Dr. Howard Brown's new book, Familiar Faces, Hidden Lives, is that as long as society is able to remain convinced that we are neurotic, are dangerous to society, are somehow "other," we will remain oppressed. Society is becoming less and less convinced, though, as experience is affirming Brown's challenge: "If we were all to stand up in your midst, would you 'always have known'? I doubt it. Sexually distinct we may be, but most of us are surprisingly like you." This is, I think, something Williams realized after our panel discussion the other week. And, fortunately, many are standing up. Perhaps America first adopted "platitudes about 'tolerance' " in "a fit of liberal guilt," but I see those platitudes as enabling us to get it together enough that sincere acceptance will follow.

There is another consequence to greater openness about homosexuality. Young gay men and women are finally being provided with positive gay role models. Their perception of what they can become in life is no longer limited to the stereotypes they had of other homosexuals (and closeted gays are just as subject to those stereotypes as anyone else). Thus they are able to acknowledge—and accept and affirm—their homosexuality. Television and movies are beginning to accept us as viable characters, though in many cases their portrayals are so awkward as to be steps backward. I have to agree with Dr. Brown's conclusion, that "the gay civil rights movement is gradually redefining society's view of homosexuals; even more importantly, it is helping us to see ourselves in a new light. As conditions change, we, too, are changing." If that makes me one of the "hopeful sort" you denigrate, then so be it. I accept with pleasure.

Federal regulation of College affairs increases

In the wake of the Presidential election, the government is a subject on many people's minds. This is the second installment of a two-part article in which the RECORD examines the effect of the federal government on Williams. Part I considered the nature of the federal presence here, what would happen if Williams attempted to act independently of it, and what its positive aspects are. Part II considers the negative aspects of the federal impact and assesses the future role of government at Williams.

by Peter Rintels

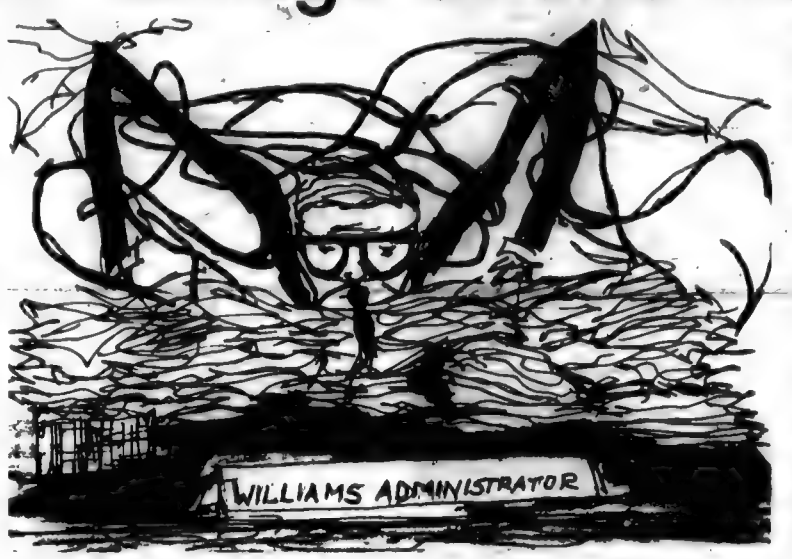
The last few years have seen a tremendous increase in the impact of the Federal government at Williams. The impact has been positive by supplying Williams with the money to enrich its academic program and diversify its student body, and by forcing the college to move more quickly in adopting policies it wanted to adopt anyway, such as affirmative action.

The increased federal presence has also brought with it increased regulation of the college's affairs, not all of which is looked upon favorably by the administration. The College has become increasingly conscious of this regulation and, as a result, it sees relations with the government as more of a struggle than before. "Seven to eight years ago, we looked upon the government benignly. We liked them; they liked us. Now it's war," says Shane Riorden, Business Manager. "It's a very changed atmosphere."

Bureaucratic Mentality

"The bureaucratic mentality is a minimalistic mentality," claimed President Chandler. "It is one which attempts to pull the College down to a general mean." He feels that this has resulted in a "homogenizing impact."

"Government regulation is so pervasive," he said, "that it has a large impact in determining local policy and procedures. The distinctive character of the college and university determined by local decisions tends to become eroded. A kind of sameness evolves. Colleges that aspire to excellence have an especially hard time with government regulations."



Chandler said he believes that the vitality of higher education stems from its diversity and the imposition of a bureaucratic stand threatens this diversity.

The effect of the bureaucracy at Williams can be seen in the Affirmative Action program of faculty hiring. Although the College supports the program in principle, opinions differ on how it should be administered. Administrators say the government is trying to impose a model on faculty hiring in which people are "interchangeable parts" and which ignores the highly specific qualifications Williams looks for.

"Academic hiring is highly discriminatory," said Riorden. "You never get two people with exactly equal qualifications."

Dean of the Faculty, Neil Grabois, added that as part of the Williams Affirmative Action program, if a woman or black applicant were ever found to have the same qualifications as a white male applicant for a faculty position, the woman or black would be hired. So far, however, this criterion has not been a factor in any hiring decisions.

According to President Chandler, the College has felt this kind of pressure with tenure decisions. "We have trouble defending high tenure standards," he insists, explaining that the government may see the Ph.D. and expect tenure to be granted. In both hiring and tenure decisions, the College looks for qualifications that the "interchangeable parts" viewpoint ignores.

So while the College stands firmly behind the principle of equality in faculty hiring and salaries, according to Riorden, "Our major difference with the government is the speed with which this is going to happen." He said he believes the government "is being unreasonable."

Government Forms

Another source of friction in the Affirmative Action program is a government form called the EO-6. The College uses this form to report the racial and sexual make-up of the faculty and is obligated by law to fill it out.

According to Provost Stephen R. Lewis, the form requires that the College categorize the faculty members. "This does not reflect the way in which an academic institution operates," he said. "Many people find being categorized offensive." He noted that categorization also reinforces the notion that faculty positions are standardized, which they are not.

The EO-6 threatens the College mainly by reinforcing an attitude which the College finds dangerous. Chandler reports that the Federal Trade Commission is now considering new forms which would require colleges and universities to supply information concerning the success of its graduates in getting jobs.

"For a liberal arts institution," said Chandler emphatically, "this cuts across the fundamental premise of our purpose. It imposes a definition on us that is antithetical to our goals." The new form is being proposed in the name of consumer protection, Chandler added. He insisted that, in addition to promoting the "Williams is just a road to better jobs" attitude, it fosters "an adversary relationship between the students and the College. It is a threat to our sense of community."

Direct Regulations

A more direct threat is the proposed federal requirement that college buildings be made accessible to handicapped persons. While presently under revision, the original proposal would cost the College as much as $2 million in renovation costs (Record, 9-24), or four times the amount of federal money presently received.

Associate Provost David Booth termed the regulations "fundamentally threatening," adding that "A major diversion of funds from things the College considers more important would be required to pay for that."

According to Chandler, there is also talk in Washington of requiring a non-Williams person to be on the Board of Trustees. He said that it was not likely that the proposal would be enacted, but that if it were, it would do serious damage to the autonomy of the College.

Government presence has also been felt due to Occupational Safety and Health Administration regulations, which are responsible for additional safety regulations in laboratory work, for Title IX, which requires equal athletic facilities for men and women, and for the Buckley amendment, which requires colleges to allow students access to their academic files.

While Williams is not openly hostile toward any of these regulations, other institutions have been less acquiescent. Brigham Young University in Utah and Hillsdale College in Michigan openly refused to comply with Title IX and may lose substantial Federal support.

Federal research grant money in the sciences has sometimes been restricted to special projects that the government supported. This tendency has become most pronounced in the last four to five years, according to William Grant, chairman of the biology department. He claims it is more difficult now to design a basic research project which has no clear practical goal.

"Unless the benefits of research can be shown, it is not as easy to get money." During the energy crisis, for example, undergraduate research projects were expected to be concerned with the energy before they could get National Science Foundation Funding.

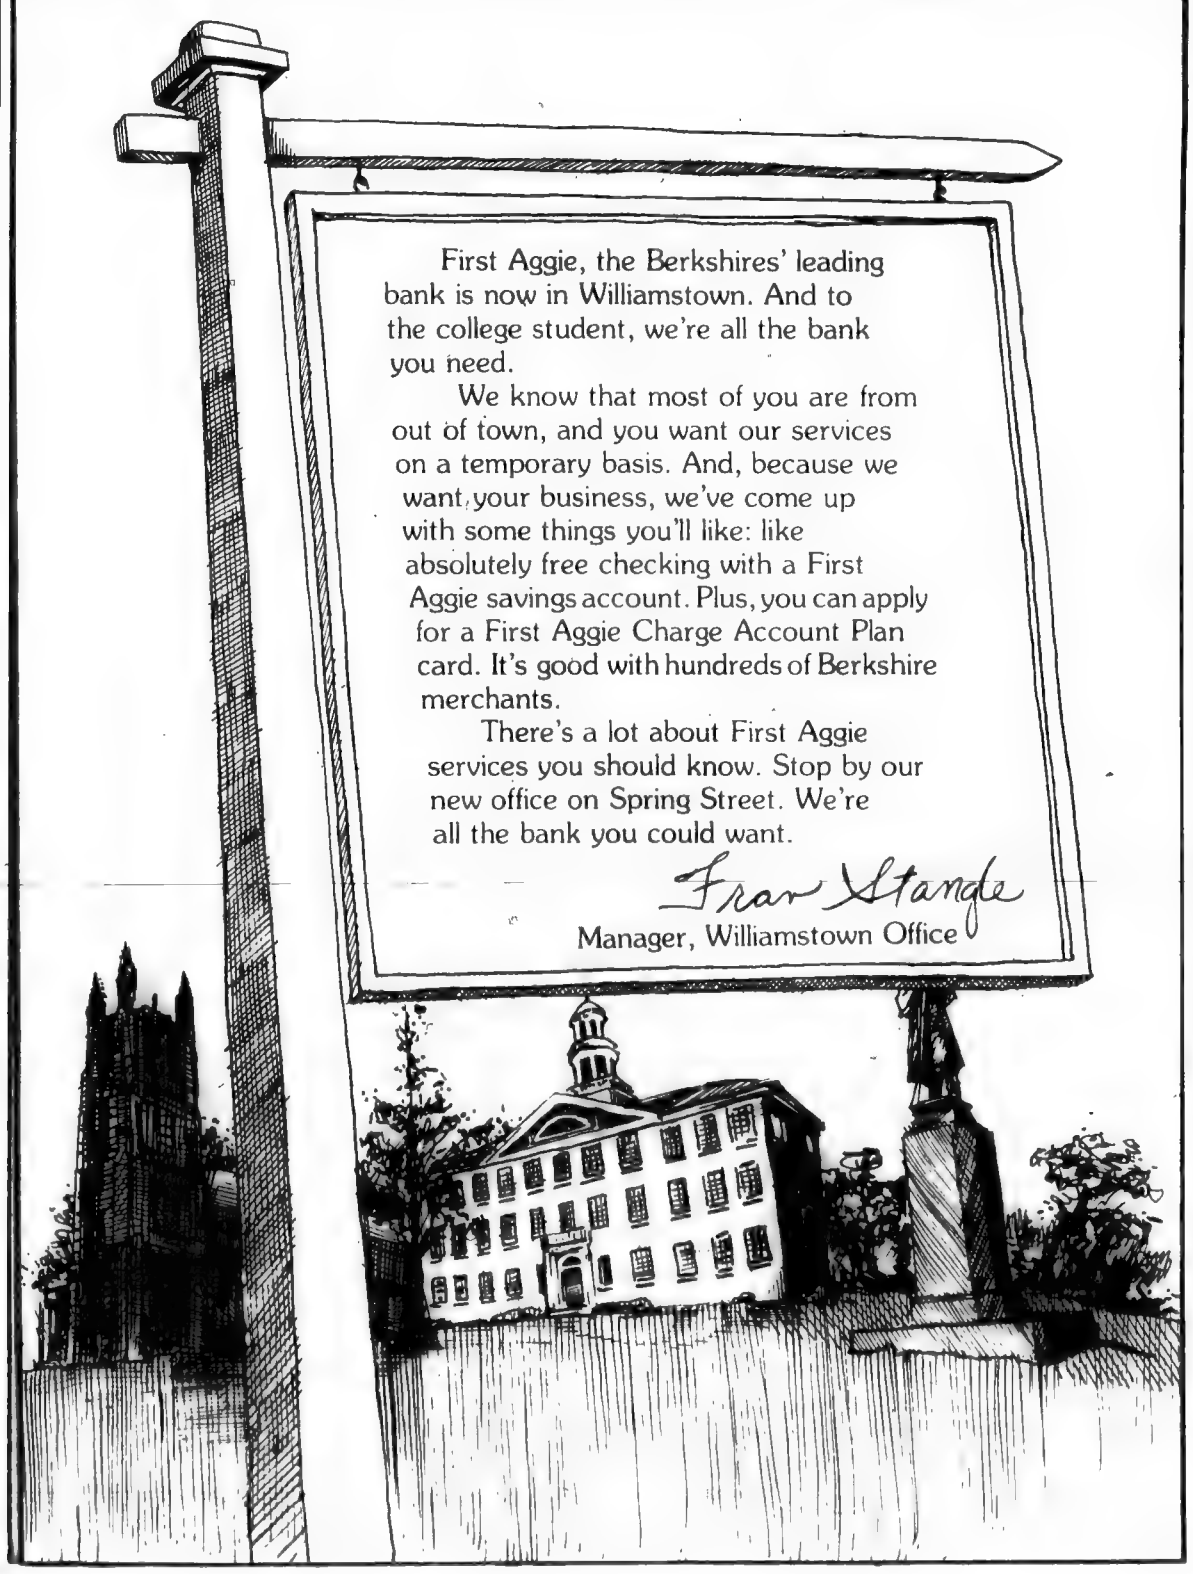
These restrictions have been lifted and the tendency for federal money to come with strings attached is now on the wane, Grant says.

Increased Administration

With the government playing a more pervasive role in campus affairs, the administration is forced to devote more and more time to government business. No one in the administration would estimate how much this diversion of administrative time has cost the College, but it has clearly been a substantial amount. Riorden said that he spends about a quarter of his time with government paperwork.

Government paperwork requirements are not only a lot of work, but they are the kind of work that administrators least like to do. More than one referred to it as a "pain in the neck." Nonetheless, they do not consider it a serious burden.

Future of Government Regulation



Administrators voice a subdued optimism about the future of government regulation here. They recognize a serious threat of future government impingement on Williams' autonomy, but expect it will remain only a threat.

"It would be naive to believe that federal intervention may not become increasingly negative in the years to come," said Booth, although he believes that the effects of the federal presence have been overwhelmingly salutary up to this point. While he counseled "increasing concern for federal government regulation," he added that the government will continue to be looked upon favorably unless serious new restrictions are handed down.

Chandler said he sees the possibility of increasing federal presence, but noted that it will be a "more rational presence." He assorted that a larger percentage of the people who run government agencies dealing with education will be coming out of colleges and universities themselves. In addition, he foresees more intense Congressional scrutiny of federal regulatory agencies. In general, Chandler says, "There are signs that an accommodation is being reached between higher education and government agencies."

The federal government is on campus to stay and has forced the College to abdicate some of its autonomy. But we have not been forced to do anything violently against our principles. Moreover, administrators agree that the benefits we have received in return far outweigh the nuisance of the government regulation.

President Chandler summed up the view of the future: "We will retain the autonomy that we have, but I don't think we will ever regain the autonomy we once enjoyed."

Review

AMT's 'Scandal' is delightful

by Thomas Herwitz

If it's all out, delightful, well meant comedy you desire, there's enough to turn even the sourest expression upward in the Williams College Theater production of School for Scandal—and it will continue to create a stir this Thursday, Friday, and Saturday. Starting from Richard Brinsley Sheridan's marvelously quick witted script, director Gregory Boyd and his players have produced a wild, slapstick farce which fills the AMT with roars of laughter.

Sheridan's multi-faceted play is about a group of gossiping aristocrats, an unhappy Sir Peter Teazle who marries a country girl half his age and regrets every minute of it, two brothers in search of their uncle's estate, a proper ingenue, and as many entangled love affairs as can be fit into two and a half hours. All the standard ingredients for Restoration comedy. They are all mixed together and what comes out of the oven are the hallmarks of classical comedy—mistaken identity, slapstick, and farce—and of course a happy ending (for the good guys, that is.)

Given that wonderful script, the success is that Boyd goes further still than this. It was a brilliant idea to move the play from the 1770's to the 1920's. It gives the piece a breath of fresh air, and allows for a lot of added humor and entertainment. Nothing is lost in the shift, and so very much is gained (particularly in the design.)

The cast was generally unflawed and featured some outstanding performances. Earl Childs as Joseph Surface has truly found his medium in the stylized manner of the play. His characterization is caricature and it works beautifully here. The whole boudoir scene (which is the mainstay of the second act) is guided and carried completely by his performance. The gossipers are all very funny (each with his or her own twist) but Cecilia Rubino stands out as the strong and bitingly malicious Lady Sneerwell. Dianne Thompson was sweetly innocent as Lady Teazle, a refreshing change from her past roles. Though not as old as he perhaps should have been Kevin O'Rourke catches everyone's sympathy as Sir Peter Teazle, as does Robert Gregory in a completely solid performance as Sir Oliver Surface. Ed Lapine was also notable as everyone's servant.

Certainly, a good deal of the play rests on the actors, but it is Boyd's superb sense of humor which carries the production. Not only is his technical skill pervasive, meticulous and smooth, but his creativity is even more exciting. Except for a very few points in the play (notably the beginning of the second act which was surprisingly rough, and parts of the latter half of the first act) the slickness of the production was remarkable. The boudoir scene with Surface, Teazle and Lady Teazle was well executed, and fast moving. Through most of the play (particularly the Scandal scenes) Boyd creates moving stage pictures which at times become almost prototypical 1920's billboard posters. But it is the smaller touches—the marvelous detail on which Boyd insisted—which made the piece so lively. The idea of having one actor play all of the servants, the sign language at the beginning, the Teazle bathtub scene—all of these are exemplary little touches which Boyd read into the script and which together made the play. Perhaps the most unusual of these was the beginning pas de deux between a ballerina and a gorilla. A touch that was so clever, surprising, and fitting that it couldn't help but be well received and entertaining.

Richard Jeter's set is beautiful. Stark white, it emphasizes the players and puts the focus on them. The flown screens work well and move the play quickly through what could have been awkward scene changes. The "Scandal" sign and some of the other props were marvelous. One only wonders why the play was done in proscenium where the action seemed set back further than necessary.

No doubt the evening was made so much more enjoyable by the magnificent costumes which were created by the AMT's new costume designer Martha Hally. Her work was clever, funny, and handsome. Lady Teazles dress was innocent when it needed to be. Sir Oliver's turban was cute, as was Lady Sneerwell's matching eyepatches. The "scandalers" looked such. On the side, in fact, the play was a fashion show as well.

A delightful evening.

Clark acquires major oil painting

Clark Art Institute has announced the acquisition of a major oil painting by the Belgian artist Francois-Joseph Navez (1787-1869). The new acquisition, entitled Musical Group, depicts four figures seated among antique ruins within a golden landscape of the Roman campagna. The left foreground is dominated by a group of three females. A young dreamy-eyed woman in mustard yellow sits upon the lap of a mysterious older woman clad in rich green velvet; below them a young child in profile holds a tambourine. This threesome is balanced on the right by a young man dressed in a Byronic outfit who strums a mandolin. A fascinating ambiguity pervades the relationship among these four figures.

Signed and dated "F. J. Navez-Roma 1821;" Musical Group was painted in the last year of Navez's four-year sojourn in Italy. There his interest in such genre subjects first developed as the result of a friendship with the painter Leopold Robert (1784-1835), whom he had met in Rome in 1817.

Navez's Musical Group brings to the Clark's already outstanding collection of nineteenth-century paintings a new element not already represented, the neo-classical style which is characterized in part by a smooth finish and fine draughtsmanship. The enduring popularity of this style in the latter half of the nineteenth century is exemplified by the Institute's well-known Nymphs and Satyr, painted in 1873 by the successful academic artist Bouguereau. The addition of Musical Group will also enable the viewer to compare this work by Navez with those of his outstanding pupil Alfred Stevens, twelve of whose paintings are exhibited at the Institute.

Musical Group was formerly in the Wurthle Collection of Vienna and has been published. The painting is now on display in Gallery 12 of the Clark Art Institute, which is open Tuesday through Sunday, 10:00-5:00.

Music in the Round contrasts old and new

Reviewed by Valerie Sarantos

A program of predominantly 20th century music was well-received last Friday evening as Music in the Round presented its third concert of the season to a substantial audience. The contemporary works included a wonderful Trio by Leon Kirchner, and Olivier Messiaen's mystical Quartet for the End of Time. Offering an interesting contrast in its classicism was Beethoven's pleasantly light Serenade, which was strategically placed between the two 20th century compositions in the program. All were essentially well-played with the exception of minor problems in one instance.

The Williams Trio opened the program with a strong rendition of Kirchner's intriguing two-part Trio for violin, cello, and piano. Moments of alternating thick and thin textural activity within a rollicking, pulsating rhythmic framework were handled with appropriate forcefulness by the trio; while the dreamy, melancholy passages were diligently but strongly rendered. Douglas Moore's sad moaning cello, Stephen Dankner's eerie piano, and Julius Hegyi's sadly sweet violin blended well while retaining their individuality in the dissonant, strong—yet sensitive—Trio.

Traditionalism followed in the light seven-movement Beethoven Serenade for violin, viola, and cello; respectively performed by Hegyi, Susan St. Amour, and Moore. At first the ensemble had pitch difficulties which were finally resolved towards the end of the Adagio movement. From that point on, however, the performance was lively and highly enjoyable, particularly in the Andante quasi allegretto movement.

Concluding the program was Olivier Messoien's Quartet for the End of Time, and eight-part work of a highly mystical nature. Making her MITR debut, was Susan Hohenberg, an impressively capable clarinettist whose exciting intensity easily won over the audience. Also in the quartet were Charlotte Hegyi on a well-blending piano, Julius Hegyi, violin, and Moore, cello.

Women swim to first victory ever over Holyoke

by Dennis O'Shea

"Coach Sam told me just to swim my own race, and not to worry about the other girl—and it worked!" said Carol Ann Smalley after clinching the women's swim team's first official win over Mount Holyoke ever Thursday night.

Oh, boy, did it work. The junior exchange from Holyoke stroked from nearly a pool length behind to thief second place in the 500 yard free from her former teammate and assure the Ephwomen's 72-50 triumph.

Smalley had the Muir Pool crowds on their feet as she inched her way towards second after her Holyoke opponent Judy Weisburgh had fallen off Marilla Pearsall's winning pace at about 350 yards. At 475 they turned together, but Smalley exploded off the wall and had enough left to open half a body length's lead in the final lap. Her final time of 5:52.1 was almost seven seconds ahead of her personal best.

Once again, Pearsall absolutely dominated the middle distance freestyle events, winning the very difficult 100, 200 and 500 yard triple for the second straight meet. This combination leaves her but one event's rest between her second and third swims of the meet.

Keron Walker also won three events, setting a new College record in the 100 individual medley before taking both the 50 freestyle and 100 butterfly. The frosh sprinter also gets a share of a brand new 200 freestyle relay College standard along with team captain Randall Morrow, and sophs Joanna Monroe and Nina Murphy.

Murphy dropped seven-tenths off her own 100 backstroke mark and netted two seconds to Holyoke ace and perpetual nemesis Karen Farnsworth, while Monroe won the 50 fly.

The Holyoke victory is the Ephwomen's fifth of the season and runs their string of dual meet victories to eleven over the past two seasons, but is their first official win over the Lyons. Holyoke clobbered the Purple in an invitational and a triangular meet last year, although the Ephs outperformed them in an unscored relay meet at Wellesley.

With their second straight undefeated dual meet season safely salted away, Carl Samuelson's natators close out the year with a pair of multi-team contests this week. Holyoke gets a second shot at Williams at a triangular meet hosted by UMass Wednesday, before the Ephwomen return to defend last year's domination of the Masse-Spears Relay Carnival at Wellesley.

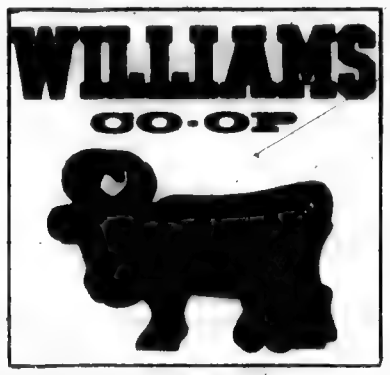
have seemed a hurricane by this time traveled only to just beyond midfield where Harasimowicz brought it back to the Williams 39. Two running plays brought up a third and three, where Newman put the game away.



Apparently aware of the tendency of Williams' deep backs to come up quickly and aggressively against the run (not a bad trait, just a risky one), Newman faked the ball into the line and tossed a perfect spiral to a wide open Swiacki who waltzed in for the insurance score.

The never-say-die Ephs (as they haven't all season) put together two long drives in the waning minutes of the game, but never did get on the board.

Credit in large doses is due the Amherst defensive line, who used their big weight advantage to its fullest, and held the Williams ground game to minus yardage on the day.

For Amherst, the win has to be even more satisfying than the soccer squad's Cinderella comeback. Coach Jim Ostendarp finally has his first win over Bob Odell and he's waited a million years for it.

Williams need certainly not be ashamed, for the seniors, 18-5-1 is certainly quite respectable. But the road ahead is not an easy one, as now the halo of invincibility has been lifted from the head of Ephraim Williams, and its reinstatement lies in the hearts of the underclassmen of the squad.

Ask Procter & Gamble what you can do with your BA degree!

You could become the advertising/marketing manager for one of these P&G products!

Although only 5 are shown here, Procter & Gamble makes more than 50 well-known, well-advertised consumer brands.

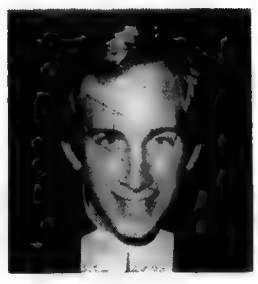
For each brand, there is a small management group, usually just 3 people, totally responsible for planning, creating and supervising everything that is done to increase consumer acceptance of their brand.

The group is headed by a Brand Manager, an important level of management in our company.

Right now, we're looking for a few highly qualified college seniors with the potential to become Brand Managers.

You would start at our Cincinnati headquarters as part of a brand group for a specific brand, perhaps one of those shown here. To help you learn quickly, your Brand Manager would give you challenging assignments of increasing responsibility in various key marketing areas such as TV advertising, package design, special promotions, budget planning and analysis, and market research.

The emphasis would be on you, your ideas, your ability to contribute. You'll be promoted on the basis of merit alone. It's not uncommon to become a full Brand Manager within 3-4 years.



Since you will begin to manage from the day you join us, we're looking for "take charge" people with outstanding records of leadership while in college. "Superior academic achievement", "innovative", "a record of being able to get things done", and "good oral and written communications skills" are some of the words we use to describe the people we want.

If this kind of work interests you and you think you qualify, please send me your resume.

Purple gridders must share Little 3 title

Amherst finally wins, 16-0

by Tim Layden

No, it doesn't prove that the Wesleyan win was a fluke, and it doesn't show that Wesleyan's win over Amherst was an accident, either. Saturday's 16-0 Amherst upset win over Williams just shows that good rivalries are unpredictable and hard-fought, and bears out all those trite adages about throwing the records out the window when these two teams meet.

On paper, the Williams Ephs seemed to be a team which had matured late in the season and was ready now to really roll to two Little Three victories and the title. Amherst had been beset by injuries all season and had never put together a solid team performance after midseason. It looked like a potential rout.

Yet, two things keyed the Lord Jeff upset. The first was exceptional scouting, which enabled the Jeff linebackers and deep backs to gaze into their crystal balls each time the Ephs came to the line of scrimmage and often shout out the expected play. The second factor was the return to full-time duty and slippery running of junior quarterback Mike Newman, who left Eph pass-rushers grabbing at air all afternoon.

Windy, muddy, jam-packed Pratt Field in Amherst was the scene of the contest which brought about the first three-way Little Three tie since 1939. Both squads treated the crowd to a lifeless battle of punts and feeling-out throughout the first period.

Despite the scoreless battle of the early game, the big Amherst defense was setting a trend which was to spell the doom of the Williams passing game early and force a seemingly endless string of second and third and long situations. The Jeffs often blitzed two linebackers, and forced Don Wallace (17 for 49, 222 yards) farther out of the pocket than usual.

With just over six minutes remaining in the first half of the still scoreless contest, the Amherst defense came up with the first break of the game. Junior linebacker Ralph Knode led a charge of Jeffs through to Eph punter Peter Unger and blocked the junior's try. Paul Harasimowicz recovered on the Williams 20 to put the hosts in business.

A Newman completion to big Bill Swiacki and a keeper preceded two Rich Minicus carries and the Jeffs were on the board. Gary Strassenberg's PAT gave Amherst a 7-0 lead, their first lead over Williams since 1973.

On the very next possession of the first half, Williams lit a fire under the chilly fans, with a gutty 74-yard, 13-play drive against the clock, only to stall on the Jeff seven with just seconds remaining in the half.

The key play of the half may have come on first-and goal from the Amherst seven. Wallace rolled to his right and partially turned the corner with seemingly nothing but green in front of him. The senior however, instinctively tried to throw into the crowded end zone and the pass fell incomplete. The Williams fans around the play groaned loudly and Wallace clutched his helmet as if to say "I know, I know!"

Any chilly fans who went to their cars for liquid warmth during the intermission may have returned to the third quarter only to think they were seeing a rerun of the first. Williams, with the wind at their back, unable to get anything going against the stubborn Jeff defense and Newman scrambling out of trouble just often enough to keep the Jeffs out of the shadow of their own goalposts.

The final play of the third quarter was a 51-yard Wallace to Ken Hollingsworth completion to set the Ephs up on the Amherst 30. Two sacks of Wallace by linebacker Doug Moses and an unsuccessful fourth-and-21 try gave Amherst the ball back.

A Jeff punt on the next possession set up a break which had seemed inevitable all day. With Williams backed up to the end zone on second and long, Wallace finally ran out of room. Linebacker Sean Clancy collared Wallace in the end zone for two points and a 9-0 Amherst lead.

Soccer Jeffs thwart Eph quest for Little Three

by Mark Pogue

Senior Greg Best's 25-yard clout with 2:43 left in the season won Amherst an electrifying 3-2 decision over the Williams soccer team Saturday, depriving the Ephs of their first undisputed Little Three title since 1971. The triumph, extending the Lord Jeffs' regular-season curse on Williams to six years, quickly redeemed Amherst's long 2-9 season, and ended the Purple's Bicentennial fall with a 7-4-1 record.

Amherst's soccer rink, as expected, had a noticeable effect on all aspects of this game. Players on both teams continually slipped, fell, or toppled each other like bowling pins on the slick turf, and it all served to neutralize Williams' superior front-line speed and disrupt its controlled style of ball. "We played reasonably well considering the field," said Williams' Coach Jeffrey Vennell afterwards, "But it definitely affected our game. It caused delays in getting off our shots."

After an early Purple breakaway goal was called back because of an offsides violation, the Jeffs regrouped and began to exert pressure of their own at all points on the field. With 22 minutes gone forward Kirk Hartman burst through the defensive backfield with the ball, lured goalie Skip Grossman off the baseline, and punched the ball by him for a 1-0 Amherst lead.

This annoyed Kirk's brother Greg, who plays for Williams. Nine minutes later Greg Hartman gathered in the ball at the blue line and dribbled his way to the Amherst endline. As three surprised fullbacks and Jeff goalie Eric Cromartie converged on him, Hartman slipped a perfect pass-shot to inrushing linemate Peter Barra, who tapped the ball home to tie the game. Barra had been moved to center-forward after John Friborg, the Ephs best scoring threat, was knocked out of the game with a leg injury midway through the first half.

As footing grew more precarious in the second half neither team could establish lasting dominance of the action. Instead, they alternated in mounting a series of sporadic attacks against each other, while Cromartie and Grossman repeatedly wowed the shivering crowd with a series of spectacular, diving saves.

The Purple broke on top with six minutes of regulation time left. After diving to stop one point-blank shot with an incredible body save,

Cromartie lay helpless as sophomore Chick Johnson belted the rebound past his ear for a 2-1 Williams lead. Only two minutes later, however, the never-say-die Jeffs retaliated when Hartman drove Grossman's baseline and stuck a shot into the side panel of the net. "There was a tremendous letdown after our score—there always will be in that situation," said Vennell. "But we just didn't react quickly enough on that play. It looked just like the goal UConn scored to beat us."

With fullback Geoff Klingenstein personally boarding up the right side of the Purple backfield, much of the 20-minute overtime session belonged to Williams. Yet Cromartie refused to fold, and with three minutes left it appeared Williams would accept the Little Three crown by virtue of defeating Wesleyan and tying the Jeffs (Wesleyan beat Amherst.)

This hope went up in smoke seconds later, though, when Amherst took the ball and caught the Purple defensive playing up too far. "Get back! Get back!" Vennell screamed even before the play developed. Before Williams could regroup the ball was fed to Best in the center of the field, who won the game with a tremendous blast that barely eluded Grossman's final lunge. The defeat ended on a disappointing note one of Williams's finest seasons in many years, and renewed old vows that next year, at least, those Lord Jeffs must be beaten.

Purple ruggers drub Amherst

Saturday morning the Williams Rugby Club "A"-side walked into Amherst with a six game unbeaten streak and back to back shutouts. That afternoon they were the proud owners of a seven game unbeaten streak, another shutout, and the shirts from the Amherst team.

The 7-0 win marks the first time in four seasons that the "A"-siders have beaten the Jeffs while the "B"-side continued its recent success over Amherst with a hard fought 10-6 win. Coming off a 27-0 blanking of Boston University last week, the braintrust of the W.R.F.C., with limitless confidence, decided to challenge Amherst to play for shirts. Amherst, sensing the momentum of one of Williams finest "A"-sides ever was reluctant, but the thought of parading around Pratt Field with Williams's shirts on got the better of them.

The "B"-side paved the way for the "A"s showing speed and endurance in their win with Mike Krikorian scoring two tries. The "A"-side then played just well enough to win with Byrne Kelly's try and Dave Levy's field goal. Although the offense had trouble getting started the staunch Williams defense was never in doubt. Hard hitting and hustle combined to stop Amherst before they got started and put five of their players out of the game. The defense has been extremely impressive all year, thanks to a total team effort.

Byrne Kelly, the team's spiritual leader, typified the leadership and performance of the team's seniors all season long. He played the first half with several broken ribs, scored, and would have played the second half if the trainers let him. Byrne and his classmates John Greer, Dave Levy, Jaime Edwards, Sammy Hanchet, Marshall Partington and the ever present Jim Tolls were inspirations to the rest of the club.

The club would like to thank Jim "Bandaid" Stone for his irreplaceable services and the college community for its support. We hope interest will be even better this spring when the club hopes to improve its record.

The Williams Rugby Football Club closed out the season Saturday with satisfying wins over Amherst from both "A" and "B" sides.

Polomen slip by Jeffs in 4 overtimes

by Ray Porfilio

The Water Polo Club capped off the 1976 fall campaign with its second consecutive Little Three championship. A closely contested, quadruple overtime 16-15 victory over Amherst clinched the title. Over homecoming weekend, the club had taken the first step toward the Little Three bragging rights by besting Wesleyan 16-7.

The Amherst contest was supposed to be a routine affair; Williams had dominated the Jeffs 14-10 earlier in the year. However, inspired Amherst play combined with well-executed pool strategy to keep the game close. Additionally, Williams was hampered by bizarre rule interpretations by the referees.

Williams fell behind early but an offensive spurt in the second period, led by Mike Feltes, put the Ephs on top going into the half. A rough but well-played second half was even; regulation expired with the score knotted at 14-14.

The first two overtimes were defensively oriented. The first was scoreless. The second saw Williams score first only to have Amherst answer with a goal as time was running out. Thus the marathon of a game moved into sudden death overtime.

Amherst had accumulated nine team fouls and one more would have led to a free shot for Williams. Despite Eph efforts to control the ball and draw the final foul, no fouls were called. The third overtime was scoreless.

In the fourth overtime, some two hours after the game had begun, Williams garnered the game-winning goal. Phil Wild fired a shot which the Jeff goalie stopped, but the rebound popped back out to Wild. He lofted a lob shot which missed its mark.

Women's volleyball wins two

The varsity women's volleyball team demonstrated its capacity to play a well-coordinated game as Williams defeated both its opponents at an Albany tri-meet last Wednesday evening.

Despite the fact that a late arrival necessitated warming-up in the foyer of the Albany gym, the Williams squad handily won their first match against Russell Sage College, 15-4, 15-5. Especially noteworthy was the consistent, piercing serving of Lisa Marder and the overall teamwork of all the players.

Williams went on to defeat the Albany State 6 immediately afterwards, 15-4, 15-3. Again, the game was characterized by fine volleyball techniques.

Funds seven organizations

Council concludes allocations

The College Council concluded this year's Student Activities Tax allocation Tuesday night by considering seven organizational budgets. The council voted to grant full requests to the Volleyball Club, the Jewish Association, and the Republican Club. Three organizations, the International Club, the Dance Society and Williams Women received cuts from their original request. The council also voted not to fund the Pre-Law Society.

The Dance Society's budget request highlighted a problem with the funding procedure. Because of the great demand outside the college, for the groups brought in by the Dance Society, scheduling and contratural commitments must be completed between six months to one year before the actual event. The Dance Society signs contracts based upon its expectation for full-funding from the council. This year they requested and budgeted for $5,700. The council granted the group $4,800, recommending that the group raise its ticket prices 50c to defray $400 of the expected $900 deficit.

According to Treasurer Clarence Otis, the remaining $500 deficit is the responsibility of the College. Otis claimed that "The College is responsible for this deficit if a college official signed, or approved of the signing of the contract".

Following the meeting, Otis pointed out that the current practice of budgeting in the late fall "leaves a lot of major groups out on a limb. For example, the ACEC and the Dance Society have to make firm contractural commitments long before the September semester begins". Otis recommended electing a new treasurer and Finance Committee in February or March and conducting a portion of the allocations at that time. Otis said that he saw no problem in installing a new treasurer before the general elections were conducted in the late spring.

Williams Women sought an allocation of $980. The council overwhelmingly voted to accept the Finance Committee's recommendation of $750. Finance Committee member Ross Cheit stated that the cut was made because "we weren't sure how firm the group's plans were for this year".

The council also voted 13-9 to allocate $850 to the International Club. The Club has requested $1000, but this was based on having two international dinners this year. The $150 cut reflects a decision to cut one dinner.

The Pre-Law Society tried to convince the council that the activities that this group wishes to undertake are not the responsibility of the Office of Career Counseling. Society chairman Dan McCabe argued that the speakers that the group wanted to sponsor would appeal to the overall campus community. Cheit and Otis pointed out that the speakers were

Committee proposes 5 housing categories

A proposed five-category house inclusion system will come before the Committee on Undergraduate Life Monday as the recommendation of the Housing Committee. The revised system would group Dodd and Tyler into one category, leaving Fitch and Prospect in another, and would not effect the remaining three categories: Greylock, Mission Park and Row Houses.

The CUL asked that the Housing Committee consider possible realignments of the existing four categories: Dodd-Fitch-Prospect, Greylock, Mission Park, and Row Houses. Both committees have expressed concern over what has been called the "meaningless Dodd-Fitch-Prospect category." Most members of the CUL and the Housing Committee agreed that the range of rooms and the variation in atmosphere between the three houses in this category is too wide for a realistic housing category.

The Housing Committee considered a number of alternative regroupings including one proposal to divide the houses into two categories: Greylock-Mission Park-Prospect and the remaining seven houses. Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad labeled the proposal the "white vs. wall papered walls" system, explaining that the division grouped dormitory and non-dormitory style houses. The committee rejected the suggestion as overly restrictive.

Another proposal would have placed Dodd in the Row House category again leaving Fitch-Prospect as a separate inclusion group. The committee's opposition to this alternative centered on the question of balancing category sizes. The proposal would divide the houses very inequitably as Fitch and Prospect together have only about 180 house members.

The committee favored the five-category system as a realistic division of the houses into meaningful and reasonably equitable groupings. Any realignment providing for a category comprised of only Fitch and Prospect houses could encourage special interest housing, committee members noted. The unpopularity of this residential area in the past few years suggests that any large groups of freshmen applying to a Fitch-Prospect inclusion unit could be assured entry.

CUL rejects subcommittee attempts to control alcohol

A report of the CUL subcommittee on alcohol, discussed at Monday's meeting of the Committee on Undergraduate Life, indicated that excessive use of alcohol is a real problem on the campus. The subcommittee concluded that the College must protect the interests of students who do not drink, who do so moderately but still must house dues which are used predominantly for purchasing alcohol, and those who drink more heavily.

See pg. 3 for the text of the recommendations to the CUL on the use of alcohol at Williams.

The report proposed several recommendations designed to achieve this protection. The proposals included the abolition of all house dues above the $20 currently included in the term bill as part of the House Maintenance Tax and also the keeping of separate records of drinking and non-drinking members of each house.

The CUL rejected proposals which they considered as invalid interferences with house autonomy. The members also disagreed with the recommendation that a formal course on the dangers of alcohol be given to all students.

The committee was more receptive to recommendations geared towards

Calendar group accepts calendar; sees reform need

The Calendar and Schedule Committee unanimously accepted the existing calendar for use in the 1977-1978 school year but chose to re-evaluate the schedule for future years.

Members of the committee proposed numerous changes aimed at scheduling graduation one week earlier in the spring. According to Registrar George C. Howard, Williams is one of very few eastern colleges to graduate its seniors in June.

Muggletonian group salutes infamous Englishmen

by Cabby Tennis III

"Believe ye—Reeve, Shrive we!" the group cries in response to a reading of the Creed d'Reeve by Muggletonian Harry Kelly '78. The fifteen or so members of the Williams Green Ribbon Society and Muggletonian Prayer Group stand to applaud the speaker as he is forced to quaff a glass of Miller High Life for his inexcusable malapropism.

He will keep in mind for the next meeting that shrive is pronounced "shreeve". Members rejoice in this opportunity to fortify themselves with much cheering and loud "Quaff Ye"s.

Stumbling in on one of these humble meetings one might witness a burning at the stake (in this case at the fireplace at the Log) of Guy Faulkes by honorary cremationist Wit McKay, or the defenestration of the first papist of the year by the group's charter members. (Co-founder Harry Kelly will undoubtedly retrieve his newspaper-stuffed dummy from below the Log's first story window after the meeting).

At the shout of "Up with the diggers! Down with the levelers!" the Muggletonians rise to parade through the Log to the time of a gutteral, Old-English chant, commonly believed to have been first used in the movie, "The Wizard of Oz". A stout, foolish-looking figure bearing a miniature garden spade leads the gang on the march.

Witnesses muse over the possible intentions of the group, often voicing their bewilderment with comments like, "What the hell?" and "A Titus what?", but few are inspired to the point of participation.

It all started late in the year 366 Anno Muggleton (last fall), in Professor Dudley Bahlman's famed course, History 323: Tudor and Stewart England. Class discussion of England's infamous historical figure Titus Oates revealed to Harry Kelly and Sean Connolly a definite need in the Williams community for the discussion and recognition of something totally irrelevant. Titus Oates is just that something.

To describe Oate's physique in particular is to discuss his character in general. Not only is he high on the list of England's twelve most despicable men in history, but he must have also made the twelve most ugly list. His face, bifurcated by his protruding lips, is easily recognizable on member's T-shirts, but somehow the purplish complexion was lost in the transfer. A flattering portrait of this genius for evil can be found in the 1969 American Heritage Dictionary's illustration for the word "pillory."

Oates was the 1670s' Joe McCarthy of Catholicism at a time when Englishmen looked under their beds at night for Catholics. The public finally took notice of Oates when Sir Edmund Barry Godfrey, a judge helping in the Catholic removal, was found murdered at the bottom of Primrose Hill. The ever-insidious Oates was not dismissed as a suspect to the crime. He continually disclosed bogus papal plots to assassinate Charles II and then attempted to verify them with self-forged documents. (A wiley one, that Oates).

Another scoundrel of the times, Lord Shaftsbury, seized upon Oates as a method to gain power and influence in Parliament. His Green Ribbon Club held meetings in a coffee-house to fabricate papist schemes and plot the downfall of the opposition. Eventually the club's exploits became so outlandish as to warrant action by the King, resulting in Lord Shaftsbury's exile and the incarceration of Titus Oates.

Housing Choice

The Student Housing Committee's proposal that housing inclusion categories be expanded to five (see article page 1) is the most appropriate organization of houses given the random inclusion system. To some extent, there is less chance of preserving diversity with this system. (The probability of two groups getting into the same house under the most advantageous conditions rises from under 40 per cent to over 50 per cent.) However, the categories represent a better grouping of houses according to housing type and popularity. Thus, although the statistic used to describe students getting their first choice may drop, the actual number of students getting in their first choice house or type of house should remain constant or even rise.

Specifically, the present four categories link Dodd House, which offers a different type housing situation than Fitch and Prospect House with Fitch and Prospect. The fact that a student gets into Prospect House is recorded by College officials as meeting his first choice. In fact, that student may have preferred Dodd and even housing in some other category to Prospect.

The Committee on Undergraduate Life is discussing a proposal to reduce the number of categories to three (including Dodd with the Row Houses and Fitch and Prospect with Mission Park and Greylock). This fails to completely solve the problem of linking substantially different housing types and at the same time, reduces student choice. On the grounds of more appropriate housing groupings and greater student choice with a minimal loss in diversity through randomness, the Housing Committee's proposal is superior to the present set-up and the proposal now before the CUL.

Therefore, we urge the CUL to adopt the plan or endorse the right of the Housing Committee to set housing categories.

No More Band-Aids

You can bet your paycheck at Green Mountain every week that some aspects of this college will never change. The timing of events is a point in case. One weekend we'll be treated to 43 athletic events, 107 lectures, 18 plays, and 1,001 movies. The next four weekends? Nothing. The old rule of thumb that everything at Williams must happen at once is applied with such consistency that both the college community and the performers ultimately end up as losers.

Unfortunately, this syndrome seems to have struck the various committees on campus as well. During the past two weeks the college community has been bombarded with enough reports and proposals from major committees to keep the Hopkins Hall lights burning through June.

But with the Thanksgiving crunch of hour exams and papers in full swing, how many of us have taken the time to study these proposals, or at least kept abreast of them?

If you haven't already, gang, start soon, because a lot of these proposals aren't nickel and dime affairs. In the past week alone the CUL has tenetatively adopted a new transfer policy and discussed a rigorous and critical report on alcohol abuse, the Housing Committee has proposed new inclusion groupings, the Calendar and Scheduling Commiteee has toyed with the idea of ending classes a week early, the Student Standing Committee has inexplicably "postponed" a proposed tenure questionnaire, the CAP has studied a new timetable for tenure review, and the Faculty Steering Committee has "resolved" the open meeting debate in a dismaying display of casual consideration.

The deliberations of the CUL and the Housing Committee warrant further comment. On the surface, the Housing Committee's proposal is very straight forward: subtract Dodd from the Fitch-Prospect grouping, Tyler from the row house grouping, and add the two houses together to create a fifth housing category.

Although I'm still not convinced that this approach won't hinder rather than help matters, my main concern is not the proposal per se. Instead, it is the amount of random and often uninformed tampering of this sort that has plagued the residential housing system at Williams since its inception in 1962. The Housing Committee's latest proposal seems to be merely another band-aid applied to a system that neither administrators nor students fully understand.

Stop-gap measures of this sort only address short term maladies in the system. Who's to say we won't have to redefine the categories in two years? What will happen when the Droppers and Woodbridge houses enter the picture? Does anyone know the future of Garfield House or why the Administration has simply sat back and watched it detoriate to its present state?

The main problem with the housing system at Williams is not the system itself but our knowledge of that system and our understanding of where it's headed. For the past 14 years the housing situation has been in such a state of flux that committees have had to spend all their time correcting immediate problems and consequently have never developed an overall picture of the system itself.

I think it's about time we called a time-out and examined that system, spelling out not only what we've got but what we intend to do with it. It's high time the administration dealt with the fraternity issue instead of neatly side-stepping it, dealt with the paradox of fostering unity and fraternity-like social affairs in a system based on diversity, and dealt with the effect of the present Admissions policy on the housing system. If it takes another committee like the Angevine Committee to do the job effectively, then so be it, and sign me aboard. But no more band aids until we get a clearer picture of the bruises.

Letter: faculty not 'highest paid'

To the editor:

Ms. Margaret Graham's article titled "Eph Faculty Salaries Rate High" in the October 8, 1976 Williams Record was an admirable effort to untangle the American Association of University Professor's annual report covering the "Economic Status of the Profession, 1975-76." The chart comparing average compensation by rank with eleven roughly comparable private liberal arts colleges together with the national average was particularly helpful.

Unfortunately the article's headline and more particularly its first sentence ("Williams College professors are among the highest paid in the country,") were quite inaccurate. The proximity of Williams compensation by rank with the national average listed in the table accompanying the article should have been sufficient clue: Williams full professors were shown to be 1.3 thousand above the national average, associate professors but $400 above, and assistant professors actually $700 below.

Additional data available from the AAUP indicates that, far from being "... among the highest paid in the country," faculty at 167 other colleges and universities receive higher average compensation (salaries plus fringe benefits), those at 188 receive higher salaries, and approximately 240 received higher proportional raises than Williams continuing faculty did between '74-'75 and '75-'76.

Still, those with higher average compensation than Williams are not necessarily "large" or distinguished by graduate programs. Would you believe that there are 14 community colleges that report higher average compensation than Williams (up to $7,162 higher)? Would you have guessed that among the four-year colleges that reported higher average compensation are Kutztown (+$872), Lock Haven (+$993), East Stroudsburg (+$1,107), Shippensburg (+$1,216), Slippery Rock (+$1,452), Bloomsburg (+$1,472), Millersville (+$1,560), Montgomery (+$1,700), and Cheney (+$2,615)? Less startling may be Kalamazoo (+$601), Pomona (+$847), Harvey Mudd (+$1,541), and Amherst (+$2,351).

Ms. Graham was careful to compare Williams, in the body of her article, with what she termed "similar institutions." Unfortunately these were declared "similar" because they "offered only the baccalaureate or equivalent degree." For the latter she could appropriately cite the authority of the AAUP's own set of categories which eliminate from most of the comparisons with Williams not only institutions offering a reasonable number of doctorates in a number of fields but also those "awarding degrees above the baccalaureate but not including the former category," as well as two-year institutions and those without academic rank.

Here things get murky. As a one-time member of the national AAUP's Committee Z ("Economic Status of the Profession"), I am well aware of the compromises that have to be made to fit unique institutions into rigid categories as well as the necessity of maintaining sufficient rapport with the American Association of Colleges (an equivalent organization for administrators) to maintain their cooperation in soliciting compensation date from their membership.

Still, Williams does not fit the category into which it has been placed in the AAUP compensation comparisons which Ms. Graham used. It has not limited itself to "awarding only the baccalaureate or equivalent degree" for at least the past 15 years. An MA in Developmental Economics has been available over that period, while more recently an MA in the History of Art has been inaugurated—with the result that some 30 degrees beyond "the baccalaureate or equivalent" have been granted per year of late.

These activities of the College—together with the fact that we compete in recruitment of faculty with major universities offering the doctorate and occasionally lose faculty to such institutions—would seem to suggest that students, faculty, administration, trustees, alumni, and parents—indeed, all who read The Williams Record and-or the AAUP Bulletin—would do well to make their assessments of the relative position in which Williams is placed in terms of compensation with considerable care. If, for instance, one were to examine our compensation levels as bait to recruit or keep creative scholars and teachers in competition with private universities offering a reasonable number of doctorates in a number of fields (all such universities, the good, the bad, and the indifferent) one would discover that Williams fell among the lowerst 10 per cent for full professors, the lowest 15 per cent for associate professors, and the lowest 11 per cent for associate professors.

The fundamental intent of this letter is to suggest that faculty have not been attracted to—or remained at—Williams because of monetary reasons. Something else draws them and holds them: the quality of the students, the relatively "personal" methods which its administrators have been capable of maintaining, the collegial atmosphere that extends beyond one's discipline or "division," and, quite possibly, the gemutlich atmosphere of Williamstown itself.

If any of us came because we seriously thought that "Williams College professors are among the highest paid in the country," we would have been terribly misled.

Bob Friedrichs, Sociology

Calendar approved, may need reform

"The easiest way to gain seven days during the year so we can move up graduation would be to shorten spring vacation or the Winter Study period," committee chairman Paul G. Clark concluded. Howard noted that Williams is also one of few colleges with a two week break in late March.

The obvious alternative to major reductions in the Winter Study or spring break periods would be taking a few days here and there throughout the calendar. The committee considered many options including reducing pre-exam reading periods, eliminating winter recess and cutting Winter Study and spring vacation by two or three days each.

Correction

In Tuesday's Record article, "CAP convenes for tenure," the "junior members" who "are included in tenure discussions in political science" refers to students and not to junior faculty members. Junior faculty members do not take part in the tenure decision in political science, according to department chairman Kurt Tauber.

NEWS BRIEFS

The number of Early Decision applications is presently close to last year's total of 543, Director of Admissions, Philip F. Smith announced. Although the application deadline was Monday, Smith said he expects to have about 550 applications by today as the Admissions office is accepting stragglers.

Acceptance decisions will be made on December 7 and 8; responses will be sent by December 15. Last year 302 men and 240 women applied. It was the first year more women than men were accepted—76-78. The decisions are made in a sex-blind process.

As to the percentage of the 1981 class to be accepted early, Smith said, "We're giving ourselves a 30 per cent maximum; we're consistent over the years in not accepting more." At the absolute maximum, 480 would be accepted. Last year 496 were accepted in toto.

Under the ED plan, those selected must withdraw applications to other colleges. Those not accepted ED are deferred to regular admission.

The Elections Committee is accepting self nominations for three positions on the Junior Advisor Selection Committee. According to committee adviser Lauren Stevens, juniors and seniors who haven't been JA's are eligible. Applications are due by Dec. 1.

The 28-member committee, composed mainly of current and former JA's, will select next year's advisers. The selection process will begin early next semester, Stevens said.

Yes readers, I've gone Parisian. But don't think just because I've gotten away from turkey tetrazini, down jackets, honey-buns with mocha ice cream (my fav!), 7-10 pg. papers, captain's chairs, and Music in the Round, that everything's one big bowl of crepe suzettes! No gang, the big world outside the "Ivory Tower" of Williams has its problems too—and in my characteristically astutely way I continue to be sensitive to the surroundings around me. And you back in Billsville will be pleased to hear (and read) that Paris—an entire continent away from the purple valley—has some very similar features to Williams College. I speak specifically about conformity and phobias.

Oh God, do these frenchies conform! Everyone is snotty, especially to Americans, when they should be nicest to us the most. I mean, if it wasn't for us in World War Two—pffft, flash, burn, there goes Gay Paree!

Speaking of "Gay" Paree, Williams has nothing on Paris in that department. Lots of people are gay here, and if they're not, they sure look it. But that's all right; I've gotten to know some of them, you know, platonically. I'll give a full report when I return in the spring.

Oh, back to conformism. They all speak the same language, dress very much alike, and no one plays a musical instrument, even out of duress like back at Williams. I haven't read much about it, but conformity seems to be the biggest problem in France. It's like England's pound problem, but it's going up instead of down.

And phobias! What the American Heritage Dictionary would call, "any obsessing or morbid fear or dread," I would call the national past-time here in France. Although there is undoubtedly that vast array of phobias I have investigated in the States, my purpose is to expose that overwhelming phobia which inflicts these people: the feat of getting close to other people.

The first thing I did when I got into the Paris Airport was to try to communicate, to reach out, to relate. I said to myself, "I'm not in France to hang around with Americans (although some of my best friends are Americans.)" So . . . "Bon Jour Mr. Customs Man . . . Avoir Mr. Taxi Driver . . . Bon Apetit Bartender!" But the french have a phobia about relating to foreign people. Really, they do! Nobody has spoken to me, looked at me, or shown any interest at all for the past two months. Williams is an "uninhibited haven" compared to this icy place. They also have a phobia about female columnists; I've been trying to get a column in Le Monde ("Un Femme's Pointe de Viewe") for a long time now, but . . . these horrible snotty french, I can't stand them! I'm lonely, disgusted, I haven't gotten a bit of mail in weeks, I've lost my column in the Record to some male twink, Oh God! I wish I was home, Oh God . . . god . . . god . . . .

IRS plans investigation of tuition aid to staff

by Dave Macgregor

The Internal Revenue Service announced November 2 proposed new regulations to tax as income the tuition benefits given by colleges to children of faculty and staff. According to Business Manager Shane Riorden, the regulations would become effective in the fall of 1977.

The IRS will hold hearings in December on the regulations, said Riorden, and will hear representatives of the American Council on Education speaking against the regulations. "Possibly the IRS will relent somewhat," he said. The College is presently "watching what the government and other colleges do," commented Riorden.

The proposed regulations would "treat as compensation to the employee for services provided" any tuition assistance given to faculty and staff children "unless the employee can establish that the program is not compensatory in nature," according to the Federal Register.

Williams now pays each faculty and staff member either half the tuition cost at the college attended, or half of what Williams charges for tuition, whichever is less. Riorden estimated that between 35 and 40 children of faculty and staff attend college each year under this system.

He did not expect Williams to be placed at a "competitive disadvantage relative to other private colleges" in hiring faculty and staff since all colleges would have to reduce after-tax salaries offered by the same amount as a result of the new regulations." In the long run the whole occupation is made less attractive" by the tax, said Riorden. He noted that most hiring occurs when the prospective faculty are relatively young, so tuition benefits are not a vital factor.

The proposed tax creates the most problems for faculty and staff hired under the old system whose children are now reaching college age, said Riorden, who presently has two daughters attending college under the College's tuition program.

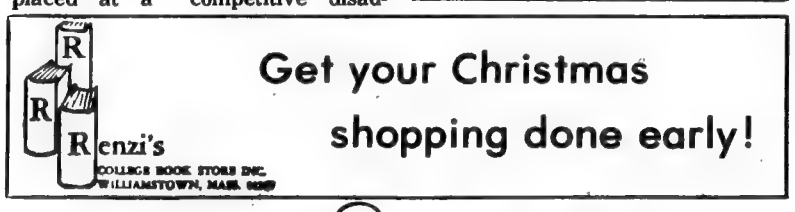
According to Riorden, the program was set up as a form of "professional courtesy," whereby colleges would help their faculty and staff children to pay for higher education. In addition, tuition assistance was a means of compensating college personnel for their generally lower salaries, he said.

This is the last issue of the Record before Thanksgiving. Publication will resume on Tuesday, November 30. Deadline for copy will be Sunday, Nov. 28 at 2 p.m. as usual.

Letter: recommendation to CUL on alcohol use

The following is a letter [10/28/76] from Curt Tong, chairman of CUL subcommittee on alcohol to Earl McFarland, chairman of the Committee on Undergraduate Life, concerning the Committee report on use of alcohol on campus.

Recent months have brought focus to the issue of alcohol and some of the financial, social and physiological ramifications of its use on the Williams campus.



What seems plain is that there are varied opinions concerning the financial aspects of the problem and this was substantiated by the finding of the CUL survey of the student body which reflected that twenty per cent of those surveyed felt that too much money was being spent on alcoholic beverages by the respective houses on campus. Twenty-three per cent stood at the other pole on the question. It would seem that the stance of the College on this phase of the matter should be one of protection—protection of the interests of those students who either do not drink or do so moderately but who are being bilked of monies through dues assessments by house officers for use of alcohol purchases and protection of the rights of those students who choose to drink more heavily.

Recommendation: (1) Abolish house social dues above the $20.00 currently assessed each student on their college bill as a House Maintenance Tax. (2) It seems that the elimination of "open bar" practices at house parties would be a way to hold alcohol costs below the financial level already appropriated each house through the House Maintenance Tax. At the very least, it would seem advisable that those houses which wish to continue "open bar" or other drinking traditions, protect the interest of non-drinkers by keeping separate books on the nature of house membership or establish a format by which all house members are appraised of their status for each house social function.

Recommendation: That continual focus be placed on these kind of incidences through discussions in the campus newspaper or house forums. The college is not of a mind to legislate students' personal lives on matters of this kind and this seems justifiable, but it does seem feasible that a greater consciousness of the problem can surface with resulting student self-legislation if concerned parties "raise a voice" about these matters when it is appropriate to do so.

One disturbing element in most of the discussions to date on alcohol-centered problems has been the absence of competent opinions on the physiological-related problems of alcohol intake. For some students, at least, there is some initial cultural shock in entering an institution where drinking, in many of the houses, is an expected ritual. It would seem that something is wrong in a system where the early impressions of underclassmen, that acceptance on campus depended upon ones' ability or willingness to imbibe ethyl alcohol, are nurtured by many groups on campus. All of this runs counter to sound educational thought which points to the tragedy of chemical dependency that alcohol can place on human beings after varying amounts of drinking, with no pattern common to all drinkers.

Recommendation: (1) Work through the Junior Advisors with an emphasis on friendly persuasion to minimize the use of alcohol at orientation and other social functions and that other options to alcohol be discreetly provided. (2) That a formalized education program be provided to the students which incorporates the scientific truths regarding the effects of alcohol on human physiology.

Town considers plans for Water Street beautification

by Karen Walker

The Williamstown Planning Board is considering proposals to rezone and beautify Water Street from Main to Latham.

According to a local planner, Water Street will resemble a historical district with a number of different architectural eras represented.

Twanette Garvey, an architectural designer, has submitted sketches of the area which depict a covered bridge leading to Green River Park, brick sidewalks, conforming signs and gaslight street lamps. Presently the area has industrial architecture on one side of the street and the commercial business buildings on the other.

Boston planner Carol Thomas, who received a $10,000 grant from the state for a six-month study of Route Two, responded to Williamstown's request for help on the beautification and unification of Water Street. She stressed the importance of setting some design directives on the area. She explained to the planning board that individual historical sites can be zoned for protection in an area which is already zoned for other use.

Thomas asked that the board "survey the buildings on the street and consider some form of control which would unify the area." The aim of the town's study is to make the Water Street area "an economically viable and attractive area."

One member of the planning board said that he felt the Water Street area could be "a dynamic part of Williamstown—an important area of the community."

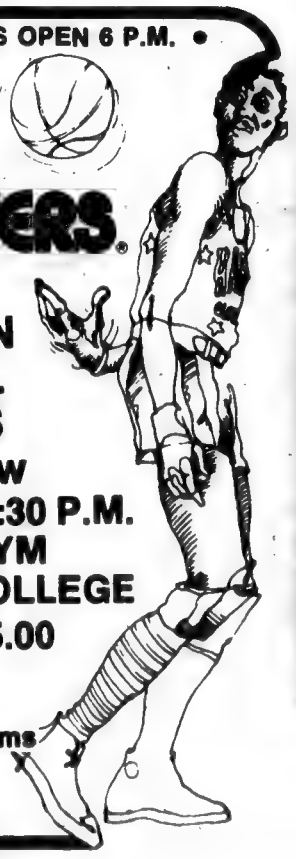
The proposals on the renovation of Water Street are currently in embryo stages. The Board agreed that further plans might not be considered for several more months.

Carol Thomas, who is in the first month of her study on Route 2, also claims that the area along the State Road, directly to the east of Williamstown and North Adams is in need of work. The area is typical of the "Golden Arch" architecture of the 1950's and 60's which competes garrishly for the attention of the traveller. She will urge state control of signs and commercial co-operation when action on the beautification of route comes under state review at the end of her study.

CC bylaw revisions readied

The College Council By-Laws Committee should present a rewritten council constitution early next month, completing the first of its two tasks for the year, according to committee chairman Stuart Ginsberg '77.

The rewriting accompanies the codification of the council's by-laws, the committee's second task. The two are related, Ginsberg noted, because sections of the present constitution which are too specific or procedural will be placed in the new by-laws.



Adoption of the constitution requires a college-wide referendum; changes in the by-laws are approved by the CC.

The committee has been working on the new constitution since September. Ginsberg projected that it would come to a student referendum about a month after its presentation to the College Council, probably sometime during Winter Study. In the interim the council would rework the recommendations to incorporate its members' ideas.

"Actually not a great deal will be changed in substance," the by-laws chairman remarked. He noted that the present constitution was not only too specific in some sections, but "too vague" in others. He cited standardization of election proceedings, particularly the specifying of an election day, as a change to counteract present vagueness.

Swimmers lose first

by Dennis O'Shea

Last year's Williams-UMass-Mount Holyoke swim meet was one of the most two-sided triangular contests ever: the Ephwomen were innocent bystanders as the two Connecticut Valley Titans battled it out for the championship of northwestern Massachusetts. UMass took it 108-76-46.

This season there's a new Titan on the block, and it was the Holyoke girls who stood to one side as the Ephs tussled with the Minutewomen Wednesday night coming out just shy of an upset victory, 87-81-64. The oh-so-close defeat—a few tenths of a second made all the difference—was the Purple's first since this same meet a year ago.

For the third meet in a row, soph Marilla Pearsall won the 100, 200, and 500 freestyles, and this time, just for variety, shared a College record breaking 200 freestyle relay effort. She also notched a 500 free pool record to go with the 100 fly and 100 individual medley standards she owns from last year.

Randall Morrow and Joanna Monroe, along with Keron Walker, also got pieces of the free relay record, and joined with Nina Murphy and Sue Tuttle in snapping the 200 medley relay mark of 2:03.8 by two-tenths. Walker won the 50 freestyle by nearly a second, and took seconds in the 100 i.m. and 50 fly.

Junior Carol-Ann Smalley pulled off another "Smalley Surprise" (patent pending), this time passing a pair of opponents late in the race to finish second in her heat of the 500 free, behind Pearsall, and third overall.

Smalley swims a devious race. She blasts off the blocks, drops immediately off the pace and lags behind for at least 300 yards. On lap 14 or so, when everyone else is exhausted from trying to swim with Pearsall, she's still zinging along at the same pace and just blows by them. Her second 250 Wednesday was only 3.8 seconds slower than her first.

fanatic of the 1690's, started his own faith in which he became the second Christ. It was not uncommon for a Muggleton believer to stand at a service stamping his feet for fifteen minutes at a time chanting, "Muggleton, Muggleton, Muggleton . . ." etc. Such were the times.

It is the antics of both Titus Oates and Muggleton that form the basis for the Williams Green Ribbon Society and Muggletonian Prayer Group. The two upper-classmen, Sean Connolly '78 and Harry Kelly started the group as Connolly said, "kind of as a joke and a way to meet new people" but having come this far find its direction for the future uncertain.

At the first meeting, acting sermonist Dudley Bahlman spoke on the reinstatement of fraternities here, referring to them as "latterday Jesuits and frat rats sponsored by foreign powers using alien alphabets."

He jokingly credited the disbandment of the Adelphic Society to the group, (as he noted) claiming that "Such was the speedy effect of our organized presence; the society was swept as if by the great Protestant wind that guided the noble Prince of Orange." Bahlman's bull, as it was termed then, was met with wild cheers and may or may not be the true prophecy for the Williams Muggletonians and Fans of Titus Oates.

persuasion. Members agreed that greater consciousness is needed regarding the alcohol problem concluding that the issue should be discussed frequently in both the Record and in house forums.

The CUL also conceded that the extensive use of alcohol during freshman days establishes an atmosphere which encouraged drinking. Junior Advisors should be urged to help persuade freshmen to de-emphasize the use of alcohol, they concluded.

Members of the CUL also proposed that college funded social functions not offer alcohol, a recommendation not included in the report. Although the CUL seems unwilling to dictate policy to the houses, the committee stressed the importance of offering non-alcoholic beverages at all house activities.

Knight directs Coward's satire

Cozy setting catches 'Fever'

by Stephen Bernheim

What starts out as a wonderful night at the theater ends up as a horrible night in the country. Why? Because Michael Knight decided to throw together four actors, five actresses, the Dodd House living room and a breath of fresh air to cook up Hay Fever, one of Noel Coward's charming, disarming, and alarming satires of English life. The story concerns the Bliss family (a mother, a father, a sister and a brother) the members of which each invite a dear friend to the country for the weekend—each without telling anyone else. The eight people come together and spend their time ever so politely devouring each other while the maid is left to clean up the mess. But what are the ingredients of Knight's successful concoction?

Betsy Beers and Carol Ann Soybel carry on a most savage and winsome mother-daughter competition for attention while Theoharis C. Theoharis, the Bliss patriarch, moves from passivity to vanity to, yes, erotic passion. As visitors to the Bliss household Andrew Gerra and Paul Robinson show themselves to be perfectly in tune with the Coward blithe spirit of simplemindedness and self-modkery that he so enjoyed.

Why the Dodd House living room? The question answers itself. At least it begins to answer itself. The truth of the matter is that a living room is a comfortable, low-key place to produce a comfortable, low-key play that (oddly enough) is set in a living room of a country home, which brings us to the final point . . .

A breath of fresh air and at long last Coward. Knight deserves praise for taking a few Williams productions away from Strindberg, Ibsen (yes, Ibsen), Brecht, and Pinter (even Pinter!). Coward is no genius; he is a clever playwright and a wit. His plays are clever and witty plays, and they are easily enjoyed.

So what is the recipe? A funny play in a cozy room with a wonderfully competent cast will always make a hit. In fact, I don't think anyone can sneeze at Hay Fever.

CALENDAR

Jazz Concert

The Williams Jazz Ensemble will be in concert tonight at 8:00 in Chapin Hall. The program spans 50 years of jazz and features music of the Big Band Era and the jazz-rock fusion of the '70's.

The ensemble began as a student initiated winter study project five years ago. Since that time, the band has played at parties and dances on campus and has appeared in concert with professional guest artists. Recently, the band had expanded its repertoire, adding modern works to its nucleus of swing tunes. Tonights concert is open to the public. Admission is 50c.

Sweet Adelines

The Mt. Greylock Chapter of Sweet Adelines, Inc., an international four-part harmony organization for women, will be presenting its first annual show titled This Is Our Music tomorrow evening at 8:00 p.m. at Drury High School in North Adams. Entertaining with this 40-member award-winning ladies barbershop chorus from the Williamstown-North Adams area will be 1976 Region 1 Champion Quartet from Connecticut—the Fine and Dandy, and the 1975 International Champions from Michigan—the Front Office Four. The Afterglow, a more informal and relaxed presentation after the main show, will be held at the Sons of Italy Lodge in North Adams. Tickets will be available at the door.

Arts Workshop

The Northern Berkshire Council of the Arts in cooperation with The Gallery on Spring Street will present a free "Talents to Share" Workshop tomorrow from 2 to 4 P.M. Antoinette Tysziewski of Pittsfield will demonstrate her skill of Polish paper cut-outs, that she learned in her native Poland. Tysziewski has gone back to Poland for summer folk art courses at the Jajielloin University in Krakow, one of the oldest universities in Europe.

Polish cut-outs or Wycinanka, are made by folk artists from brightly colored paper by means of large scissors usually used for shearing sheep. Without using a pencilled outline, the artists cut out spontaneously, stylized flowers, trees, leaves and various animals and people. The cut-out motifs are then set against a white or colored background and then ornamented with colored tissue paper. Tysziewski will also have an exhibit of her Polish folk art during the month of December at the Berkshire Museum in Pittsfield.

Theater Colloquium

A film of the Open Theater production of Jean-Claude van Itallie's The Serpent will be shown this Monday at 4:00 p.m. in 111 Thompson Biology Laboratory. The film is sponsored by the departments of Theater and English and is being shown in conjunction with a colloquium to be given by van Itallie on Words in Today's Theater at 4:00 p.m. on Monday Nov. 29 in Driscoll Lounge.

Van Itallie is one of modern American theater's most important playwrights. His The Serpent, which was conceived in conjunction with Joseph Chaikin and the Open Theater, is one of the classic pieces from the early off-off broadway experimental theater.

Student Dance Organization

The Williams College Dance Society will hold an organizational meeting in the Dance Studio of Lasell Gymnasium this Monday at 5:15 p.m. All interested members of the College community are invited to participate in two proposed student concerts.

The first concert under consideration is an American Dance Retrospective. This project will encompass American Dance from folk to vaudeville to tap. In order to make this project viable, dancers and non-dancers are needed. Anyone interested in doing historical research, technical stage work, dancing, choreography, costuming, etc. is urged to come to this meeting.

The second concert is envisioned as an evening of modern dance to be held in the Rotunda of Lawrence Hall. This concert is geared towards experienced dancers who would like to experiment with their own choreography.

Few who choose contract major can create unique course of study

by Nancy Richman

"I didn't like the idea of taking something like Political Science as a discipline in itself. I was losing interest in school," explained Mary McCord '78 when discussing her reasons for choosing her contract major, "Theories of Political Action and Social Change." McCord opted for a comprehensively integrated study of the development of third world nations; she chooses courses from such diverse departments as Economics, History, Anthropology and Political Science.

The contrast major option was made available two years ago; the first two students to have tried it, Dianne Thompson and John Garner, will graduate this June. Last month the faculty approved a Committee on Educational Policy motion establishing a route to a degree with honors.

Currently seven students are creating their own course of study at Williams this year.

A contract major, explains Dean Peter Berek must do an extra amount of work, both in formulating his proposal and in keeping in close contact throughout with his two faculty advisers. Berek commented that "that combination is likely to mean that you've got highly qualified students doing quality work."

Larry Mitchell '78 says that he spends an "incredible" amount of time on his contract major which is entitled "The History of American Ideas." He explained, "All the courses that I'm taking now are in my major. I'm really enjoying it though. I can take the courses that I want instead of having to follow a prescribed sequence."

Two students are taking advantage of the college's various exchange programs in devising their contract majors. Keith Wilson, '78 is currently at Wellesley College pursuing his chosen field of "Chinese Stueies," while Louise Harra, '78 attends the University of Kyoto and engages in "Japanese Studies."

Berek reports that as of yet, there have not been that many applicants for the program. Although the number of students permitted by CEP ruling to participate is 10 per class, Berek says that he has turned down some.

CEP approves course, changes registration

by Chip Buckner

The Committee on Educational Policy approved a student initiated course, discussed the possible future of Japanese language instruction and concluded some old business at their meeting yesterday.

The CEP unanimously approved Biology 488—Avian Biology, proposed by Kenneth Leghorn '78, Bruce Stevenson '78, and Donald Weber '79, for second semester. Faculty sponsor Lee C. Drickamer told the committee that the course would incorporate "the concepts and processes of avian biology."

Students will conduct lectures on such topics as Zoogeography, Avian Anatomy and Bird Biology.

The committee decided to take no action on the question of whether to bring a native Japanese language instructor to Williams. College Chaplain John D. Eusden discovered that the Japan Foundation would provide "variable matching" funds for three years to help pay for an additional instructor. The CEP expressed a desire to expand non-Western studies, but reacted skeptically to this proposal.

Objectors cited the extra costs not projected by the foundation, library books, office space, etc. Dean Neil R. Grabois noted that if we were to keep faculty size constant, an addition here would require a cut in another department. Course offerings lost elsewhere, he observed, might outweigh the gains in Japanese because demand for upper level Japanese would necessarily be low for the first few years, and a language instructor might not be able to conduct literature courses in English.

Economics professor Gordon C. Winston called the whole thing "a case of benefit—benefit analysis."

The CEP approved a change in fifth course registration. Now students will register for four courses and after two weeks will ask their fifth instructor for permission to stay in his course. No formal fifth course registration will occur until the sixth week of classes. Hopefully this will reduce the paper work required when students add and drop courses during the first six weeks.

CUL accepts five-category housing setup

Members of the Committee on Undergraduate Life accepted the Housing Committee's recommendation of a revised, five-category inclusion system, in its meeting Monday, November 22. The new system groups Dodd and Tyler in one category, Fitch and Prospect in another and leaves the remaining three categories, Greylock, Mission Park and the Row Houses, unchanged.

The committee voiced no opposition to the Housing Committee's proposal. Director of Student Housing, Charles M. Jankey said he would "prefer to go to two categories" but added that "a five category system is okay seeing as switching to two groups doesn't seem possible."

The category re-alignment expands the number of options open to freshmen and house transfers. CUL chairman Earl L. McFarland said he is "not against student choice as long

see CUL page 3

The semester-end crunch chains many students to long late nights hunched over unfinished manuscripts which become blurred in the harsh neon light. All suitable study implements are within easy reach in the above set-up, but the presence of the opened knife is somewhat disturbing. (Read)

Students plan course guide again

The Student Course Guide Committee will distribute a course questionnaire similar to last year's survey "before Christmas vacation," according to committee chairman Sarah Baldwin '78. Numerical and written student evaluations of fall courses will be summarized and published in the spring, in time to aid students in registering for 1977-78 courses, she said.

Written responses for each course will be summarized by a student volunteer taking the course being evaluated, said Baldwin. Student editors for each department will help to screen out biased comments. She added that the committee would invite professors to respond to student course comments, and these faculty responses would be published in the guide.

The committee aims for a 75 per cent response, according to Baldwin. Written comments on a course which received a low percentage of responses would not be summarized and published unless all were similar, in which case they might be included, she said. The guide will indicate the response percentage for each course.

According to Rick Siegrist '77, editor of last year's guide and advisor to the current committee, there is "no magic number" of responses necessary to make a guide valid. The number "depends on the size of the course," he said, but added that it is "very possible" that some courses would not be evaluated at all if the response is too small.

The committee hopes to increase student participation by publicizing the questionnaire more extensively, according to Baldwin. Student representatives in each house will collect responses, which should increase participation, she said.

Siegrist felt that a libel suit by faculty criticized in the guide, which was rumored last year, "was not a realistic possibility last year and is an even less realistic possibility this year." The problem arose last year when time pressure forced the committee to publish student comments verbatim instead of in summary, as originally planned, he explained. The committee eventually decided to publish only numerical evaluations after the possibility of libel arose. This year's committee will have more time and will summarize written comments, so no problems should arise this year, he added.

Dean of the Faculty Neil Grabois attributed the threatened libel suit to "special problems last year," such as students expecting their comments to be summarized, instead of being quoted verbatim.

While commending the concept of a course guide as useful to both students and faculty, Grabois had reservations about student summaries of written comments. He described the summaries as "an awkward situation" that is "if not misleading, open to misemphasis." An alternative would be to have students sign their evaluations to avoid the "small minority" of "malicious" criticisms, he said, but recognized that this approach also presented problems, such as achieving a significant reponse rate.

Grabois also hoped that the committee would take care that a high response percentage was attained, since the results would be "more balanced and useful" to students and faculty "if a substantial number of students respond." The timing last year was a problem, he said, since when the course guide questionnaire was distributed last year, students had just finished completing several other questionnaires and were therefore less willing and able to give a proper amount of thought to the guide. This resulted in a low rate of response rate, said Grabois.

Xeroxing guidelines revised

by Garrick Leonard

The Williams Library Committee will submit a resume of copyrighting guidelines to the Deans who will decide "how the guidelines will be enforced, what to tell teachers, and what sort of rules are to be given to Xerox operators," according to committee chairman Nicholas Fersen.

The United States Congress recently passed a revision of the 1909 Copyright Act which would strictly limit both the number of photocopies a person may make from a copyrighted work and the length of the section copied. If President Ford signs the bill, as expected, the law will codify the concept of "fair use," a previously unwritten rule which the courts have used to justify unauthorized copying by teachers and researchers.

The new copyright guidelines passed by Congress and awaiting the signature of President Ford may force the students and faculty to alter their "xeroxing" behaviors.

The faculty discussed the new law at their last meeting. Fersen reported that "President Chandler said he wanted all the faculty to consider how the law would affect their teaching of classes." These effects will be discussed at the next meeting along with the Deans' proposed enforcement regulations. "The regulations and suggestions for implementation will be made public and take effect following that meeting," Fersen said.

Under the new law, teachers will be prohibited from making multiple copies of a work for classroom use if it has already been copied for another class in the same institution, or of a story, essay, article or short poem from the same author more than once in a class term.

Originally, the bill permitted unrestricted duplication of copyrighted materials for purposes such as criticism, comment, news-reporting, teaching, scholarship, or research, depending in each case on the purpose and character of the use, the nature of the copyrighted work, the amount and substantiality of the used portion in relation to the entire work, and the effect of the use or the market for the work.

In the final version of the bill, Congress retained this language but appended a report to help explain the legislation. The specific guidelines in the report were drawn up by an ad-hoc group of educators, librarians and publishing representatives.

The legislation permits copying of specific items such as poems, under 250 words and printed on not more than two pages, excerpts from a longer poem not exceeding 250 words; and excerpts from prose works, under 1000 words or 10 percent of the work whichever is less.

The Chronicle of Higher Education explains that the law allows a teacher to make single copies of "a chapter from a book, an article from a periodical or newspaper, a short story, essay or poem, a chart, diagram, drawing, cartoon or picture from a book, periodical, or newspaper," for use in scholarly research, teaching, or in preparation for teaching.

For interlibrary loan purposes (a procedure which enables a library to request copies of a rare issue of a periodical from another institution), libraries will be allowed to make six copies per year of a periodical

Barrier law affects building

The proposed 4.5 million dollar renovation of Chapin Hall will include constructions which will conform to the Massachusetts State Physical Barriers Law, according to Business Manager Shane Riorden.

The law requires that all new school constructions and any renovations on existing structures which will amount to over 15 per cent of the value of the original building be equipped to accomodate the handicapped. In addition to access ramps, the law calls for elevators in multi-story buildings and accessible lavatories.

After an encounter with the lawful requirements in the summer of 1975, Riorden said that the college will continue to comply with the legislation and accomodate the needs of handicapped students as they arise. "We'll adapt on a case-by-case basis," he commented.

Last year Williams converted part of its heating plant into a sculpture studio. Renovation estimates ran well over the projected value of the original property, which was essentially a garage, and the college was forced to comply with the newly adopted law. As a result, contractors built a $4,000 ramp to alleviate the four-foot drop between the door to the studio and the floor. The ramp is over twenty feet long in order to comply with further state regulations that its incline not exceed one inch per foot.

According to General Foreman of Buildings and Grounds Ralph Iacuessa, the school considered alternate methods of meeting the federal requirements. The ramp would occupy a disproportionate amount of space in relation to the studio. However, the State Department of Public Safety ordered it built.

Riorden did not foresee problems in complying with the Physical Barriers Law. "The situation with the sculpture studio was a bit of a trial but there should be no trouble with new buildings," he stated. The law is not retroactive and will not affect the older structures on campus.

Report Card

Not completely unexpectedly, the fall of 1976 produced a number of challenges and changes for College officials. Enrollment rose well above budgeted levels, new personnel took the helms of several key College offices and the College shifted into a centralized mail system. Although the Record has often criticized the actions, or inaction, of the various individuals and groups charged with governing Williams, an over-all evaluation of the government of the College this fall must come out on the positive side.

During the course of the summer, Mary Margaret Sloane replaced Hope Brothers as Director Of Career Counseling. Since then, by all reports, there has been an upward turn in the operations of the Office of Career Counseling. Pre-law students are reporting pleasant and helpful responses from the office. Assistant Director Sue Little has made a determined effort to improve the counseling of Mead Interns and to improve the College's contacts with alumni working in Washington. New staff member Jeff Wood is concentrating on improving the counseling for students seeking summer jobs.

Career Counseling has yet to face its biggest challenge, helping the often overly competitive seniors who are looking for jobs. We therefore, rate the changes in the Office of Career Counseling as Incomplete, but note it has an A average so far.

Most upperclassmen were pleasantly surprised at the short lines and smoother procedures of enrollment this September. Despite the increased enrollment, Registrar George C. Howard succeeded in removing most of the bottle-necks which had made enrollment in the past a long frustrating hassle. Also passing with flying colors, despite the unexpected number of returning students, was the new class assignment system developed by the Registrar and the Computer Laboratory. Unfortunately it is a very limited system, one which will remain inadequate to the needs of the College despite the praiseworthy efforts of College officials. The College needs to have a better idea of who is returning and when. There is no need to make students whose bills are in order go through essentially the same procedures those with delinquent bills do. Indeed, there really doesn't seem to be much reason for most students to go through a formal registration procedure. While Howard and other College officials deserve an A for making the present registration procedures workable, the present state of the registration process deserves a C+

In an editorial earlier this year, the RECORD endorsed the idea of one central location for student mail delivery, but opposed the way the decision to institute it was made without student input. We still support the idea and believe it has worked relatively well. Despite student complaints that it now takes longer for mail to be sorted, that their letters are crushed by magazines and that packages still get temporarily lost, we believe most students are satisfied with the system. It has allowed for quicker and substantially cheaper delivery of on campus mail. Although we recognize some of the architectural problems related to the mail room, we still do not believe that the layout chosen adequately avoids congestion. All in all, we give the concept of centralized mail an A-, but as it exists at Williams it earns a B.

In early July Ross Keller replaced David Woodruff as Director of Food Services. Since then, the quality and variety of food has improved substantially. The new food service administration has been responsive to such student requests as to expanding the hours of dining in the evening. Persons eating in what were generally considered the least desirable dining halls a year ago, Driscoll and Baxter, report substantial improvement in food quality as well as in attitudes of employees in both dining halls.

Record and other criticism of food services has focused on the fact that food services at Williams are not as good as they could be. But in evaluating changes in food services, we recognize that the improvements far exceed the deficiencies. Our rating: B+.

The faculty undercut its role as a significant governing body at Williams when, after a month's delay, it endorsed a resolution stating that student-faculty committees are normally closed but that a given committee could vote to open any particular meeting. The resolution clarified little; it dropped the question of whether students and faculty members have the right to view the deliberations of their representatives back in the hands of the committees from which the Steering Committee grabbed the question in October.

Even more serious than the specific faculty vote is the apparent attitude of some faculty members that students occupy a very secondary role in the generation of College policy. The College has a policy which is neither satisfactory nor clear. If only because the faculty could have decided to ban observers from all committee meetings, it does not merit an E. Instead, we award a D+.

The College Council under Steve Piltch has streamlined its procedures. The 10:30 curfew on its Tuesday evening meetings, initially questioned by the Record as threatening the ability of the CC to consider new business, has proved successful in reducing pointless debate. Nowhere have procedural improvements been more clear than in the recently completed Student Activities Tax funding process. Increasing the number of meetings devoted to funding from two to four allowed the CC to more evenly divide its consideration of proposed organization budgets. On the negative side, allocations of Student Activities Tax money was completed only a few days earlier than last year.

The Finance Committee has earned praise for its decision to attempt closer monitoring of organizational spending. However, whether the committee can implement these procedures remains to be seen.

The College Council has yet to earn all the prestige and respect it needs to be a more effectual organization. Its strong stand on open meetings was a step in the right direction. In rating the CC, we compare its performance this semester with its relatively poor performances in the last few years. It rates an A-.

Randumbness

by Larry Sanders

Randomness and Diversity. These are the two catch-all terms that have been bandied about here at Williams whenever the philosophical question of student housing is raised. The CUL and the Housing Committee grapple with these terms and issue recommendations that reflect a lot of hard work, but leave most students confused and asking, "What will this do to my living situation?"

The increasingly emphasized drive toward randomness has damaged the overall social life of the campus by placing the houses in the position of being the focal point of most students' social activities. Fraternities are gone and will not return. Barring the passage of a referendum legalizing casino gambling in Williamstown, this locality will never provide an attractive alternative to campus partying. All-college mixers are passe. Realistically, the houses have been forced into the position of serving as the primary social unit. If we accept this fact, the college should make it feasible for this unit to be successful.

Instead of making the burden easier to shoulder, the college's randomness policy has made it more difficult. What has basically happened is this: houses are filled with a very mixed collection of students who are often only familiar with three other people in their house, their suitemates. House officers then try to plan social activities that will hopefully "bring the house together." If the people in the house are compatible and the planning is good, a house will jell. But if the people in the house, through no fault of their own, are socially incompatible, planning will be futile and the intended center of social activity will flop.

Why create a situation in which nineteen, twenty, and twenty-one year olds expect to be entertained by a collection of elected peers? This places needless pressure on both the house officers and the house members. What the system has done, and will continue to do, is make students less responsible for their own social activities.

If the system were less random, there would be more self initiative in social planning. If students were permitted to live with a greater number of friends they would have less of a need to be entertained and more likely to entertain on their own. A house could still jell under a less random system and be a strong social unit. But more importantly, if a house didn't jell, then the members could still feel comfortable living with a greater number of friends.

I am not prepared to propose a new inclusion plan that would stem this random tide. I mean only to criticize. But cutting down on transfers and decreasing the number of housing categories to "wall paper" and "white walls" will only perpetuate the current social situation on campus.

Letters: bloopers, advice and booze

Love it or ...

To the editor:

Mr. Khadka's reflections on Homecoming weekend represents the epitome of what I like least about Williams during my sojourn there—the attitude of some students toward the College. It's all been said before, and saying it won't make changes. At the risk of being a "patronizing" alumnus who has "been through it all" I offer the following advice: ENJOY WILLIAMS WHILE YOU'RE THERE OR GET THE HELL OUT. Other people have done it (enjoying and-or leaving). It is possible to enjoy it if you stop moaning to look around you.

Missing Williams some,

Glancing at the November 16 ReAd, I was surprised to find that last year's rugby team won this year's Amherst game.

Editor's note:

Glancing at K. Hart's letter, we were surprised to find that a newspaper which disappeared one-and-a-half years ago appeared on November 16. We have been advised that the photo was a last minute replacement for a Scoreboard which did not appear. Typical ReAd error!

More alcohol

To the editor:

During the past few years, Williams social life has evolved from very active to mildly passive. This change has been pursued and welcomed by the administration. A decline can be seen in the number, size, and frequency of both all-campus and residential parties. In addition to this, there has been increasing pressure from the administration to dampen social functions. Many members of the classes of 1977 and 1978 have noted this decline, yet have failed to voice their active objection. Only too frequently have these social Williams students been subjected to 'fire-and-brimstone' articles condemning the use of alcohol. Unfortunately, the truth remains: alcohol consumption enhances social activity.

Students need a release from the pressures and monotony of academia. A gregarious encounter in the form of a party, enhanced by the prospect of an informal social gathering with alcoholic beverages satisfies this need. We sincerely hope that the administration (as much as possible in wake of the trustee's demands) will recognize this requirement and relax in its attempts to quell student activity.

With Winter Study approaching, we anticipate a freer and more active College social situation. The disappointments of the recent past will hopefully abide and Williams will become once more a College, and not an institution.

Very Sincerely Yours,
Chris Lovell '77

Roper taps college opinions

A survey of Williams students and faculty revealed wide discrepancy in a number of attitudes. Professor Philip K. Hastings, President of the Roper Center, directed his political science class in the random sample of 112 students and 34 faculty.

On social issues, 29 per cent of the students and 47 per cent of the faculty agreed that funds for welfare should be increased. Nearly three-quarters of the faculty felt that it should be illegal for private citizens to own any kind of handgun, while only about one-half of the students held this opinion.

Among the Williams faculty, 70 per cent favored legalizing prostitution. By comparison, slightly less than half of the students agreed with this position.

When asked whether the "government should impose racial quotas on the number of employees hired by private institutions," 88 per cent of the faculty said no. Approximately 70 per cent of the students also answered negatively.

When asked about their personal experience with marijuana and LSD, between 50 and 60 per cent of both the faculty and student groups said they had tried marijuana 2 or 3 times. About 90 per cent of both groups said they had never tried LSD and never intended to do so.

Three per cent of the faculty, and thirty per cent of the students favored President Ford, opposed to 53 per cent and 39 per cent respectively for Carter. Eugene McCarthy attracted 24 per cent of the faculty and 20 per cent of the students—higher than the actual national, state and local vote totals.

Cellist to solo in Berkshire concert

The Berkshire Symphony, Julius Hegyi, conductor, will give the second concert of its current season on this Friday at 8:30 p.m. in Chapin Hall. Douglas Moore, cellist, will be soloist. Works on the program are Haydn's Symphony No. 90 in C Major, Roy Harris' Symphony No. 3, and Shostakovich's Cello Concerto No. 1.

Roy Harris' Third Symphony was first performed by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky in 1939. Written in one continuous movement, this symphony reflects Harris' very American, very western background. Still active after fifty years of composing, Harris heard his 14th symphony premiered in Washington D.C. last spring.

Haydn's Symphony No. 90 was written at the end of the composer's long association with the Esterhazy family and just before his stay in London. At the time of this symphony, Mozart's influence on the composer is evident in the classical trademarks of maturity of expression and balance between the harmonic contrapuntal elements in design and texture.

Shostakovich's Cello Concerto No. 1 was written for and premiered by Rostopovich in 1959 in Russia.

Douglas Moore, a member of the Williams College music faculty and principal cellist of the Berkshire Symphony and the Albany Symphony Orchestra, is a graduate of Indiana University. He received his Master of Music degree from Catholic University and will be awarded his Doctor of Musical Arts degree there in 1977. His thesis for the latter degree was the editing and performance of Arthur Foote's 1913 Sonata for cello; he gave the premiere performance in Washington in October, and plans to give the New England premiere at the Clark Art Institute in Williamstown in February. Winner of numerous awards and scholarships, he has appeared as soloist with the Waterloo Symphony, the Cedar Rapids Youth Symphony (of which he was the founder), the Albany Symphony, and the Cedar Rapids Symphony, as well as the Berkshire Symphony. Currently, he is also cellist of The Williams Trio, assisting artist in the Music in the Round chamber music series, Curator of the John B. Taylor Instrument Collection, and Director of the Williams College Handbell Choirs. Williams students are admitted free of charge.

published within the last five years or of short excerpts from longer works. Moreover, multiple copies may be made of unpublished works, either "for preservation and security" or for replacement of damaged copies, and of out-of-print works not "obtainable at a fair price."

Another part of the bill requires the Registrar of Copyrights to report back to Congress within five years on the effect of the provisions, especially as to libraries, and recommend changes when necessary. Other provisions of the law extend the copyright period from a present maximum of 56 years to 50 years after the death of an author, require cable TV stations to pay royalty charges in certain cases of long distance transmission, and prescribe royalties for public broadcasters showing "non-dramatic musical graphic works."

as it doesn't conflict with the charge for diversity." McFarland said that he didn't think a move from four to five categories would threaten diversity.

In discussing the viability of a Fitch-Prospect category, Jankey said that the College consider putting more money into this area to "increase the comfort factor." Jankey mentioned adding carpeting and creating more singles in Prospect and more lounge space in Fitch as specific improvements.

Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad noted that only two students applied to transfer out of Fitch last year. Both of these applicants wanted to be transferred into Prospect, he added.

Odell announces selection of '77 grid tri-captains, awards

Head Coach Bob Odell announced the election of tricaptains for the 1977 football season at the annual football awards banquet given by the Williamstown Sideline Quarterbacks Club. Also announced were winners of three athletic awards.

Juniors Scott Harrington (Darien, Conn.), Herb McCormick (Middletown, R.I.), and Peter Tuttle (N. Andover, Mass.) were named to lead next year's team. This is the first time tricaptains were elected since 1970. Harrington, a halfback, is called by Odell, "one of the most exciting running backs we've had." McCormick, "an outstanding receiver," was ranked number one in receiving in New England this season in College Divisions II and III. Tuttle, a defensive tackle, "has played his position and carried out his assignments fundamentally and technically as well or better than anyone we've had here," according to Odell. Tuttle was also the recipient of the Michael D. Rakov Memorial Award, given annually to the most improved lineman.

This year's co-captain Emmett Creahan (Buffalo, N.Y.) received the Dr. Edward J. Coughlin Jr. '27 Award, presented in memory of the longtime Williamstown physician and college team physician, to the member of the team "who, in spite of injury or adversity, makes an outstanding contribution." Creahan played his middleguard position with a broken rib for three weeks and was second leading tackler for the season. "He's the kind of player that makes things happen. There will be no way to replace him," Coach Odell said.

Sophomore linebacker John Thiel (W. Seneca, N.Y.) was presented with the Charles Dewoody Salmon Award, given "to that sophomore who has made the most significant contribution to the team. Thiel led the team in tackles this year, with 37 solo tackles and 50 assists, and had two interceptions and three fumble recoveries this season. "John is one of the finest young football players we've had here," Coach Odell remarked.

Winter sports previews

B-ball, squash start seasons

Coach Curt Tong's varsity cagers will open their quest to regain the Little Three crown and improve on last year's 10-12 season record when they open the 1976-77 campaign with a road contest against powerful Hamilton tomorrow night.

The 7:30 p.m. contest will be the first of three pre-Christmas games for the Ephs, who will battle Tufts on the road Saturday and play Drew at home next Thursday. Hamilton and Tufts are two of the toughest opponents Williams will face, both having beaten the Purple a year ago. Hamilton posted a 21-4 season record and copped the Upstate New York ECAC crown.

Lost to graduation for the Ephmen were a pair of starters, forward Mark Carter, the team's leading scorer and rebounder; and Alex Rosten, who was third on the squad in scoring, and handed out a team-high 98 assists.

Leading the Ephs into the 1976-77 season are a pair of senior co-captains, Mike Tanner and Tim Hester. Tanner is a 6'1" jumping-jack who has started since his sophomore year. Tanner pumped in 12.6 points per game a year ago and called the switching Williams defenses. The 6'3" Hester is a sound defensive player and rebounder, as well as a team leader who has improved with each season.

Helping Tanner and Hester out up front will be a batch of young but experienced underclassmen, including junior forwards Tom Balderston and Brad Wolk and sophomore Matt Spangler. The 6'5" Balderston was the team's top percentage shooter in 75-76, hitting 52.3 per cent from the floor and 89.3 per cent from the charity stripe. Wolk, also 6'5", is a strong rebounder, especially on the defensive boards. The 6'4" Spangler was moved up from the frosh squad halfway through the season last year and quickly became the first forward off the bench due to his rebounding and hustling defense.

Rounding out the front line for Williams will be junior Brian Harrison (6'6"), and sophomores Sterling Kinsale (6'5"), Jim Betti (6'3") and Tom Cox (6'4").

Gerry Kelly will once again anchor one of the guard spots. The 6' sophomore started every game as a freshman, spearheading the Eph offense and tossing in 10.9 a game. Senior Jeff Lockhart, junior Bill Whelan and freshman Andy Straka will s[illegible]ther backcourt spot. The 6'1" Lockhart has been a steady performer and hard worker for Tong, while Whelan is coming off a shoulder separation suffered in football. The 5'9" Straka has displayed a good shotting touch and solid ball handling ability in preseason scrimmages.

Varsity Squash

Coach Dave Johnson's varsity racquetmen will open the 1976-77 campaign without the services of three-year veteran and one-time number five player in the nation Frank Giammetti, who has been lost to graduation. Johnson, however, feels that the greater overall depth of the squad will offset the loss as the team heads into its season opener against tough Dartmouth here tomorrow.

"We won't have the strength we had in the top three last year," says Johnson, "but if everyone stays healthy, we'll be looking to win our matches in the fourth to ninth slots."

Captain Marc Rheinhardt will inherit the number one spot, while Arnie Cogswell moves up a slot to number two. Seniors Charlie Haines and Tim Belk, sophomore Martin Goldberg, and freshman John Lindquist will battle for ranking in the next four slots.

Junior Jim Little heads a group of five players vying for the bottom four slots. He is joined by seniors Mark Urken and Bert Saul, sophomore John Saunders, and junior Peter Thayer.

Women swimmers win at Wellesley

by Dennis O'Shea

Winning two of the three events normally swum in dual meet competition, the women's varsity swim team closed out their season a week ago Saturday with a stellar performance at the Masse-Spears Relay Carnival at Wellesley.

The meet was unscored, but had a tally been kept according to NCAA rules, the Ephwomen would have finished second to an incredibly improved squad from UNH, beating out a strong but false start-happy Boston College team.

Sophs Nina Murphy and Joanna Monroe, junior Sue Tuttle and frosh Keron Walker opened the festivities with a 200 yard medley relay win that cracked by 1.7 seconds the College record set at Mount Holyoke only four days earlier.

Murphy and Walker, along with junior Carol-Ann Smalley and sophomore Marilla Pearsall nabbed the Ephwomen's other win in the 400 free relay. Walker and Pearsall's splits of 58.0 and 58.6 put the Purple quartet under four minutes for the first time this year.

In all, the Ephs finished no lower than fifth in any of the nine relay events, netting two seconds, two thirds and two fourths. Monroe, Pearsall, Walker and senior captain Randall Morrow were touched out for first in the 200 free relay, while Smalley, Murphy, Monroe and Ann Youngling finished second to UNH in the 150 butterfly ladder.

Divers Mary Southworth and Laurie Norton and back-strokers Murphy, Morrow, Monroe and Laura Marrack picked up the Purple's third places. Chantel Cleland, Hilary Hodgson, and Cindy Harvey contributed to fourth places in the freestyle ladder and individual medley relay events.

The Ephwomen emerge from their seven meet schedule as the dominant team in the New England League's fall program. The latest rankings place Keron Walker first in the region in the 100 fly, 100 individual medley and 50 freestyle, and second in the 100 free.

Marilla Pearsall is first in the 500 with Carol-Ann Smalley third, and second in the 200 where Smalley is tabbed seventh. Sue Tuttle rates third and fourth in the breastroke events, while Joanna Monroe is fourth and sixth in fly. Nina Murphy is listed fourth in both the 50 and 100 backstroke. Williams foursomes have broken first place times in all three relay events, either before or since the rankings were released.

According to women's coach Carl Samuelson, the task now is to continue improving while winter season powers like Springfield and UConn work their way through their schedules. The Ephs will prepare for February's New Englands by competing unofficially in men's junior varsity meets.

WSP dreams, woodworking most popular

by Karon Walker

Students heavily oversubscribed approximately ten Winter Study courses offered for this year, according to Winter Study Committee Chairman Bill Grant.

"The most popular choices were courses related to arts, crafts, and unusual projects. Specifically, the woodfinishing class, auto mechanics, and the course on dreams and dreaming were among the most heavily subscribed," he said.

Figures won't be released until January on the number of people who were rejected in all four of their choices, but committee member Robert Dalzell said that he had "no clear-cut impression" of whether the number had significantly increased or decreased since last year. "I've heard few complaints," he remarked.

Last year the committee could not place 80 students in any of the courses they chose. However only two courses, auto mechanics and a special pottery class, were oversubscribed.

Eric Pyenson, '78, a student member of the committee who reviewed group and individual 99 Projects, said that the number of proposals has dropped from previous years. He estimated 180-200 proposals came in this fall as compared to 250 last year and the year before. Pyenson said that only three of the projects required revision before they were approved by the committee.

Grant explained that many of those who received none of their primary choices, or "bounced through" elected to devise 99's rather than make further selections. "The committee leaves the choice of classes entirely up to the individual instructor," he stated, "who may or may not have a prejudice towards a certain group of students he selects."

Guarantees dance allocation

CC funds fall course guide

The College Council allocated the Student Course Guide Committee its full budget request of $1,533 Tuesday night, enabling the committee to proceed with distribution of the course questionnaire early next week.

Committee member, Mark Lanier '80 enumerated some of the specific questions included in the questionnaire and described how the committee will use student responses in compiling the guide. The committee will summarize the written comments for each course and no comments will be printed verbatim, Lanier said.

If the student guide for fall courses is successful, the committee will ask the Council for additional funds to finance a spring guide, committee chairman Sarah Baldwin '78 said.

The Council also guaranteed the Williams College Dance Society $2,800 from next year's Student Activities Tax. Dance Society president Simon Watson '77 explained that the Dance Society needed advance assurance of the funding since contracts for next year's dance performances must be made six months to one year before the actual event.

The Dance Society will schedule two performing groups with the Council's advance allocation, Watson said. It will apply for additional funding next year to finance student performances. The Dance Society received $4,800 from the Council earlier this fall.

The Council supplemented funding to WCFM to cover installation costs of eight temporary phones for Trivia night. Council treasurer Clarence Otis '76 said that WCFM neglected to include this expenditure in its original funding request. The Council agreed to allocate the necessary funds up to $100; it will vote again next week if further funding is needed.

Following these budgetary questions, Housing Committee co-chairman Sally Coney '78 spoke to the Council, describing the committee's position on the disbanding of WHEW, the all-college social committee. The Council previously denied funds to WHEW, assuming that the Housing Committee would co-ordinate Winter Carnival and Spring Weekend, formerly the responsibilities of WHEW.

"The Housing Committee is a link between the houses and the administration and is responsible for residential problems, not organizing social events," Coney explained.

The Housing Committee recommended that the Council formalize the structure of the College social committee, with a Council-appointed chairman, a social chairman from each house, and four freshmen representatives. This structure would be identical to that of the Housing Committee, Coney explained.

The Council postponed voting on the recommendation until next week when Dan Felizberto '78, former chairman of the WHEW will speak to the CC. Felizberto said he is determined to "get WHEW going again."

CAP proposes extension

by Ann McCabe

The Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP) recently proposed extending an assistant professor's term from six to seven years. Presently, at the end of three years, an assistant professor can be offered another three-year contract. The CAP recommends extending the second contract one year.

CAP member John F. Reichert mentioned this change at the Nov. 10 faculty meeting. The motion will be formally introduced at the December faculty meeting. The trustees must also approve the extension.

Neil Grabois, dean of faculty and a CAP member, stated that since the initiation of a new leave program for assistant professors, more have been taking one semester off. Many extend their leave to a year. Some of these have requested that the year not be counted in their contract while others have not. Grabois viewed the addition of a fourth year as "an opportunity for all to develop as teachers and scholars."

A minor effect would be slower turnover of faculty, which Grabois said he believes "is probably a good thing." Those presently hired would be offered a choice of a three or four year term if reappointed. Tenure decisions would be made in the middle of the sixth or beginning of the seventh year, a year later than at present. The right to request an early tenure decision would remain.

John D. Lathrop, Assistant Professor of Physics, said he sees good and bad sides to the proposal. He estimated that only one out of every six instructors hired receives tenure: under the new contract, Lathrop says

Six professors confirm CAP tenure rulings

by Jim Cohen & Ann McCabe

At least five assistant professors received positive recommendations for tenure from the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP), the Record learned Wednesday. The committee did not recommend Assistant Professor of Economics Tom Tietenberg for tenure, although the economics department apparently favored his promotion.

The Record confirmed that the CAP recommended Lynda Bundtzen (English), Michael Katz (Russian), Gary Jacobsohn (political science), Mark Taylor (religion) and Lee Drickamer (biology). The dean of faculty will not confirm any decisions until after the trustees meeting in January. The trustees make the final decision on all candidates, but have rarely reversed a CAP decision.

According to Assistant Professor of Astronomy Jay Pasachoff, a decision on his status will not be made until classes end.

The Record's list is not complete.

Tietenberg said that the CAP overturned the economics department's recommendation. "The explanation was that the quality of research wasn't sufficient." He claimed he did not plan to appeal the decision to the Panel of Six, a faculty board that handles tenure disputes.

"I've turned down various job offers to stay at Williams," he commented.

Room cleaning stays a college tradition

by Jane Adams

Like most Williams traditions, the "matron" system has evolved with the times. Increased costs, coeducation, and Title IX of the Equal Employment Opportunity Act have all made their imprint on the system, paring it down from the luxury standards of years past. Now, it is an expense justified by Charles Jankey, Director of Student Housing, as "preventive maintenance."

About ten years ago, with employee wages rising, the number of times per week a room was cleaned was cut from every day to two or three times a week. As enrollment began to increase, room cleaning was cut to its present rate of once per week. By using the natural attrition rate of employees, largely due to retirement, the College was able to cut down on the total cost of maintenance by 50-75 per cent by slightly reducing the number of employees while lowering the frequency of services provided.

The most recent change has been in terminology; the job of "matron" is now termed "light cleaner", since, under Title IX of the EEO Act, it is illegal to classify a job by sex. As yet, however, there are no male light cleaners, though there are female janitors. "It could be because that type of work may be considered 'domestic'," Jankey speculated, "and in this area males aren't interested in it."

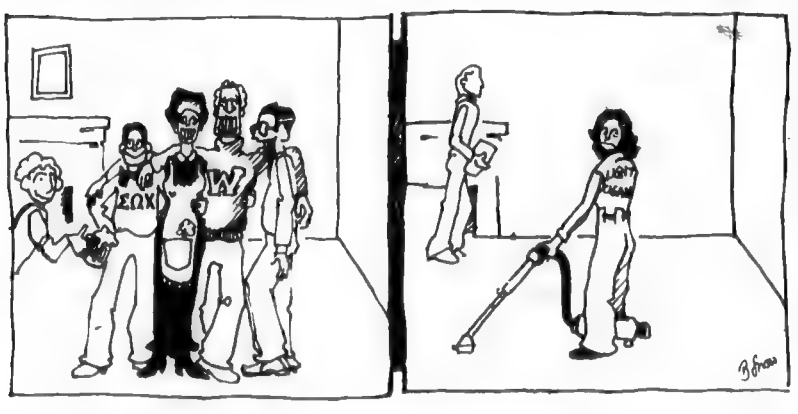
Whitney Stoddard '35 reflected on the system as he knew it at Williams. "Some matrons, especially in fraternities, became "members', and she and her husband were included in social functions as chaperones. In some instances, she was like the mother of a fraternity and had students to dinner in her home. Occasionally she would dine in the frat house as well ... We gave them parties at Christmas or the end of the year."

While relations today may not seem as close, perhaps due to the fact that rooms are now cleaned relatively infrequently, most students feel a friendly rapport still exists.

All cleaners interviewed liked their work and said they would rather work with the students than in a general education building. The very low turnover rate substantiates the good employee relations.

"I haven't had any problems with the kids so far," one cleaner reported. "In general they're good kids. You get what you give them." She confirmed that her image as a "mother figure" still exists. "It's amazing how many kids far from home will want to sit down and talk about anything in general ... Some are outgoing and want to be friendly. Others go their own way."

One possible area of tension results from the cleaner's duty to be a "responsible employee" and report any violations in student's rooms to the supervisor. It is then up to the supervisor to decide what action, if any, will be taken. According to Jankey, "Supervisors are understanding and try not to get the cleaners in the middle." It is understood that the cleaners must work with the students and that a student can make the job difficult if there's a conflict. "By and large we have no real problems with that," Jankey concluded.



The type of violation reported today (pets, thumbtacks) differs from ten years ago when women weren't allowed in the rooms. "We were supposed to turn them in if we saw any," one matron said. "We never had any trouble though."

Of the 25 cleaners employed, most work a part time week of 25-30 hours. Some do work a full time 40-hour week, although any employee working for three months for at least 25 hours per week is entitled to fringe benefits such as the college employee medical plan. Meals are not included but coffee is provided by the kitchen during the coffee break.

In terms of the whole college budget, the room cleaning service is a minor expense. Questions have been raised by students desiring a room rebate if he or she does not have a cleaner work on his or her room. According to Jankey, the cost to an individual student is "insignificant" and thus there would be "very little rebate" if such rebates were ever to be given.

Citing the cleaner's ability to spot a maintenance problem before it requires a serious expenditure, Jankey commented, "The cost of not having them would be greater over an extended period of time." Also, more custodians would have to be hired at a higher wage rate to cover the light cleaner's work done in lounges and bathrooms.

Another reason the College has not phased out the cleaning service is the number of cleaners who have been with the College for many years. "It would be difficult to eliminate positions," Jankey noted. "I suspect someday in the future we will not be cleaning rooms under our present system. It will never be completely eliminated but will exist on a more intermittent basis."

The Williams matron—before and after.

Studio III

STUDIO III, one of a continuing series of recitals sponsored by the Williams College Department of Music, will be held at 4:00 p.m. on Tuesday, December 7th, in Chapin Hall. The concert is free and open to the public.

Five ensembles will take part in the program in addition to the solo performers. Two newly-formed string quartets, one directed by Julius Hegyi and the other by Douglas Moore, will make their first appearance, each group playing selections from Beethoven quartets. The Handbell Choirs, also directed by Moore, will play four pieces; and the student-initiated Brass Quintet will present two works for brass. Finally, a trio of recorder players will give a selection from their repertoire.

Pianists Valerie Sarantos, Julie Kosarin, and Carol Beck, flutist Tom Evans, accompanied by Barbara LeBaron, and vocalist Carroll Reid complete the list of performers.

Student Photo Exhibit

The Panopticon Gallery of Boston is now soliciting photographs for a major exhibition by students throughout New England. The Deadline for submissions is December 11, the show will open January 21 and run through February 16, 1977.

The exhibit will offer the public a unique opportunity to see the best of the different styles of photography emerging from hundreds of schools and colleges in the six-state area. It will also give students a chance to show and sell their work in a prominent Newbury Street Gallery.

All serious students of photography who live or study in New England are eligible to be included in the show, if they meet gallery requirements. A maximum of five prints may be submitted, with no restrictions on subject matter or process. Each must be archivally processed and matted; there is a $1 per print handling charge.

Photographs will be selected for individual excellence by a mixed jury of students, practicing photographers, photography teachers and critics from local media. For more complete information about entering the show, call or write to the Panopticon Gallery, 69 Newbury St., Boston, 02116. 617-267-2961.

Santa Comes to Town

Once around the old Smith Carona, taking care to pause at Season's Greetings and margin release as we dip into our version of Santa's grab bag——B&G's collection of confiscated equipment and Security's lost and found box—and present various and sundry Christmas presents to those needy and deserving souls who have helped make this first semester so jolly.

To Coach Odell: Two turtle doves, eight offensive linemen, Beppo, Mongul, and Andre the Giant.

To Coach Dzurnko: One question. Which feels better, half an Ivy or all the Little Three?

To Coach Ostendarp: Two questions. What's a third of the pie taste like? What took you so long?

To the freshman football team: A belated congrats on the Amherst whitewash and one autographed picture of the Record sports department.

To the Rugby Club: An autographed glossy of Tim Layden and a set of darts.

To Carol Ann Tyler: An 8x11 color shot of Tony Spaeth and Aaron Burr's dueling pistol.

To Ross Keller: A 2x3 mug shot of yours truly and a .44 magnum.

To the Faculty Steering Committee: The leftfield tier of lights at Fenway to help illuminate any further discussion of the open meeting question.

To Peter Welanetz: Two dozen high intensity orange Christmas tree lights and the Longine Symphonette's recording of "It Must Have Been Moonglow".

To Wally O': A Silent Night. All is calm, since all is bright.

To Diau and his Deli: A warm welcome and a side of slaw.

To Constantine: The latest literature from the Senate Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly and the aggregate dermatologist bills for 1800 Ephs.

To St. Pierre's: The return of a healthy Bud Anderson.

To the Aggie Bank: A meat counter and a guy wearing a red jacket behind it.

To the Nickelodeon: A St. Patrick's Day treat of "The Informer" and "The Quiet Man".

To Prospect House: Yvette and Yvonne as Aruba chaperones.

To WHEW: Peggy Lee's recording of "The Party's Over".

To the BSU: A rebroadcast of the Stokley Carmichael speech before their next fashion contest.

To the Adelphic Literary Society: The Angevine Report, "How the Good Guys Finally Won", and a slap on the wrist from Hopkins Hall.

To TDX and Kappa Alpha: The Angevine Report, "Horsefeathers", and a wink from Hopkins Hall.

To Steve Jackson: A fleet announcement that'll prove the rumors true.

To Gene Falk: Reduced prices for all Williams students of Albanian extraction with last names ending in J from 9:36-10:47 every Monday.

To George Steinbrenner: Nothing. Don Gullett, Reggie Jackson, and Jim Wynn are enough.

To George Schutzer and Dave Ross: Two well deserved pats-on-the-back for the superb job they've done during the past two years.

To all the secretaries around campus who've spent most of the semester typing endless applications and recommendations for seniors: A case of nail restorer and a big thank-you.

To Professor Sewall: A globular brain, a ponderous heart, and a final anecdote from that woman:
Blossoms will run away,
Cakes reign but a day,
But Memory like Melody
Is pink Eternally.

Merry Christmas Dave Cowens, wherever you are.

Feature: Winter Study

Titles of 99's betray quest for fun

by Eric Sundin

Titles of Winter Study Independent Projects such as "Tropical Beach and Reef Community," "German on Skis," "Marine Biology on the Pacific Coast," and "Ski Injury Study" on the slopes of Colorado imply that maybe the best way to insure a "fun" January is to arrange a 99. Is it your turn to engage in these "unlimited possibilities for education outside the regular WSP curriculum?"

Over 300 applications for 99's have been approved this fall by the Winter Study Committee, a rise of over 50 course applications compared with last year's figure. WS Committee Chairman, Prof. William G. Grant, Jr., asserts, however, that "we don't want the 99's to become a mere last resort for escape from the scheduled program or from the confinement of the campus."

Grant denies that the WS Committee had any qualms about accepting the "fun" proposals. He says he feels that there is a discrepancy between the course's jazzy title and its real content, and that it is this discrepancy which undermines the true educational values of such proposals. "The 'best' projects are those that are often the most enjoyable," Grant says.

There are some limits on the ratio of fun to education. The need for an off-campus project must be established and accepted within the department. Each project requires a faculty sponsor's approval. The sponsor then submits the proposal to his department for a second approval. The WS Committee has the final overview on the merit of the proposal.

According to Grant, this step-by-step process keeps the quality of student proposals at a high level, even though the WS Committee rejects very few of the projects. The purpose of such a committee is to "act more as a benign observer than a police force," he insists.

Inherent in this lack of supervision is student abuse. Grant says that in such a free system as the WS Independent Study, there is a slack of "slippage" between the student's conduct of his off-campus project and the impossibility of monitoring these projects. Flagrant neglect of the goals of the 99 are rare, however, and Grant says that this is a small price to pay for the benefits of such a flexible and enjoyable form of education.

Grant contends that the 99 concept is based on individually-calibered study, and the student only reduces the value if he does not carry through with the objectives of his proposal.

Other criteria include the project's use of available facilities, the appropriateness of the project's goals relative to the time allotted, and the student's ability. Originality also attracts positive attention; 99's such as "Implications of Charisma for Leadership," "Medieval Spanish Ballads," "Kokoscka," "Windmill Design and Construction," "Equatorial Telescope Mounting," and "Epidemiology Modeling Technique" add to the more usual assortment of career-oriented projects.

Because of the Independent Study program's flexibility, a student can choose between a known career interest or an unknown field of study. Prof. Grant believes that "a 99 could afford the most rewarding and valuable experience a student could have in his or her career at college." And because of the relaxed atmosphere of Winter Study and the flexibility of the Independent Study Program itself, the chances for this experience are very good.

The student is his own teacher, however, and educational reward comes only from self-imposed initiative rather than externally imposed instruction. Remember that, 99'ers, when you're enjoying a trail in the Alps or a Scuba dive on a Florida reef.

Contract extension proposed by CAP

a professor would be one year older when fired and one year longer in an environment where it is hard to do research. On the other hand, he pointed out the advantage of having another year to look for a new job. Lathrop said he believed the college might be at a disadvantage because "some really good people won't stick around" unless they can obtain an early tenure decision.

Glen S. Jeansonne said he supports the CAP's motion because "It gives me another year to get a book out and take advantage of the assistant professor leave."

Idle Minds . . .

(A conversation overheard in the crowded snack bar.)

. . . if you weren't such an egotist about the whole thing . . .

Uh, I think you mean 'egoist' in that context.

I beg to differ; 'egotist' is correctly used there.

Do you want to ask Professor Bell of the English Department?

Fine—let's. Which one is he?

He's that man in the mauve sweater.

In the what?

In the mauve sweater. Do you know what mauve is?

I certainly do, and that sweater is not mauve.

What is it?

Salmon.

Okay, fine. What does mauve look like?

Ummm . . . okay, look right over there. Crigler is wearing a mauve sweater.

That's Dean Crigler?

No, you mean Dean Crider.

Wow, I always thought that guy was an English teacher.

He is an English teacher. Crider is in Psychology and is sitting with his back to us in the chartreuse . . .

. . . God, don't bring chartreuse into the whole thing . . .

. . . shirt but Crigler—of the English Department—is wearing a mauve sweater!

Okay, listen. Crider or Crigler or whatever his name is has a crimson sweater on. Crimson, not mauve.

Well it's more mauve than Bell's which is definitely salmon. I KNOW! I'm an art major. I own a mauve sweater. My mother works at Altmans . . .

Christ, now you're being egotistical.

No—now I'm being egoistical. Let's clear this up . . .

. . . Professor Bell, being in the English Dept. could you help me with . . .

I'm Gene Bell from the Spanish Department. You want either Michael or Bob Bell. Bob is sitting with Dean Crider . . .

Where's Michael?

With the fellow in the saffron shirt.

Forget the colors—tell me his name.

Why, that's Professor Barnett.

Randy Barnett . . .?

NEWS BRIEFS

CC solicits self-nominations

The College Council is soliciting self-nominations for positions on the All-College Entertainment Committee and the Junior Advisor Selection Committee. Applications should include your name, class and qualifications for either committee take it to the Dean's office by Monday December 6 at 4:00 PM.

Newspaper recycling now mandatory

A town ordinance prohibiting dumping newspapers in the town landfill went into effect Wednesday. Since the College uses the landfill, students may no longer throw newspapers in their trash.

Students are to assemble papers in a single location in each residential house, where Buildings and Grounds will collect and deliver them to one of five recycling centers in Williamstown.

The Berkshire Bennington County Recycling Council will then collect and recycle the paper from the Williamstown area keeping the revenues to pay for trucking costs.

Fellowship applications available

Applications for graduate fellowships for seniors, offered by Williams are now available in the office of Director of Financial Aid Henry N. Flynt, Jr. Application deadline is January 15.

The Hutchinson fellowship is a $3000 grant for each of two years' work, preferably in music, writing, or painting, or otherwise in philosophy or science. The Moody fellowship is a variable grant (usually $1600) for two years' study in any field but science, mathematics or modern languages at Exeter College, Oxford. The Clark fellowships are two variable grants (usually about $900) for one year in any field of study. The Wilson fellowship is a two-year variable grant (usually $850) for any field of study at Worcester College, Oxford. The Lansing fellowship is a variable grant for work in classics.

Natural Xmas trees banned

In compliance with the state of Massachusetts and the Williamstown Fire Department, Buildings and Grounds has stated that "no natural Christmas trees or natural wreaths shall be used" in any College building. Natural trees can only be placed in private homes.

Artificial decorations must meet Massachusetts regulations which forbid cloth, straw, or moss to be used for decorative purposes. If the artificial tree is metallic, no electric lighting may be used; other trees can only use "mini-lights."

Ralph Iacuessa, general foreman, said that B&G would not pick up trees for departments this year. He said he thought Security would enforce the regulations.

Energy research pays off

by Steve Davison

Have you ever wondered if it takes extra energy to start a fluorescent light? Or how much energy it takes to drive to Smith? Or to heat West College at night? Reed Zars, '77 devoted his 1976 WSP Physics 99 to answering these and other questions about energy use at Williams.

Sponsored by Prof. Jay Shelton, Zars' study focused on the major uses of energy on campus. By consulting with Buildings and Grounds, and setting up banks of lights and electrical equipment in Bronfman, Reed set out to find out how much juice it takes to keep the College ticking.

While studying the heating plant, Zars noticed that the large number six oil tank was warm. The tank must be kept at 120 degrees F so that the tar-like oil stays thin enough to be pumped to the boilers. Through its bare metal skin, the tank was leaking as much as 3 per cent of the College's steam to the outside air.

Reed made calculations, and concluded that, in the long run, it would be cheaper and more energetically prudent to insulate the tank. The conclusions were sent to B&G, and an engineering firm was consulted. After taking into account the annual loss in heating cost, and the cost of insulating the tank sufficiently, the firm estimated a pay-back period of two to three years. Because this is a relatively short period, Assistant Director of the Physical Plant Winthrop Wassenar agreed that "this is a good investment." The insulation was completed in mid-October.

Zars' study dealt with all forms of energy use, from cars to showers. The end result of the project "is a possible handbook for Williams students concerning all of the uses of energy in their college lives," Zars said. The handbook has not yet been published. "I don't think there's a real reason why it hasn't been done," Shelton remarked. "Maybe it's the cost of it. Maybe the handbook is too long."

The study revealed some interesting facts about things we can do to save on energy costs. If the temperature in all College buildings is reduced 5 degrees F, we would save about $88,800.00 a year. Did you know that it takes less energy to start a fluorescent light than it does to run it, that a ten minute shower costs about 10c, and that a cruise to Smith (one way) takes more energy than it does to heat West College on a typical winter day? In addition, the study showed that it takes eight times as much energy to dry clothes in a dryer than it takes to hang them up, and that a person puts out as much heat as a 160 watt light bulb.

This year, Reed intends to do a study of the feasibility of running the College on wind power, but he is not the only person doing energy research. Several other students have done projects funded by the National Science Foundation's Undergraduate Research Program (NSF-URP) grants.

Linda Van Waes, '78 and Tony Quay, '77 spent last summer doing statistical research on the effects of higher gas prices on fuel consumption habits. They performed various statistical analyses on surveys taken in by the Federal Energy Association in 1973 and 1975—years with very different gasoline prices. Unfortunately, the results were fairly inconclusive.

Few people on campus are not familiar with Shelton's many projects in energy conservation. Kicking it off this summer, he and several other students began testing various designs of wood-burning stoves as a heating alternative. Working with a "giant calorimeter" behind the Center for Environmental Studies, Shelton and his crew have been checking combustion efficiency (the amount of heat derived from a certain weight of wood) as a function of air flow. They are also researching why some stoves are better than others.

The research is still in the embryonic stages, so as yet, there are no conclusive results. According to Mark Chaffee, '77, "Nobody (non-commercially) has ever looked into stove efficiency this thoroughly." The project will continue through this coming WSP, as Shelton is teaching another Heating with Wood course.

These are the kinds of projects that benefit not only the participants, but students, the College, and the nation as well. For certainly we cannot go on indefinitely wasting our energy without paying the price.

Stoddard enlivens art

by Mike Golden

In the fall of their freshman year, all students are exposed to a humorous analysis of the architecture of Williamstown. Comments something like "Baxter Hall is from the early Mississippi riverboat period" and "Hopkins Hall is less late Richardson and more late leftovers" often bring the audience into a fit of ecstatic laughter. The tongue-and-cheek humor contained in those comments is the product of the quick wit of Whitney Stoddard, Amos Lawrence Professor of Art and chairman of the art department.

"In the campaign for the election of 1932, Franklin Roosevelt came through Williamstown with a one motorcycle escort in an open motorcade," reminisces Stoddard as he lights his pipe, "and I remember that as FDR rode past, all of the Williams students came out and cheered for Hoover. I think that says something about the school in those days." He adds, "I've seen the school change a lot since then."

Having been on the Williams faculty since 1938, Stoddard has encountered a few problems with teaching. One of these is that "you don't know how your teaching is going. A teacher has to have a vegetable garden in the summer so he can see its successful culmination within a short period of time."

While other professors might take Stoddard's advice, Stoddard himself admits, "I can't have a vegetable garden because I'm always away when it's growing." He has been "digging" on a larger scale, spending one month of every summer since 1970 on an excavation of a Benedictine monastery in southern France. The archeological site includes an area where once stood a Gothic church, a Carolingian church, and some cloisters, dating back to about 780. In the past six years, Stoddard has improved his archeological—if not agricultural—techniques.

In addition to his yearly jaunt, Stoddard says he enjoys cross-country and downhill skiing, photography, and painting "very badly." His favorite foods are "Maine lobster boiled at home" and "little neck clams dug yourself—with a very dry martini."

Jokester, amateur archeologist, athlete, artist, gourmet—and scholar.

"A lot of people don't know I'm a serious scholar," contends Stoddard. "Although I have a reputation for quips, here and there, I've done quite a bit of serious research." Concentrating on art history of the Middle Ages, his interest has inspired him to write three books on medieval problems. "I try to make the study of medieval studies more meaningful for students." One way he attempts that noble task is by "taking photographs geered to what you want to say in your book." He takes these photos of buildings and art objects to make the objects "available for all."

"But I get the most kick out of teaching," Stoddard concludes. "I dig it. And if you're not nervous before a lecture, then you shouldn't be teaching. That may sound corny, but I believe it." Perhaps that is good advice, since Whitney Stoddard has been abiding by it for almost forty years here at Williams.

The Course Guide Committee will distribute course questionnaires to students Wednesday in student mailboxes, according to committee member Mark Lanier '80. The responses will be collected by student representatives in each house and freshman entry during reading and exam periods, and during Winter Study, he added.

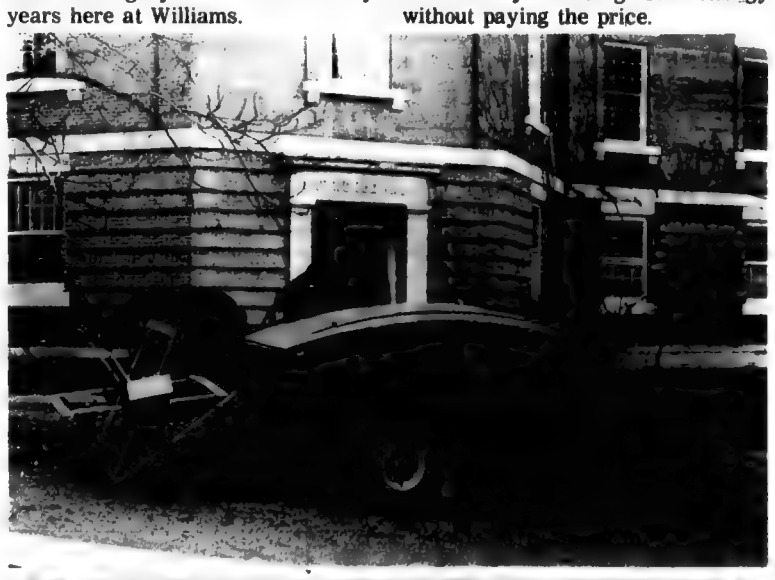
Written comments will be summarized by students familiar with each course being evaluated. These summaries will be edited by a student board composed of Course Guide Committee members and a major in the department concerned. The final summaries will be sent to the professors whose courses are being evaluated, and their reactions will be published in the guide.

Instructor

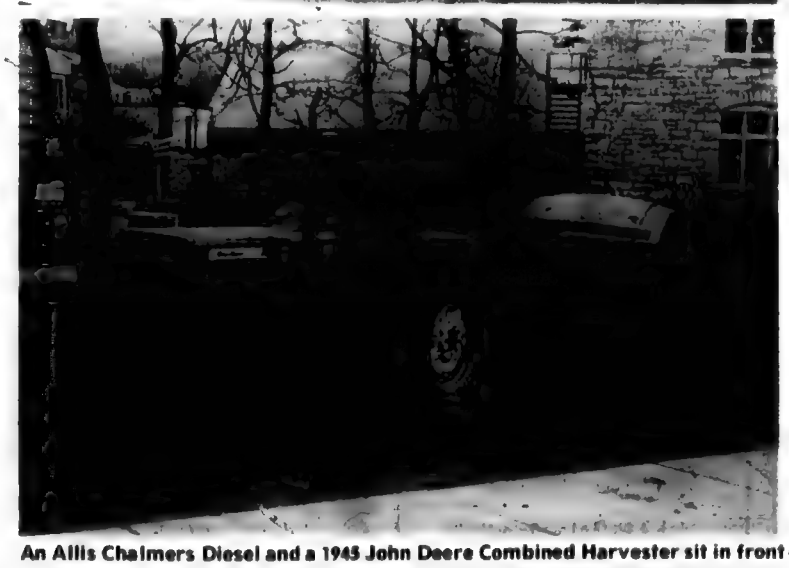
1. Did the instructor add a dimension not available from the readings?
2. How much does the instructor care about individual student progress?
3. How much does the instructor encourage student participation in class?
4. How helpful were the instructor's comments and criticisms overall?
5. How prepared was the instructor for class?
6. How enthusiastic is this instructor?
7. How well does this instructor stimulate your interest in this subject matter?
8. Rate the overall quality of instruction.
9. How well does the instructor explain difficult material?
10. How well does the instructor emphasize major points?

Course

1. How much did you learn from
   a. readings?
   b. lectures?
   c. discussions?
   d. papers?
   e. exams?
   f. labs?
   g. exercises?
2. How difficult were the concepts presented in this course?
3. How heavy was the workload, compared to your other courses?



Questions requiring written responses



1. How well have the grades you have received reflected your effort and expectations? Comment on both the fairness and difficulty of grading.
2. How necessary was it to be prepared for class? How much of the work will you have completed by the end of the course?
3. Comment on the strengths and weaknesses of this instructor. (for example, his class presentations, availability, organization, whether classes relate to readings, prejudices, etc.) (how well the course is paced, dimensions, fulfillment of objectives).
4. Comment on the strengths and weaknesses of the course content (for example repetition, quality and clarity of readings, relationship of papers and exams to course.)

Questions requiring yes-no responses

'Gamma Rays' to open at AMT tonight

Paul Zindel's "The Effect of Gamma-Rays on Man-in-the-Moon Marigolds," will be presented tonight and tomorrow night by Cap and Bells, Inc. The play is directed by Todd Anderson '79. Anderson describes the play as "revolving around the nagging, penurious hopelessness of a widow's life. Her life is momentarily brightened by her younger daughter's fascination with the atom, which leads to a successful science-class experiment with the effect of radiation on seeds. The mother's continual struggle with responsibilities and external forces causes her changing moods and perceptions, and promotes a pervading disquiet throughout the entire play."

"The Effect of Gamma-Rays ..." will be presented at 8:30 in the Studio Theatre of the AMT. Tickets are free and can be picked-up between 4 and 5:30 at the Cap and Bells office in the AMT, the afternoons of the show, or one-half hour before curtain at the Greylock Entrance of the AMT.

Lakeside Studio to present sale exhibition of prints

Once again The Lakeside Studio will present for one day only a sale exhibition of Old Master, Modern Master and Contemporary prints. The exhibit will take place Tuesday, December 7 from 10 am to 4 pm in Room 9 of Lawrence Hall. This collection is brought to the public under the auspices of Professor Lane Faison of the Museum of Art of Williams College.

On view will be a collection of over 1,000 original prints containing works by Blake, Daumier, Durer, Rouault, Villon, Miro, Whistler, and many others. Also in the collection will be a number of Japanese woodcuts from the Ukiyo-e School along with numerous wood engravings by Henry Wolf which are proofs from the Wolf estate. Area artists being represented are Coughlin, Hatcher, Burk and Hardy.

All works displayed are available for purchase and range in price from $5.00 to $5,000.00 (total value will be over $100,000).

Lakeside Studio's representative will accompany the collection and will answer questions both historical and technical on the graphics he will have on display.

"Finally having found an agreeable way to spend the summer ...", a lithograph by Honore Daumier, will be presented in Lakeside Studio's sale exhibition at Lawrence Hall on Tuesday, December 7.

"La Pompe Notre Dame," an 1858 etching by Charles Meryon (French, 1821-1868), is on view in the "New Acquisitions" collection at the Clark Art Institute. This exhibition will close this week.

Clark exhibits to close

The two current exhibitions at the Clark Art Institute, Recent Acquisitions and Drawings by German and Austrian Masters, are entering their final week. Closing this Monday to make room for a major exhibition of works by the Dutch master, Johann-Barthold Jongkind and his school, the exhibit of recent additions to the Institute's collection consists primarily of prints.

A collection of eleven etchings and aquatints by the Austrian Adam Bartsch (1757-1821) is also on view. Based on various drawings Bartsch admired, this fine series reproduces in a very delicate and faithful manner designs by Durer, Ludovico Carracci, Guido Reni, Guercino, and other prominent old masters. Prints by Meryon, Renoir, Roussel and others round out the exhibition, which is on view through Sunday in the old lobby and Gallery E in the new building.

Tietenberg denied - five others earn tenure

"I wanted more than anything else to teach at Williams."

Both department chairman Henry Bruton and a senior member of the department declined to discuss the decision.

Jane Lester '77 and Pat Pikonis '77 began circulating a petition Wednesday evening seeking reconsideration of the Tietenberg decision. "We will give it to President Chandler or (Dean of Faculty) Grabois Monday morning," Lester said. "We request to meet with some CAP members about reversing the decision."

Tenure Procedure

The tenure procedure normally begins in an assistant professor's fifth year at Williams. Each department evaluates candidates from that department and submits a recommendation to the CAP. Most departments solicit student input into the evaluation.

According to the faculty handbook, the CAP uses three criteria for judging candidates for reappointment or promotion: teaching ability, scholarship and usefulness to the college community.

"Given the limited size of the faculty and the infrequency of departures or retirements from the tenure ranks, appointments to tenure are few," the handbook states.

CAP decisions are forwarded to the president, who turns them over to the trustees.

Tietenberg, graduated from the Air Force Academy in 1964. He received a master of arts degree from University of the East in the Philippines (1965) and master of science from University of Wisconsin in 1970 where he was a professor of economics. In September 1964 he won a Brookings Economic Policy fellowship.

Jacobsohn is a 1967 graduate of CCNY. He received his master's degree from Cornell where he also taught a freshman seminar in American government.

Drickamer graduated from Oberlin College and received a Ph.D. from Michigan State University. He was an NSF post doctoral fellow at North Carolina State University; before joining the biology department, he was a visiting scientist with the Caribbean Primate Research Center in Puerto Rico.

Before joining the English department in 1972, Bundtzen was a teaching assistant at University of Minnesota where she graduated in 1968 and a Danforth Tutor at University of Chicago, which granted her a master's degree and a Ph.D.

Katz graduated summa cum laude from Williams in 1966. He then taught at Oxford University while obtaining his doctorate. After spending a year at University of Leningrad in the Cultural Exchange Program, he came back to Williams as an Assistant Professor of Russian in 1972.

Taylor, received his Ph.D. from Harvard in 1973 after graduating from Wesleyan University in 1968. In 1971-72 he attended the University of Copenhagen.

Natators, skaters open today

by Dennis O'Shea
Varsity Swimming

Little Three action opens early and ends late this year for the men's varsity swim team. The Ephmen make their season debut in Muir Pool tomorrow at 3:00 p.m. against Amherst, but the champion of the Tiny Triumvirate won't be crowned until the Williams-Wesleyan confrontation in mid-February.

Carl Samuelson's natators' hopes for a fifth consecutive Little Three title and a bettering of last year's third place finishes in both the New Englands and NCAA Division III nationals rest squarely on the shoulders of four junior All-Americans. If distanceman Stuart Deans, sprinter Phil Wild, breaststroker Paul vom Eigen and butterfly Guy Hoelzer come through, the Ephmen's depth points should be enough to guarantee improvement on 1976 successes.

In all, Samuelson has nine All-Americans back from last year's 6-3 squad.

The Ephs breaststroking corps should once again be the toughest in the conference and in Division III. Backing up vom Eigen are soph All-Americans Chris Clark and Brian McDermott as well as freshman Bryan Volpp. Deans has College 200 freestyle record holder Jordan Lewis breathing down his neck in every distance event, along with John Adams and John Trapp.

Hoelzer must fill part of the giant hole left by the graduation of five event All-American Bruce Barclay. Vying for other butterfly spots in the lineup will be junior Mike Murphy and frosh Todd Piper and Jim Goff. Wild, R. J. Connelly and Don Cameron will share berths in the 50, 100 and sprint relay with Williams' answer to the Bobsey twins, freshmen Bill and Tom Beckett.

Cameron, silver medalist in the 100 backstroke at the Nationals last year, Bill Beckett and fellow frosh Dave Amlicke will have to fill in for graduated co-captain Scott Schumacker at the 200 length.

That event and the individual medley, where Piper and Peter Howd are the up and coming underclassmen, are probably the weakest spots in the lineup right now. Versatile co-captain Duff Anderson could fill in at either spot and in the distance or middle distance as well.

Co-captain Jeff Erickson is the sole veteran diver on the squad, but freshmen Dave Thomson, Greg Roux and Bruce McPherson all have promise.

Conference considerations aside, tomorrow's contest shouldn't be much more than a tune up for a very important meeting with UConn next week. Williams walloped Amherst, 78-34, last year to sew up their fourth straight Lord Jeff-Cardinal sweep.

The afternoon's most interesting match ups should come in the sprints where the Jeff's Great White Shark Mark Parisi takes on the Ephs.

Varsity Hockey

Carrying high hopes for their first ECAC playoff berth in three years, and with head coach Bill McCormick looking for his 200th career win (he needs two more), the Williams varsity hockey team opens its 1976-77 season Friday night against Little Three rival Amherst. The Ephs play Wesleyan Saturday, with both games slated for 8:30 p.m.

The Ephs, 12-8-1 a year ago, have won ten straight contests against Amherst, and eight in a row over Wesleyan. The Jeffs were the Division III kingpins a year ago, and boast a strong goaltender in Jeff Fine. Wesleyan lost star Rich Gallogly to graduation and faces a rebuilding year.

McCormick's Ephmen boast a flood of returning veterans, many of them underclassmen. Just two of the team's first twelve forwards are seniors.

The first line will be an all-sophomore one, led by Dan Sullivan, the team's fourth-leading scorer as a frosh. He will be flanked on the wings by Chick Johnson (20 goals in 17 games) and Chris Egizi.

Senior veteran Jim Hield will head the second line, holding down one of the wing positions. Freshman Jim Rooney will handle the other wing, flanking junior Geoff Daley, a letterman who has seen limited action for two years because of injuries.

Injuries have depleted McCormick's third line, as neither Bob Caruso (knee) nor Barney Walsh (shoulder) is expected to be ready this weekend. The remaining line member, John Bessone, will join with fellow junior Peter Gonye and possibly senior Rick Zeller, a defenseman and leading scorer last year, to round out the line.

Defensively, captain Patch Mason returns to one spot, as does two-year veteran junior Jim Norton. Freshman Wade Smith and senior Chris Vogelsang are expected to split up and join Mason and Zeller for the opening games.

Juniors Bob Duffy and Dan Riley round out the defensive corps for the Ephs, with Zeller expected to move back with the return of Caruso or Walsh.

For the second straight year, the goaltending is in the capable hands of senior Chuck Cremens and junior Ed Weiss. The duo split time for most of last year, and more of the same is expected.

Following the weekend home stand, which will also feature preliminary contests involving Trinity and Wesleyan and Amherst, Williams will go on the road to conclude their pre-Christmas activity.

Hamilton drops cagers, 103-80, in Wednesday basketball opener

Coach Curt Tong's varsity basketball team opened its season on a sour note Wednesday night as they dropped a 103-80 decision to a powerful Hamilton College five in a game that was much closer than the final score indicates.

The Continentals, 21-4 last season and Upstate New York ECAC champions, built a 45-34 halftime margin with a 15-4 spurt in the last three minutes of the first half that broke a 30-all deadlock.

Another spurt in the second half upped the margin to twenty, but the Ephs whittled the spread down to nine midway through the half. They stayed within nine through the rest of the half until Coach Tong cleared the bench at the end of the game.

"I'm not that disappointed by the results," Tong said. "Some of our players played the best ball of their lives. We lost patience towards the end of the first half and tried to run with them, which we can't do. We have to set the tempo and when we didn't they pulled away. Except for those few stretches, though, we played them fairly evenly."

Williams was paced by sophomore Brad Wolk (26 points, 12 rebounds) and Junior Tom Balderston (20 points). Mike Tanner chipped in with 13 and Matt Spangler added 10 points. Both Wolk and Spangler fouled out.

The Ephs travel to Medford tomorrow night to battle a talented Tufts five. They open at home Thursday night at 8:00 against Drew.

Squash kicks off new year with 8-1 drubbing of Green

Coach Dave Johnson's varsity squash team opened their 1976 season Wednesday with an easy 8-1 win over Dartmouth on the Williams courts. The same Dartmouth squad had topped Williams 6-3 a year ago and Johnson termed the win "a nice turnaround."

Only senior Tim Belk, playing in the number six slot, lost to his big Green opponent, dropping a tough five-setter. Captain Marc Reinhardt and Arnie Cogswell each won their matches, Reinhardt needing five sets at no. one and Cogswell just three in the second slot.

Freshman Chip Linquist (No. 3), sophomore Martin Goldbert (No. 4), and Senior Charlie Haines (No. 5) each won, with Haines needing five sets to dispose of his opponent.

The bottom three slots on the Eph ladder each notched wins for Johnson. Junior Jim Little and senior Michael Fitzhugh copped straight set wins at seven and eight, while junior Jim Parsons needed four sets for his victory in the bottom position.

Paddle Tennis Tourney

In response to the increased level of interest, an all-college platform tennis tournament, under the auspices of Coach Renzie Lamb, is being organized. The men's, women's, and mixed doubles single elimination rounds planned are being scheduled for Winter Study. Entries from faculty, staff and students are being solicited.

All entries should include names and phone numbers and be submitted before January to Coach Lamb's office in Jesup Hall. Those interested in additional information should contact Ray Porfilio at 6084.

Adams rejects plans for gambling casino

by Keron Walker

A close Adams town meeting vote last Monday temporarily upset plans for a gambling casino at the proposed Greylock Glen resort.

The chairman of the legislative committee which reviews all proposed gambling bills reported that the committee would consider a casino in Adams even after the town's rejection.

Greylock Glen is a 1,000 acre area near Mt. Greylock in Adams slated for development into a resort area with a 350-room convention hotel and other attractions. Greylock Associates, the firm organized by a financial consultant to market the 1,000 acres, wants the casino license "to help Greylock Glen developer Alan Canter secure the $30 million he needs to help finance the hotel," said a local authority.

According to another casino promoter, the casino is necessary because of the economic impact it could have upon the area. State Representative Robert B. Ambler has been quoted as saying that a casino in Adams "would be a bonanza, especially in the winter months."

Joseph Dragone, another casino promoter, claims that the proposal is anything but overcome by the close vote in the Adams town meeting. He has been quoted in The Transcript as saying, "Like John Paul Jones, hell, we've just begun to fight."

Casino promoters cited a massive organized campaign against the casino as the main reason that it failed to pass at the open meeting. The Greylock Associates have called for a local referendum as a final decision if the state legislature grants licensing authority.

Dragone has conferred with a Boston attorney in order to draft new legislation in the wake of the town meeting defeat. He has said that a new bill would seek to legalize casinos on a statewide basis, with an option for local governments to consider it separately. He has also alluded to some proposed "physical limitations" on licensed organizations so that casino gambling will be more or less confined to premises originally designed for that purpose. Such standards might prescribe a minimum number of hotel rooms or accommodations in a licensed building " just to preclude every single town and hamlet having one," according to Dragone.

Record announces staff promotions

Record editors David R. Ross and George J. Schutzer have announced the appointments of the Record editorial board and staff for 1977. The new appointments were made by the outgoing Record editorial board and become effective in January.

Scott Fenn '78 has been named editor-in chief of the Record for the next year. Bill Dahling, Jim Cohen and Sally Coney, all juniors, will serve as managing editors. Together with Fenn they will constitute the new Record editorial board, the official decision-making body of the paper.

The following departmental editors were also announced. David MacGregor '79 will be news editor. John Rindlaub '79 was appointed features editor. Tom Herwitz '78 has again been reappointed arts editor. Stew Read '78 will continue as photography editor and will be joined by Hans Oettgen '80. Frank Carr '78 and Nancy Rhein '80 will co-edit the sports department. Cathy Lewis '79 will be graphics editor. Sophomores Chip Buckner and Ann McCabe will serve as layout editors.

Schutzer and Ross also announced that changes in the business staff will not be made until second semester.

Majors send CAP petition on Tietenberg

Three senior economics majors submitted a petition to Dean of Faculty Neil R. Grabois yesterday asking the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP) to reconsider its negative tenure recommendation for Assistant Professor of Economics Thomas Tietenberg. In an accompanying letter, Jane Lester, Pat Pilkonis and Bob Fox requested that the committee "share with us the reasons behind your decision."

Pilkonis and Lester began circulating the petition last Wednesday, the day after the CAP apparently notified Tietenberg of their decision. Two-hundred nineteen students signed the statement.

"These people," the letter said, " share our conviction that Professor Tietenberg more than satisfies the criteria of teaching ability, scholarly research and usefulness to the community, and thus are baffled, as is the rest of the college community, by your decision not to recommend him for tenure."

The letter praised his teaching ability, involvement with the college community and concern for students. "His research ability, admittedly difficult for students to judge, seems adequate."

Commenting on the petition, Pilkonis said, "The names themselves won't have much effect. We view our action as another positive input into the reconsideration issue . . . We would ultimately like to speak to the committee itself. This is probably unrealistic."

Tietenberg stated last week that he would not appeal the decision.

Semester ends with trivia

by Rob Petrie

Williams is littered with closet trivia freaks.

Just think of all the bright young whippersnappers who were obviously sufficiently anal throughout their pre-Williams years to remember staggering "tonnages of scholastically related facts and figures. But all the while, that anal instinct made them remember that Fred Flintstone's boss was Mr. Slate, that Ashley's plantation was 'Twelve Oaks' , and that U.N.C.L.E. stood for the 'United Network Command for Law Enforcement' ."

It is now over ten years ago that Williams students first ran a trivia contest to find out once and for all which Williams students had retained the most of this keenly absurd information. The contest is now a healthy institution (the contest Wednesday night will be the 21st semi-annual event) which serves many purposes beyond that original idea. It is now the ultimate end of the semester party, in honor of all those worthless but delightful little details we ignore in the pursuit of a well-rounded liberal arts education.

So you have your radio tuned to WCFM 91.9 and collect as many phones and friends as you can assemble in your room or living room at midnight, December 8th. This year BOMO, a long-time trivia power, and winner of last spring's contest will be asking the questions and playing the oldies. The questions are taken from the five great realms of trivia: Movies, TV, Advertising, Sports, and Comics. Additional questions are thrown in under the category of miscellany, which embraces such unlikely bedfellows as children's books, Stetson Hall, and the Taconic Parkway. Songs are taken from 1960s jukeboxes and 45 collections that linger still in your memory of junior high. A point will be awarded for each correct answer to a question, and another point for recalling both the title and the artist of the oldie. Teams may also vie for points in hour long "bonus" questions (worth 5 points), and the two 4-hour superbonuses, which are worth up to ten points.

What is a Gusto Bonus?

"The wagers are set, and the Final Jeopardy answer is . . ." Everybody knows that the big winners on Jeopardy were those that risked the most of their accumulated winnings on their ability to answer the one Final Jeopardy answer. The gusto bonus is therefore dedicated to that smiling intellectual giant of daytime TV, Art Fleming, who would reward the winners with bundles of hard-earned money, while the losers cried in encyclopedia collections and yet another edition of the Jeopardy game.

The gusto bonus will be Wednesday night's 5th hour bonus question, and it is based on this "wager" principle. For this bonus, teams may wager any positive integer from 0-8 on their ability to answer the bonus, winning the amount if their answer is correct, and losing their wager if they fail to do so. A wager of zero is of course equivalent of passing up the bonus (this is an option), lacking gusto and generally coming up short.

Gusto bonus guesses may be called in on the bonus line, as usual, between 5 and 6 AM (3 guesses per call-in), but the final answer must be in written form to be tabulated by BOMO at Trivia Central (WCFM).

If there are any questions regarding the gusto bonus or any other facet of the contest, feel free to call the BOMO "help-line" at extension 6533 on Tuesday night from 7:30-10 p.m.

Phones and people congregate en masse the last day of classes, and mad mania ensues as the Trivia Contest takes place once again from midnight to 8 a.m. Thursday. (Photos by Read)

NEWS BRIEFS

Aruba tickets go on sale January 3rd

Five hundred tickets for a chance to take a four-day, three-night excursion to Aruba will go on sale January third for a drawing on Williams' first annual Aruba Night, sponsored by Prospect on January 28th.

Dean Roosenraad will make the drawing a day beforehand in complete confidence so that tickets can be ordered in the winning couple's name. Winners will leave after the party for Springfield where they will catch a plane for Aruba at 7:30 the next morning.

Llew Kitchin said that the University of Virginia sponsored a similar trip in an attempt to raise money last year. He expects Prospect gross about $5000, most of which will be spent on the Prospect party. The trip itself will cost between $1300 and $1400, not including the $300 spending money also provided by the House.

Kitchin said that ticket buyers will sign two names on their chance and that passports are apparently not necessary. Tickets are $10.

Term grades out by early January

Grades for fall term courses will be in students' mailboxes by the first week in January, according to Registrar George C. Howard. "I would like to get grades out by the time students get back from vacation," Howard said, "but I can't guarantee they'll be there."

Professors are supposed to submit their grades within four days of the exam or deadline for final work in a given course. "That means that all grades should be in by December 22 since the last day of exams is December 18," Howard noted. Howard said he didn't expect that all the grades would be submitted in time for the early January publication of student grade sheets. Professors will not be penalized, however, for violations of the grading deadline, the Registrar added.

Course evaluations to be distributed

The Course Guide Committee will distribute course questionnaires to students Wednesday in student mailboxes, according to committee member Mark Lanier '80. The responses will be collected by student representatives in each house and freshman entry during reading and exam periods, and during Winter Study, he added.

Written comments will be summarized by students familiar with each course being evaluated. These summaries will be edited by a student board composed of Course Guide Committee members and a major in the department concerned. The final summaries will be sent to the professors whose courses are being evaluated, and their reactions will be published in the guide.

The Williams Record

Bill Dahling, Peter Jacobson

This is the last issue of the Record for the year as a number of the editors naively hope to pass some of their final exams. The survivors expect to begin anew in January. The next issue of the Record will appear Friday, January 7, 1977. The deadline for copy will be Wednesday at 2:00 as usual. The Record staff wishes the entire college community a happy holiday and a joyful New Year.

The Williams Record is an independent journal published semi-weekly during the regular school year by students of Williams College. Opinions expressed in Letters to the Editor, Viewpoints and regular columns of the Record do not necessarily represent the opinions of the Record. Unless signed, editorials represent the opinions of the editors-in-chief.

All unsolicited articles and Letters to the Editor should be signed by the writer although names may be withheld from publication by request. The Record retains the right to edit such material, too long otherwise for publication. Deadlines are Sunday and Wednesday afternoons at 2:00.

Entered as second class postal matter Nov. 27, 1944 at the post office in North Adams, MA., and reenetered at Williamstown, MA., March 3, 1973 under the act of March 3, 1879. Second class postage paid at Williamstown, MA., 01267. Subscription price is 10 per year. Subscription orders, undeliverable copies and change of address notices, and other correspondence should be addressed to the newspaper at Baxter Hall, Williams College, Williamstown, MA., 01267. Phone 413-597-2400.

Record announces promotions

Ron Adams '77 continues as business manager with Jeff Verney '77 filling the ad manager spot.

Three of the five members comprising the past year's editorial board are retiring. Editors-in-chief Dave Ross and George Schutzer, along with managing editor Peter Jacobson, will become contributing editors for the spring semester of their senior years. Senior Andy Kahane departs as photography editor, joining retiring junior editors Tim Layden (sports) and Sue Galli (features) as contributing editors, each in their respective departments.

Fenn joined the Record-Advocate in the fall of 1974 as a reporter and was named news editor after his first semester with the paper. He served as news editor for a year, during which the ReAd returned to its former title of The Williams Record and resumed semi-weekly publication, and was appointed managing editor in December 1975, where he has served for the past year. Fenn was editor of his high school paper the Shattuck Spectator.

"The choice for editor-in-chief was obvious," said Ross. "As news editor, Scott developed a fundamental feel for the way decisions are made and received at Williams. He's a born skeptic, never accepting things as they seem to be, while at the same time he handles individuals with a refreshing sensitivity at a College where everyone seems to hide behind masks," stated Ross. Schutzer stated that he is "confident that the quality of The Williams Record will continue to improve under Scott's guidance."

Dahling joined the paper in January 1975, serving on the production and layout staff. He was named managing editor last January. Currently serving as vice-president of Dennett House, Dahling also edited his high school paper and yearbook. Schutzer stated that he is "especially pleased that Bill is going to continue with the Record." Ross noted, "Bill is one of the hardest working members on the Record staff and he has again and again stepped in to pick up the slack when others have neglected their duties."

Cohen and Coney joined the paper in January 1975 as news reporters. Both were promoted to associate editor that fall and named co-editor of the news department last January.

Cohen served as editor of his high school newspaper, the Blueprint, and attended the Indiana University High School Journalism Institute. He has been recognized by several press associations and was a National Quill and Scroll award winner. Coney also served as editor of her high school newspaper. Schutzer stated, "Jim brings solid journalistic experience to the paper while Sally's experience in student-faculty committees will bring new perspectives to the paper." Ross added that Sally's efforts in training freshmen this year had left the Record with "a strong pool of available talent."

MacGregor joined the Record in the fall of his freshman year as a staff reporter and was promoted to associate editor last February. He edited his high school literary magazine.

Rindlaub joined the Record as a features writer his freshman year and was appointed associate editor in the spring of that year. Schutzer stated, "John has been a vital aspect in the improvement in the quality of features in the past year."

Herwitz begins his third term as arts editor, having been appointed in the spring of 1975. He is currently president of WCFM.

Read served the paper as a staff photographer and associate editor his freshman year. He was appointed photography editor in December 1975. Read co-edited last year's Gul, the College yearbook, and will edit this year's. "He has shaped the photography department into a quality operation while giving freely of his time," Schutzer said.

"Oettgen continues the recent tradition of highly skilled artistic photographers working for the Record," noted Ross. Oettgen joined the paper this fall, and has produced consistently as a staff photographer.

Carr has been active as a staff reporter in the sports department for the past two years covering cross country and track. Rhein joined the Record in the fall of this year, also as a sports reporter. Ross said, "These two new faces should help broaden the perspective of our sports coverage."

Lewis joined the Record in the fall of this year and was quickly promoted to associate editor. "Under Cathy's leadership the graphics department of the Record has moved from near extinction to becoming a vital aspect of the paper," Ross exclaimed.

Buckner joined the Record features department a year ago. In September of this year he was promoted to associate editor and transferred to the news department. McCabe, who edited her high school paper, joined the paper in the fall of her freshman year, serving as a reporter and later as a staff assistant. She was appointed associate editor in the fall of this year. Schutzer stated that "these are two of our hardest working sophomores and they both bring unique talents to the position of layout editor." He added that they will form an integral part in the smooth operation of the paper in the future.

Continuing as contributing editors are: Dennis O'Shea, Andy O'Donnell, Scott Hoot, Charlie Janson, and Tony Spaeth.

New associate editors will be announced in January.

Letters: tenure, energy, fun

No input to CAP

To the editor:

Every year when the CAP emerges from behind closed doors with its fateful tenure decisions, there are students and faculty alike who are shocked and outraged by the content of those decisions. Petitions are circulated, letters are written, a new student committee is formed, but essentially the system remains the same.

In my four years at Williams, I have seen no evidence that the concern and interest of the students has been more effectively included in the tenure system. This year I took the time to write a "thoughtful letter" on the behalf of a professor that had been a true inspiration in my education. I am now relegated to the ranks of the shocked and outraged who discovered that their favorite professor was denied tenure. The worst of it is that this system is void of any two-way communication.

Do we have any idea of how these tenure decisions were made? Do we know how much weight was given to student input? Do we know how many books one has to write to have done "enough research". Do we know why a department can "highly recommend" a professor for tenure and still have the CAP turn him down? The answer is, unequivocally, no!

I think that we are incredibly fortunate to be in a school that allows the students to know their professors on a personal basis. It is also very encouraging that the students show an active interest in tenure decisions and course evaluations. In that light, it is discouraging that the administration has not made an effort to involve these students in the process; to open up lines of meaningful communication; and to take advantage of one of the few areas where students show a strong enough interest to get organized.

The controversy about the tenure decisions raises a much larger question that is applicable to admissions criteria, housing regulations, and a host of other college policies. Are we merely consumers of a product that is created and evaluated behind closed doors? Or are we involved in a dynamic system of education where students play an integral role in the focus and definition of their institution?

Ross Chiet

Keep Tietenberg

To the editor:

The decision of the Committee on Appointments and Promotions to deny tenure to Tom Tietenberg raises some interesting questions regarding the goals of Williams College. The reason the Committee gave, in overturning the Economics Department's recommendation, was that he had not published enough research. In making this decision, the CAP ignored a large body of student input which had rated him highly. The responses of those signing the petitions indicate that most students thought the decision to be very unfair and incorrect. Those who have had Tietenberg in class consider him to be one of the best teachers here at Williams. His organization and preparation for class are upstaged only by his love for teaching and interest in his students. It was obvious to his students that he "wanted more than anything else to teach at Williams."

The question this raises is, what constitutes a good professor at Williams College? For the CAP a good professor is a good researcher and teaching ability and interest in students is almost secondary. The students, however, seem to have a different concept of a good professor. A good professor is a good teacher, one who is interested in the students and can teach them what they come here to learn. The superior professors not only get the material across clearly, but also instill in the student a certain thrill and desire for learning. Tom Tietenberg is a member of this rare breed of teachers.

It is not as though he has not done any research. He has kept up with the leaders of his field in studying air pollution and worked for the Federal Energy Administration in Washington. But that is not the point. The point is that the amount of articles a professor has written has little relationship to his teaching ability and it should certainly not outweigh both department and student support in the tenure decision. Research is important but it certainly does not make or break a Williams professor's ability to teach.

Possibly the problem is not enough student input into the tenure decision. The CAP should include some student members, say one from each division, for the present system is not working. There is a communication breakdown between those of us who pay $6,000 a year for a Williams education and those who feel that Williams College should become Williams Research Institute.

This is not the first example of this discrepancy nor will it be the last. I just hope that the ultimate goal of Williams College, educating young people, will be realized and I encourage the Trustees to examine Tom Tietenberg's case and reverse the decision. The future reputation of Williams College ultimately depends on the quality of teaching. Let's keep it high.

Letting go

To the editor:

"Twas the night before the weekend
And all through Spring Street
Not a creature was stirring
Not even an Eph ... Where is everybody?

The atmosphere at Williams College is becoming increasingly oppressive. Our concern with academics has been exaggerated to the point where we are losing sight of another aspect of the Williams experience: fun. We wander the campus in a bleary-eyed state of panic about our next paper while we wonder where the semester has gone. In our preoccupation with our work, we tend to ignore a lot of other things around us, and this individual isolation is destroying the cohesiveness which is unique to the spirit of Williams. Why else would there be such an increase in off-campus living applications?

Our solution is not to bag the work, but to keep it in its proper perspective. There is more to college than hour exams, writing papers, and all-nighters in the reserve room. This doesn't mean going to the other extreme and getting blitzed every Saturday night. The debate over alcohol has missed the point. Excessive drinking is a symptom of a more fundamental problem; weekend blowouts are often a reflection of week-day tension.

A spontaneous release of the day to day pressures is not present on campus. We are not advocating a return to the "beavodemo" mentality (we don't want to cause problems for Security), but there is room for a little imaginative rowdiness.

What ever happened to ... skinny-dipping in Muir Pool putting Mickey Mouses on the gym clock
Prank Day
Removing all the campus toilet paper
Tuesday Night at the Pub Club
Streaking green through Baxter in honor of St. Patrick's Day
Cementing a toilet in front of Baxter
Snowmen
Thursday Night parties

This is exam period and the crunch has hit, but the tense atmosphere has persisted throughout the semester. Winter Study is not the only time when non-academic pursuits are important. The promotion for Trivia this year has been great, but it's the exception that proves the rule.

By breaking the tension with a little creativity, we can start relaxing a little more and worrying less. If we glance up from our books every once in a while, we might realize something new and different: four years at Williams is not an experience to suffer through but to enjoy.

Yours in the library,

Energy use

To the editor:

In Friday's article by Steve Davidson, "Energy Research Pays Off", the statement "... a cruise to Smith (one way) takes more energy than it does to heat West College on a typical winter day" seemed to be a brilliant association which I had overlooked. The words embodied a fine summary of how I have found many college students; forever involved in the consumptive rituals of their own immaturity. An impulsive cruise to Smith costing more than the energy required to keep your true home warm all day! Good Grief! What a juvenile, thoughtless expense.

I have deep regrets, therefore, in classifying the above example inoperative, at least in its energetic logic. One would have to "cruise" to Smith in a Sherman Tank at two gallons to the mile to ever use as much energy as West College does in a day. Besides me telling you that war is bad, I will backtrack and say that Steve Davidson was not completely wrong. One can compare the two uses of energy, driving to Smith and heating West College, but the example will be more correct if we use an hour of energy to West College rather than a day. This is to say that the energy required to drive to Smith is a little less than that required to heat West College for a typical winter hour.

Other than this small inconsistency, I found the article well researched and quite commendable. It is my only hope that more attention will be paid to the crucial issues of energy usage in the days to come. Before energy research can really pay off to the students, to those who are paying the term bills, those supporting the consumption of 235 billion BTU's a year in their educational behalf, the information should be more available, and the guarded halls of decision more accessible.

Thank you,
Reed Zars

Student gallery hosts 'portrait of an artist'

by Melle Rockefeller

Old Work - as opposed to - New Play is Nate Beckemeier's 'portrait of an artist'. He takes us through his life and current work in a very impressive series of prints that have been on display in the Student Art Gallery (Dodd House) since Nov. 30.

The display begins by telling us about Nate the person. In 'Craig's Lunch' he smiles shyly from within the television (lower right corner), from a picture suspended on the wall, and finally, as the luncher, who is aware of his middle-class American backdrop, and has the technique to portray it sympathetically.

The foil to his beginning is his present, represented by 'Bon A Tirer'. It is a selection of semi-abstract, eerie colored prints unified in one frame by the theme of creating a print. The autobiographical touch is evident by the last panel in which both the work and the artist are 'bon a tirer'—ready to be printed.

The other three works are very subjective and varied in style. 'J. Doe' takes the idea of form and its reverse, of solid and void, in a play of opposites. The stamp becomes the paper, the addressee, the anonymous J. Doe, and the back and front of the envelope are equally visable, and opposite. Perhaps his best work is "Hematite Red', a series of three identical posters advertising hematite, or bloodstone, the basis rock of the earth. A subtle color progression in the three from grey-blue to bright red highlights a different aspect of each, and bears witness to the artist's excellent understanding of color and printmaking.

'Messiah' sing Friday

All students and faculty are invited to participate in an open performance of Handel's "Messiah" at 8 p.m. Friday in Chapin Hall. Participants are asked to bring a copy of the score if possible. Refreshments will be served.

Students may no longer throw away their newspapers, due to a town ordinance requiring recycling.

Marxist 'Marigolds'

by Peter Bergethon

Last Friday and Saturday evenings saw the presentation of Paul Zindel's "The Effect of Gamma Rays on Man-in- the- Moon Marigolds" in the studio theatre of the AMT. The play is commonly regarded as a humanistic piece glorifying the basic worth of each human being, but director Todd Anderson chose to approach the play from a different perspective. Anderson attempted to present the play in the light of Marxist theatre and therefore bring a different message to the play. Unfortunately he ran into a number of problems, the primary one was a difficulty to express his ideas as clearly on stage as in conversation. The attempt however was a noble one, and well in touch with the purpose of the experimental theatre. Gamma Rays, like other studio shows, provided for the education of the student director, designers, and actors, as well as allowing an individual to approach a particular problem from a different viewpoint than is normally accepted.

While Anderson had some problems in communicating his philosophical ideas, he is to be commended for assembling a cast that in addition to providing a welcome change of faces, gave a series of performances that gave an entertaining and enjoyable show. Nina Girvetz provided a substantial and consistent character of the mother Beatrice. Girvetz illuminated the character and gave it a humanity, without falling into the pitfalls of either being psychopathically viscous or simperingly melodramatic. Kate Leslie as Tillie played her part nicely and hopefully will be seen more often in AMT shows. Kim Heesner as Ruth, Kathy Rorison as Nancy and Annie Ko as Janice Vicary gave solid performances that gave a nice polish to the overall show.

Clark shows impressionist

A major exhibition, centered around the art of the Dutch painter Johan Barthold Jongkind and on his contribution to the origins of Impressionism and to the development of French landscape painting during the second half of the nineteenth century, will open December 17 at the Clark Art Institute. Over one hundred works of art will be shown, with examples by Boudin, Constable, Corot, Courbet, Millet and Monet, and a number of interesting works by lesser known artists such as Cals, Dubourg, Dupre, Isabey, Lavieille, Lepine, Pecrus, and Thiollet. The main emphasis, however, will be on Jongkind, represented by thirty-four paintings, watercolors and drawings. This is the first museum exhibition ever held in the U.S. of the work of Jongkind.

A fully illustrated catalogue is being prepared by Charles C. Cunningham, Chief Curator of the Institute. The exhibition, which has already been shown at the Smith College Museum of Art, is entitled Jongkind and the Pre-Impressionists: Painters of the Ecole Saint-Simeon, and will be on view at the Institute through February 13, 1977, Tuesday through Sunday, 10:00-5:00.

Soft forms exhibit opens

An exhibition of Sally Winston Robinson's Cliche-Verre photo—chemical works on paper opened last week at the Williams College Museum of Art in Lawrence Hall. The exhibit, entitled "Structures and Soft Forms," is free and open to the public and will remain on view until December 21.

Cliche-Verre is a photo-chemical printmaking process which uses film, developing chemicals photo-sensitive paper, dye transfer paper and Kodak dyes for creating images. The film itself, usually a Matrix film consisting of a layer of emulsion and a layer of acetate, is manipulated before developing. The resulting images are often strange veil- like forms.

The works in the Williams College exhibition are one of a kind. Many of them have gone beyond the classic Cliche-Verre technique into painting with light and developing chemicals to achieve soft liquid shapes.

A graduate of Bennington College, Sally Winston Robinson received her M.A. in Printmaking: Lithography and her M.F.A. in Printmaking: Cliche-Verre from Wayne State University. She has studied with Hans Hoffman, Paul Feeley, Kark Knaths, and Leon Kroll, and has taught printmaking and silkscreening at Wayne State. She has had several one-woman shows, including one at the Parke-McCullogh Museum this year, and has exhibited in many group shows.

Robinson is represented by two galleries in London, two in New York City, and one in her home state, Michigan.

Purple pucksters blank Jeffs, clip Cardinals, 3-2

by Tim Layden

The Williams all-sophomore first line of Dan Sullivan, Chris Egizi, and Chick Johnson picked up six of the team's eight weekend goals as the Ephs opened their 1976-77 hockey season with back-to-back wins over Little Three foes Amherst and Wesleyan.

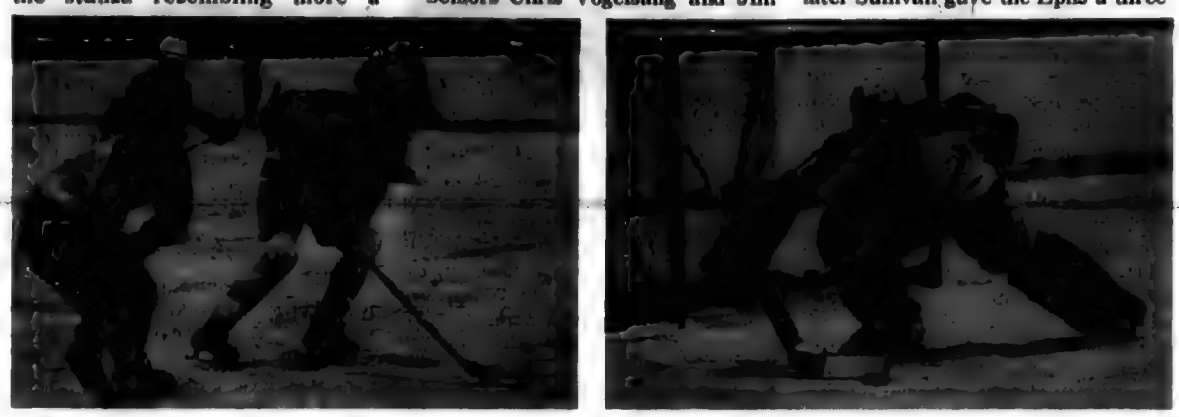
The two victories gave Purple Head Coach Bill McCormick a lifetime total of 200 victories and ran the Williams Little Three winning streak to 19 games. The Ephs are 2-0 on the season, while Amherst is 1-1 and the Cardinals 0-3.

The Ephmen came into the weekend round-robin, (Trinity also competed) having had an easy time of it with its fellow Little Three members over the past five years, and Friday night's 5-0 win over the Lord Jeffs was no exception.

Amherst, as is usually the case, came to Chapman rink sky-high, and with everything to gain and nothing to lose. The Jeffs controlled the action for much of the game's first seven minutes, keeping play in front of Williams netminder Chuck Cremens. The Jeff bubble, however, was burst early, as Johnson fired home the first Williams goal of the season, zipping a forehand past goalie Jeff Fine from directly in front of the goal off assists from Sullivan and Egizi.

The remainder of the first period was scoreless and marked by good, crisp hitting on both sides, with one three-minute stretch near the end of the stanza resembling more a demolition derby than a hockey game. Williams, however, put the game away in the final two periods.

Seniors Chris Vogelsang and Jim Hield hooked up at 16:55 of the second period, with Hield getting the goal from the left crease. Just 48 seconds later Sullivan gave the Ephs a three-goal edge from Egizi and Johnson.



The third period was icing on the cake for Williams, as Egizi fired number four past a disconsolate Fine (18 saves). Pete Elkind fed fellow penalty-killer Brian Norris with a nice pass a 7:11 to close out the night's scoring.

The players on both squads, apparently releasing pent-up energies from the game's 90-minute starting delay, pumped in all the contest's goals in the first period. Williams junior defenseman Jim Norton opened the scoring with a power-play slapper from the point from Sullivan and Rick Zeller.

Wesleyan's Jim LaLiberty knotted the count three minutes later, but Johnson's fine feed just 37 seconds later found Egizi in perfect position and the Ephs were back on top. Paul Ficher's Cardinal score at 13:10 made the lead a short-lived one and tied the game at 2-2.

Egizi's third goal of the season, from defensemen Norton and Vogelsang decided the issue at 18:05 of the first period.

The going gets tougher for McCormick's pucksters this week in their final pre-exam game. The Ephs travel to Springfield to face veteran-laden A.I.C., 10-6 victors a year ago.

Geoff Daley shovels a pass off to Jim Rooney as they converge on the net. Ed Weiss turns aside a long shot against Wesleyan. (Photo by Oettgen)

Middies squashed first time ever

No, the brass at West Point did not threaten the entire Williams squash team with immediate induction if they did not thrash Navy in partial revenge for Army's football embarrassment at the hands of the Middies this fall. Coach Dave Johnson's squad definitely had revenge in mind as they swamped Navy 7-2, but the revenge was not Army initiated; Williams had never beaten Navy in the previous 23 meetings between the two teams. The Ephs now own a 2-0 record as they break for exams and vacation.

Williams' shotmaking ability, on a par with that of any swine flu clinic, proved to be a major factor in the win played on the chilly Lasell courts. More importantly, however, Coach Johnson prepared his team mentally for the aggressive, no holds barred playing style of the Midshipmen.

Leading the Ephs to victory was captain and no. one Marc Reinhardt with an easy three set win. Other seniors for whom the long awaited triumph was especially sweet were no. five Charlie Haines, no. six Tim Belk (both conquerers of their Navy foes).

Arnie Cogswell continued his strong play in the second position as did Jim Little (no. 7), both recording four set wins. Junior Jim Parsons, playing nine on the Eph's well balanced ladder, excelled in winning three straight sets. Chip Lindquist staged an exciting comeback for a five set win at no. three, while Martin Goldberg's salvoes were not enough to keep him from going down at no. four.

Ephs dunk Lord Jeffs

by Dennis O'Shea

The varsity swim team opened its bid for a fifth consecutive Little Three title with a 75-38 conquest of Amherst Saturday afternoon at Muir Pool. The Ephmen won ten of 13 events, and earned one-two sweeps in four of eleven individual races. Diver Jeff Erickson was the sole double winner as everyone got into the scoring act.

Junior Phil Wild's illness gave Amherst more than they might have had in the freestyles. Jeff sprinters Mark Parisi and Artie Southam swept the 100, while Bruce Bain and Chris de la Rama took first and third in the 200.

Headlining the Williams effort was freshman Tom Beckett, who premiered in varsity competition with a frosh record in the 50 freestyle. His time of 22.0 bettered Wild's two year old by .24 of a second, and missed the College standard set in 1973 by Tom Crain by only .05.

Another freshman, Dave Amlicke, salted away a 400 freestyle relay win with a 49.7 anchor split that stretched a tenuous half second lead to better than two seconds. Beckett recorded the afternoon's second best split, 51.1.

Co-captain Duff Anderson and junior Stuart Deans traded wins in a pair of 1-2 distance event sweeps. Anderson's 5:14.2 clocking in the 500 freestyle was faster than any Williams swim until January last year. Deans outclassed the field in the 1000, beating Anderson by 8 seconds and the closest Jeff swimmer by 27.

It took a judges' decision to unravel the 2:25.5 synchronized swimming act put on by Paul vom Eigen and Chris Clark in the 200 breaststroke. They finally gave the first place nod to vom Eigen, but the order of finish hardly mattered: Amherst's John Bacon was more than four seconds behind.

Todd Piper and Peter Howd netted the fourth Williams sweep in the 200 individual medley, Piper coming within half a second of the freshman record in that event. He also led off the free relay, while Howd finished third in the 200 butterfly won by Guy Hoelzer.

In the unscored women's half of the first ever coed Little Three meet, Ephwomen won all four events, sweeping all but one. Backstroker Nina Murphy won the 50 breaststroke, while freestyler Keron Walker won the 50 back. They joined Sue Tuttle and Joanna Monroe in a 200 freestyle relay win. Monroe, Tuttle, Walker and Randall Morrow took the 200 medley relay.

The Ephmen's first real challenge of the season will come during tomorrow's trip to UConn. Coach Carl Samuelson rates this one among "our three toughest in the league this year." Huskie sprinter Bob Summa and diver Bruce Sweet have graduated, but defending New England's Freestyle champion Jay Cilfone heads up a talented squad.

Committee supports ski rules, women's sports

by Dennis O'Shea

A women's intramural squash tournament and round robin softball league will definitely be set up during Winter Study and second semester, Linda D. Wilkins, Instructor in Physical Education, reported to the Athletic Committee on Thursday.

Activities are being planned in accordance with a survey of all undergraduate women administered by Wilkins in early October. Of 173 tennis, 42 per cent in squash, and 41 per cent in softball.

Wilkins also said that, wherever possible, intramurals will be organized on a house-entry basis, in response to the feelings of 53 per cent of the respondents who felt that method was superior to organization on a class or open basis.

The committee took no formal action on Wilkins' report other than to call it "encouraging" and offer its support for "experimentation in women's intramurals on a sport by sport basis."

In other matters, the committee unanimously approved a proposal from women's ski coach Karen Fisher concerning qualifying for the women's skiing nationals. The proposal was designed to circumvent a conflict between AIAW qualification procedures which emphasize team competition and NESCAC rules which prohibit it on a national basis.

Under the new procedure Williams will accept any team bids offered by AIAW and then apply its own qualification standards to determine which individuals will be eligible to attend. Skiers finishing in the top 25 per cent at the Easterns, or, in the case of those unable to compete or disqualified there, consistently in the top 25-30 per cent in regular season competition, will be allowed to represent the College.

The Athletic Committee is planning a meeting open to the entire College to discuss all aspects of the Williams athletic program. The meeting will be held sometime during Winter Study.

Items to be discussed include NESCAC rules, facility expansion, and the women's athletic program and intramurals. Suggestions for further agenda items should be made to committee chairman Robert W. Friedrichs in Stetson Hall (x2339).

Tufts holds off Eph comeback

A talented Tufts University five jumped on the Williams varsity basketball team early in the first half and then withstood a furious second half comeback to post a 90-76 victory in Medford Saturday night.

The Ephs, now 0-2 on the season, fell behind by 21 points with just 8:30 minutes gone by in the game and went into the locker room down by 19, 55-36.

The second half proved to be Jekyll to the first half's Hyde. Whatever Coach Tong put in the Ephs' orange slices, it worked, and they came out smoking in the second stanza, whittling the margin down to five, 65-60 with approximately ten minutes left in the game. Tufts quickly put on a press, however, and gradually pulled away.

Senior co-captain Mike Tanner exploded for 29 points to pace the Eph attack. Junior forwards Brad Wolk and Tom Balderston chipped in with 10 apiece, while the kiddie corps backcourt of sophomore Gerry Kelly and freshman Andy Straka, who only had 7 combined points in their debut against Hamilton, showed rapid improvement with 10 and 8 points respectively.

Thursday night the Ephs close the Bicentennial portion of their schedule with their first home encounter of the season as they entertain Drew University from Madison, N.J. at 8:00 in the cozy confines of Lasell Gymnasium. According to the 1975 Almanac, Drew is a private college boasting 1,904 students and the usual assortment of home-grown Jersey hoop talent. The Eph frosh host Mt. Greylock at 6:00.

May eliminate at-large reps

CC redrafts constitution

by George Schutzer

The College Council discussed proposals that would eliminate the six at-large representatives to the Council and make the secretary and treasurer elective offices, Wednesday night.

The proposals were part of a draft of a new constitution which By-laws Committee chairman Stuart Ginsberg '77 presented to the Council.

The draft establishes rules for impeachment of College Council officers for non-fulfillment of specially stated duties. It calls for automatic dismissal of representatives who miss three consecutive meetings.

The By-Laws Committee made the presentation in order to solicit comments and recommendations which will be used to revise the draft. The committee will present a new version next week.

In other action, Jim Bowe, a co-chairman of the All College Entertainment Committee (ACEC) predicted that the three jazz concerts sponsored by the committee will cost about $8300. Bowe said he expected ticket receipts of $6000-$6500 resulting in a net loss of $2000-$2500.

The student-faculty Admissions Committee will conduct an open forum with five or six students discussing "what I looked for and what I found" at Williams, Larry Mitchell, a committee member, announced. The forum is scheduled for Wednesday night in Jesup Hall.

Council vice-president, Randy Sturges, announced that the elections committee is seeking self-nominations for chairman of Williams Health, Education, and Welfare (WHEW), the College social committee. Prior to the Christmas recess, the Council approved a Student Housing Committee recommendation to reconstitute the committee. WHEW disbanded last fall when the Council refused to fund it.

WHEW's chief responsibility in previous years has been coordinating parties and activities for Winter Carnival and Spring Weekends. But the housing committee proposal asked for the formation of a committee composed of the social chairmen of the 15 residential houses and representatives of the freshman class which would meet regularly. The committee would be responsible for coordinating use of major party areas as well as helping to establish guidelines for use of facilities and security officers for parties.

Self-nominations are due in the Dean's Office, 4:00 p.m., Monday.

The Council also made six committee appointments at its meeting before vacation. It appointed Paul Boyer '77, Michael Knight '77, and Brad Caine '78 to the Junior Advisor selection committee and Steve Case '80, Marcus Smith '78 and Jim Parsons '78 to the ACEC.

A majority of the Council members present favored a campus-wide election for treasurer. Presently, only the president and vice-president are elected in this way. Cath Carpenter's proposal to require use of tickets in campaigns and balloting was voted down solidly.

Students registered for 65 non-credit Free University courses Wednesday night. These informal courses, taught by members of the Williams community and townspeople from as far away as Pittsfield are open to everyone in the area. According to Sue Shellenberger, a director of the Free University, many courses were oversubscribed, some by more than three or four times their expected enrollments. (photo by Oettgen)

Admissions picks 83 women, 78 men early decision

Williams has accepted 161 students for the class of 1981, roughly one-third of the total number projected class size of 475. From 539 early decision candidates, 281 men and 259 women, Director of Admissions Philip Smith said that 78 men and 83 women were chosen on a sex-blind basis.

The number of acceptances represents a larger percentage of the entire projected class than last year, when 155 of 542 applicants were accepted in December. Last year the admissions committee overshot a projected freshman population of 483 by 12, admitting 483 students. Smith stated that this year's aim is to maintain a class of 475.

Smith described the early decision acceptances as "a very interesting group." Quite diverse geographically, 28 states and five foreign countries are represented in the group. There are also more financial aid candidates than in previous years, Smith added.

Smith projects a 55-45 male-female ratio or at least 40 per cent women in next year's freshman class. Last year the projected ratio of 59-41 turned out to be 57-43.

The Admissions Office sent two types of deferral letters to those applicants not accepted under the early decision plan. One informed the candidate that acceptance was unlikely and the other than 10 to 20 per cent of the group would be accepted. Last year no one in the first category was admitted. Both deferred and accepted applicants were notified by December 15.

Fall grades arrive on time

by Stu Massad

Most first semester grades came out this week, some two weeks earlier than in past years, because action by the College Council and the Committee on Academic Standing last spring resulted in faculty approval of grade deadlines, according to Registrar George C. Howard.

Upperclassmen received their grades early in the week, but freshmen did not receive theirs until Wednesday. Dean of Freshmen Lauren R. Stevens said the wait came while he prepared letters for enclosure with the grades. The letters congratulated the estimated 51 per cent of the class who had made the Dean's List or cautioned students whose grades placed them in danger of academic probation.

According to Howard, 347 students did not receive all their grades. This gap occurred, he noted, because seven class lists from "perennially late" grade returners had not been handed in Dec. 30 when the grade sheets were run.

Until last spring, Howard said, there had been no definite time for turning in grades. The traditional deadline, he remarked, had been two days after the final exam. Since many courses now have no final and since the deadline was not official, he noted that it came to be "honored in the breach."

The College Council passed a resolution early last year requesting that a time limit be set for the return of grades, because students with low marks sometimes did not learn until late in January that they would be forced to resign from the College. The Committee on Academic Standing, also concerned with this problem, prepared in April guidelines for reporting grades to the Registrar's Office.

The faculty passed the guidelines last May, making Dec. 22 the suggested deadline for first semester grades. Howard reported that 17.5 per cent of the class lists were still not in then, but that almost 95 per cent had been returned by Dec. 30.

The effort and expense required in preparing grades was not initially greater than in previous years, Howard said. He expects that it will be, however, citing the need for a new printing of the final grade sheets for the students whose grade listings were incomplete. He also noted that he has been forced to personally contact some professors who have not returned class lists, so that the Committee on Academic Standing can begin reviewing students in academic difficulty.

"It's a perennial problem; it's a problem everywhere," Howard remarked about the difficulties in getting grades out on time. "Overall," he said, it has improved this semester." He observed that most faculty have responded well to the new guidelines and did not project any changes in the present method of collecting and issuing grades.

21 receive internships

The Mead Fund Committee has selected an unusually large number of sophomore and junior applicants to participate in the 1977 Summer Intern Program in Government.

Sophomore Chris DiAngelo and juniors Valerie Anderson, Sarah Baldwin, Peter Berg, Bruce Doblin, Katherine Frank, Jane Garvey, John Graubert, Jonathan Hattenbach, Scott Hoot, Harry Kelly, Vincent Prada, Debbie Robinson, Daniel Rudolph, Charles Sanders, Jeff Shed, Kate Stone, Paul Strauss, Don Toumey, Brian Vanicky and Peter Van Oot will serve in the offices of congressmen, federal agencies, and special interest organizations such as Common Cause.

Sue R. Little, Co-ordinator of the Mead Summer Program, said that 51 students applied for positions as interns as opposed to about 40 last year. Seventeen were selected in 1976. Little attributed the increase in the number of interns to the record number of applications this year and to the number of "very well qualified applicants who the committee was reluctant to turn down." Tietenberg decision holds

The Committee on Appointments and Promotions reconsidered its negative tenure recommendation for Assistant Professor of Economics Thomas Tietenberg, but did not change the recommendation, according to former Dean of the Faculty Neil Grabois.

The reconsideration resulted from a petition circulated by senior economics majors Bob Fox, Jane Lester, and Pat Pilkonis last month and signed by 219 students.

In a letter sent to the petitioners, Grabois informed them of the decision. The CAP "was mindful of" the petition's opinion, but did not feel justified in changing its decision, said the letter. Fox described the CAP as willing to hear the petition's arguments, but said they "did not feel it added anything" to the factors they were considering. The CAP refused to explain its decision in greater detail, saying that their "reasons must remain confidential."

Fox criticized the "tight-lipped" nature of the tenure granting process as it presently exists, and described the present mechanism for student input as inadequate. He plans to talk with other students during January about possible improvements. "The whole process needs to be reviewed," he said. There are presently no plans to proceed with an appeal of the Tietenberg decision, according to Fox, since "if he does not appeal, there is nothing more we can do." Tietenberg said in December, before the reconsideration, that he would not appeal the CAP recommendation.

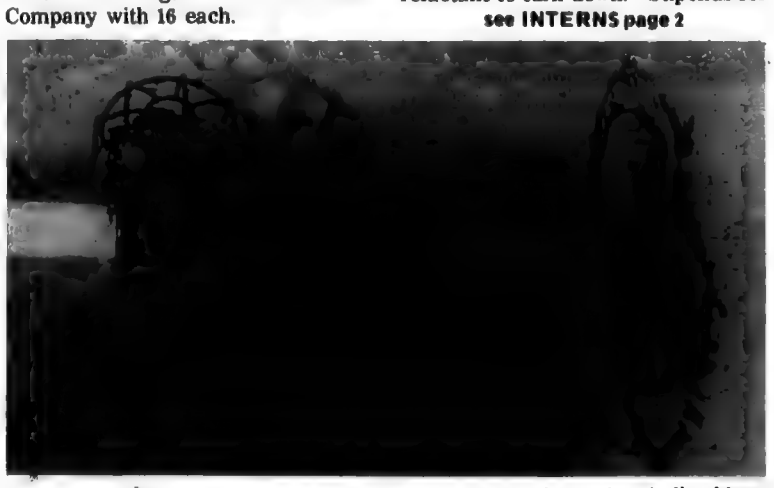
Buddha Bear tops trivia

by Keron Walker



According to statistics released by BOMO officials Wednesday, Buddha Bear, winner of the 21st semi-annual trivia contest by three points, missed only 24 of the possible 287 points in the entire contest and had the night's only perfect hour.

"They had the most consistent and greatest gusto," said Mitch Katz, a member of the retiring championship team. "They were first all the way, although they had to fight off Bumble in the closing hours."

General Bumble, a long-standing trivia powerhouse which has won the contest twice in the last ten years, was considered a major competitor for the December title. Dan Gardner, another seasoned BOMO veteran, said, "We were looking for Bumble to finish high in this contest, which it did. But perhaps Bumble is past its prime. The team had good gusto but they couldn't catch Buddha Bear and were challenged by the fresh blood of the freshman team, Alphabet Soup." Alphabet Soup had a strong rookie outing, third overall with a total of 238 points.

The final standings for the teams were: Buddha Bear, 263; General Bumble, 260; Alphabet Soup, 236; Morgasm, 228; Spam, 227; House of Gee, 218; Hold the Anchovies, 211; Knights of Ni, 164; Twelve O'Clock High, 152; Son of Wingnuts, 133; Cabal, 129; Pork, 110; and Ding City, 108.

They were followed by House of Merc, 88; PTG, the highest finishing out of state team, 87; Moe, Larry and Curly, 73; Scheister Savings and Loan, 46; the Twelve Tribes of Israel, 45; The Scatalogical Society and Harlem River Drive, both with 44; Pards, 29; Sliced Bread, 21; and the Brothers Burlington and Avacado and Company with 16 each.

Grade Report

College Registrar George Howard and most faculty members should be congratulated on their prompt filing of grades for last semester. For the first time in recent memory upperclassmen received their grades within a day after returning from Christmas recess. Freshmen waited two days longer while enclosure letters for the Dean's List and academic probation were prepared.

In past years, faculty procrastination and delay in processing grades has resulted in needless headaches for the Committee on Academic Standing and students which await their decision on whether they will be forced to resign from the College, prize committees and students filing applications dependent on those grades. Most professors, by getting their grades in promptly at the end of last semester, showed that such delays are unnecessary.

Nevertheless, a problem still remains. A few professors, who Howard has called perennial offenders, did not get their grades in by Dec. 30 when the grade sheets were run. This happened despite the fact that the faculty itself established a suggested deadline of Dec. 22 for first semester grades. The result was conspicuous blank spots on 347 student grade reports. Such tardiness in reporting grades should not be tolerated by students or the faculty in the future. If the faculty is unwilling to impose meaningful sanctions on its perennial offenders, their names should be made public.

Letter addresses tenure decision

To the editor of the Williams Record:

This letter is not about the specific tenure case that has inspired many recent communications, especially two in your issue of Dec. 7th. I have no knowledge whatever of this case, but I thoroughly support the right of students to express falt grievances. My concern is solely with the issue itself. It has emerged so many times in the past forty years—almost always with the same arguments—that I have lost count.

I will not pretend that no mistakes have been made in these decisions over the years, but I have served on the CAP and I do have some knowledge of what happens in these difficult cases. I am sure that it is hard for an undergraduate to understand the broader ramifications of the problem. You have an excellent teacher, and suddenly he is not given tenure. Why?

What follows has been said before (just as the complaints have been), but it has to be said again every time such a case arises. Before doing so may I assure you that I am writing entirely on my own and that I am fronting for nobody.

The College simply cannot afford to place every good teacher on tenure. Remember that a tenure commitment is generally for some thirty years, and each one entails a capital fund of about $10 million—spread over thirty years, yes, but nonetheless entailed.

At the CAP level, therefore, a choice has to be made among those already recommended for tenure by their departments. It is bad enough to have to choose between two in the same department (or one recommended now and another who is likely to be, say, next year). But between members of different departments? The CAP knows a great deal about the teaching ability of those concerned; student opinion is solicited, and it is taken very seriously. But when there is no clear choice on this basis—and I assure you that teaching does come first—other criteria have to come into play.

Productive scholarship (or the equivalent) is the most significant of these. How does the teacher stand up in competition with his peers, not only at Williams but in his own field of competence? Students don't like to be told that they have no way of judging on this basis, but that is the plain truth. They also find it hard to believe that the fine teacher of today is not necessarily the fine teacher of a generation hence. Unfortunately, this does happen on occasion, and the reason is usually that intellectual curiosity and the zest for creative scholarship have dried up. I know of a case where a student used his father's notes in a course and found them excellent. Same teacher, of course, and in father's time he was highly regarded. It takes a Solomon to figure out the chances, and none of us is a Solomon; least of all, I fear, if we are well under twenty-five.

I agree that a productive scholar who slights his teaching should not be given tenure at Williams. This used to happen too often, and no doubt sometimes happens today. But such mistakes are rarer now because student opinion on teaching ability plays a much greater part in decisions than it did, say, twenty years ago.

When I was on the CAP I did not always agree with the decisions taken. As it has turned out (and you can tell after ten years), some who were let go should surely have been retained, and some who were promoted should not have been. But these cases are decidedly in the minority. Please believe me!

NEWS BRIEFS

Teacher disappears from N. Adams

Carol Ann Todd, a 28 year old Wareham schoolteacher, disappeared December 12 while staying at the Sheraton North Adams. Traces of human blood were found in her room. Police are searching for her throughout southern Vermont and Berkshire County. No trace of her had been found by Wednesday night.

Three faculty promoted

Three Williams faculty, Stephen R. Lewis, Neil R. Grabois and Francis C. Oakley received promotions effective January 1. Lewis leaves his provost position to become Economic Consultant to the Ministry of Finance for the government of Botswana. Grabois, math professor and formerly Dean of the Faculty replaced Lewis as Provost. Succeeding Grabois as Dean of the Faculty is history professor Francis Oakley.

WCFM elects new directors

WCFM, recently elected a new board of directors for the year 1977-78. The board terms begin this month.

Peter Green '78 replaced Tom Herwitz '78 as station president. Other juniors elected were Lew Mills, station manager; Dave Breuer, program director; Jeff Crawford, personnel director; Mark Obert-Thorn, classical director and Dan O'Connell, sports director.

Also elected were sophomores Joe Avellar, news director; Tom Soybell, production director; John Svoboda, music director; Steve Jackson, business manager and advertising director; Don Perry, public relations director; and freshmen Bruce Sams, music director and Ed Mills, student engineer.

The new board of directors plans to increase WCFM's news coverage, and develop a listenership questionnaire to determine the station's base. A capital fund drive to allow the revamping of the studios and the repair of old equipment is also planned.

Faculty hiring policy promotes stability

Tenure decisions lack adequate student input

by Peter Rintels

Another round of tenure decisions has been handed down by the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP), some more popular than others. As is inevitable in the wake of controversial decisions, questions of the need for and efficacy of the tenuring process arise.

The tenure system is presently employed by every public and private university in the nation and by 94 per cent of all four-year private colleges. According to the American Association of University Professors, in a 1940 statement on tenure and academic freedom, "Tenure is a means to certain ends: specifically (1) Freedom of teaching and research and of extramural activities and (2) a sufficient degree of economic security to make the profession attractive to men and women of ability. Freedom and economic security, hence tenure, are indispensable to the success of an institution in fulfilling its obligations to its students and society."

Williams College administrators claim that tenure adds stability to the faculty. Dean of the Faculty Neil Grabois stated that without tenured faculty it might be difficult to maintain control over the curriculum since, if teachers of specialized fields left frequently, they would be difficult to replace on short notice. This is less likely to happen if teachers have a long term commitment to the College.

Grabois considers the other extreme—an all tenured faculty—equally undesirable, since it would allow for little flexibility. He said he believes the ideal system is one which balances the number of faculty with a long-term commitment to the College and the number with younger teachers "who bring new ways of looking at things."

A few colleges, such as Hampshire College, are experimenting with a non-tenure system. Grabois said that the results are not conclusive.

Faculty members are evaluated twice before tenure is granted. The first evaluation comes after their initial three year appointment, when a decision is made on whether to reappoint for one, two or three years. A one year reappointment is considered terminal. If a two or three year appointment is made, the faculty member is reevaluated to determine if tenure should be granted at least one year before the appointment runs out.

In evaluating a teacher, departmental recommendations are forwarded to the CAP for full consideration. CAP decisions are in turn forwarded to the trustees who make the final determination. Only under exceptionally extraordinary circumstances will the trustees overturn a CAP decision, such as when procedural requirements have been violated.

It is possible for the CAP to overturn departmental recommendations. This occurred in the decision against Assistant Professor of Economics Tom Tietenberg. President Chandler refused to comment on what circumstances might prompt such an action by the CAP.

Since it is not uncommon for teachers popular with the students to be refused tenure, the question of whether students have sufficient input in tenure decisions often arises. This is apparently a concern of the faculty as well.

In a student-faculty survey taken earlier this year as part of a Political Science 209 course, 75 per cent of the students and 74 per cent of the faculty said that students should either have "a great deal" or "some" influence in tenure decisions. Further, 61 per cent of the faculty and 28 per cent of the students went on to say that this should take the form of "more communication between (relevant) students,—e.g. the majors in each department, and (relevant) faculty,—appropriate committees, department chairmen. But students should not have a vote in the final decision."

In making tenure recommendations to the CAP, each department is required to show that student opinion has been sought and considered. Student opinion is sought mainly to help assess teaching effectiveness, one of three criteria used in judging a teacher's performance. The other two criteria are scholarly activity and service to the community (e.g. membership on student-faculty committees).

"You can hardly judge teaching effectiveness without taking student opinions into account," said Professor of English John Reichert, a member of the CAP.

Grabois also emphasized the need for soliciting student opinion in this area, but pointed out that it could be misleading in some cases. "It is sometimes difficult to distinguish between what you are learning and how much you enjoy what you are learning."

Grabois noted that experiments had been conducted, comparing student reaction to actors who knew nothing about what they were teaching but presented material entertainingly to scholars who gave dry lectures and found that the actors were considered better teachers. He suggested as an example a teacher who skillfully taught ideas that were completely out of date. The students might give such a teacher high marks for effectiveness when in fact they had learned nothing of value.

Both Grabois and Chandler agreed that student input into tenure decisions could conceivably be higher, but that faculty committees were not operating in the dark at present. Said Chandler, "By and large I think the CAP feels confident that it knows what student opinion is." Grabois said that there were many channels open to students who wish to make their feelings known, such as conferences with department chairmen or CAP members, and that "some students use them, others don't."

Student opinion is also actively sought by departments via the student course evaluation sheets, special departmental questionnaires, and interviews with students. Grabois conceded that departments will vary in what weight they give student opinion in making tenure recommendations. Reichert added, however, that "the CAP takes it (student opinion) seriously."

One of the most important aspects of the student input system at Williams is that it comes in gradually over a number of years rather than all at once at decision time. This way, a candidate's good and bad semesters are considered together and the possibility that a teacher is having a bad semester when being considered for tenure will not overly jeopardize his chances. For this reason, administrators oppose establishing a student committee to make separate tenure recommendations, a system which has been adopted by some colleges. They feel that the present modes of input are adequate, provide a healthy variety of ways by which student input is obtained, and prevent "quick" decisions from being made. "There is an ongoing, unpanicky assessment as opposed to an assessment at the moment of decision," said Reichert.

Grabois and Chandler also voiced strong objection to the proposal that students have a vote on the CAP. Grabois believes that this "is a decision that should be made by colleagues who have experience with the institution and who must live with the consequences of the decision." He added that students would not be qualified to assess a candidate's scholarly work, one of the major criteria for granting tenure.

The tenure-granting process involves difficult, and sometimes painful, judgments subject to the inherent limitations of human beings evaluating other human beings. But, as Reichert pointed out, negative tenure decisions do not always imply a negative judgment on the competence of a candidate. He referred specifically to a statement in the faculty handbook: "xx . . . decisions affecting tenure are subject to budgetary considerations, the number and age of tenured professors already in a department, the requirements of special strengths within a field, shifts in student needs, and the overall demand for staff in the College's total program . . ."

Students initiate course

by Wendy Parmet & Bill Wickwire

For the first time in two years, next term's curriculum will include a student initiated course, Avian Biology. These courses originate among students who develop a syllabus with the help of a faculty sponsor.

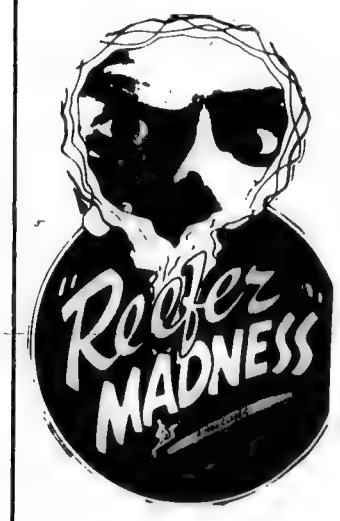
The concept of student initiated courses evolved in the student movement of the late 1960s, as students sought a greater role in the formation of their education. The need for such involvement was especially felt by the black students on campus, since at that time the College did not offer a program in Afro-American studies. Seeing this as a great loss in their education, the students asked the College for the right to develop their own courses. The College agreed that this would be an educationally valuable experience.

Guidelines for the establishment of student initiated courses were written up in January of 1971. But by this time, the College had instituted a regular program in Afro-American studies and the demand for student initiated courses no longer existed. The program has not been utilized to its capacity. In fact, since its inception, only five different courses have been offered, although one of these courses was given three times.

The last student initiated course offered was Humanistic Psychology. Students designed the course so that its structure paralleled the material covered, running classes as a group process. According to one of its alumni, Tony Spaeth '77, it required a great deal of student dedication, but was, "very free . . . and completely experimental."

Robert Marquess, a senior psychology major, tried to revive a similar course for next semester. He discussed the possibility with Professor George R. Goethals and it was agreed that the interest of at least fifteen students would be necessary to offer the course. Marquess tried without success to arouse interest by discussing the course with fellow majors and by announcing it in the Register.

Despite little student interest, the College is in favor of the program. College Dean Peter Berek said that student initiated courses are valuable because they encourage students to think about their courses, commenting, "I'd like to see it used more." In order to facilitate this, the College has created relatively simple procedures for students to create courses.



When a student, or group of students, is interested in forming a course, they must first find a faculty sponsor in the appropriate department. Second to the lack of student interest, this may be the greatest hurdle. Faculty teaching loads are set almost a full year in advance and it is extremely rare for students to decide to initiate a course early enough to have it regularly scheduled. Students usually have to find a professor who will agree to take on an overload. But there are Williams professors who are willing to do this. For example, biology professor Lee Drickamer is taking on Avian Biology in addition to the courses he would normally teach.

Once a sponsor is found, the students, must devise a syllabus and consider the educational justifications for the course, so they can prove its validity to both the department and the Committee on Educational Policy. The course cannot duplicate a regularly offered course.

In order for the CEP to approve the course, the student initiators must also decide upon how students will be selected for it, and what work requirements there will be. Grading must be done by the faculty adviser, but teaching can be done by either the students, the faculty sponsor, or both. In any case, students are expected to contribute more than they would in a normal course.

Abstract art

"Bend" comes to Clark

The spacious entrance court of the Clark Art Institute in Williamstown has a new look. A large abstract painting entitled BEND now hangs in the middle of the west wall, imparting its powerful presence to the space. Painted by Kenneth Noland, the well-known American artist who lives in Shaftsbury, Vermont, BEND is a shaped canvas with several sides and various angles; it measures almost sixteen feet across and over seven feet in height. This "solemn" painting, as the artist terms it, was executed in 1975 and has never, been on public display. The central section of the painting is a dark gray, with three odd-shaped corners of mottled tan, a speckled maroon color, and a deep gray-green.

Kenneth Noland, who was born in 1924 in North Carolina, has taught at the Institute of Contemporary Art and Catholic University, both in Washington, D.C., and also at Bennington College. His work has been exhibited at major museums and galleries both here and abroad, including Harvard's Fogg Art Museum, The Jewish Museum in New York (1965), The Metropolitan Museum of Art (1968 and 1970), and the Rutland Gallery, London (1974). Last year there was a retrospective of his work at the Visual Arts Gallery in New York City. The Museum of Modern Art, Boston's Museum of Fine Arts, and The Art Institute of Chicago are among the many institutions which have examples of his work. His paintings have been primarily abstract, making use of solid shapes and colors. In the early 1960s he favored concentric circles of bright colors ("targets") and then developed very striking angular forms ("chevrons") which led him to shape his canvases into diamonds, parallelograms and, more recently, miscellaneous forms. He has also produced numerous striped paintings, some of which have been thirty feet in length.

Noland supervised the installation of his painting, which is on indefinite loan to the Clark Art Institute.

Hill to perform European organ recital Sunday

Victor Hill will appear in organ recital this Sunday at 8 p.m., in Thompson Memorial Chapel in the season's fourth Griffin Hall concert. The public is invited, free of charge.

Hill will repeat the program played during his European concert tour last spring at the 850-year-old Church of St. Peter in Westerstede, Germany. It opens with the "Chaconne in E minor" of Buxtejude, and continues with three pieces by Pachelbel and the three Sonatas (K. 287-288, 328) which comprise the complete organ works of Domenico Scarlatti.

The first half closes with three excerpts from the organ Masses of Couperin. The second part of the program includes a partita by Georg Boehm, and works of Bach: four chorale-preludes and the "Prelude and Fugue in B minor."

CLAUDIA STEVENS will give a free piano recital Monday evening at 8:30 in Thompson Memorial Chapel. Brahms' "Sonata in F Minor," Schoenberg's "Five Pieces," Opus 23, and Mozart's "Sonata in F Major," K. 533-494, make up the program.

Series of young artists present three area pianists

Three piano recitals at Williams College during the month of January will be presented as a Young Artists Series sponsored by the Department of Music. Claudia Stevens will include Brahms' Sonata in F Minor in her recital this Monday; Andrew Rangell will feature the Diabelli Variations by Beethoven on Monday, January 17th; and Peter Takacs, in the final concert on Sunday, January 23rd, will play the complete Chopin Preludes. All concerts will be in Thompson Memorial Chapel and all begin at 8:30 p.m.

Claudia Stevens has received acclaim on both coasts for her performances as a pianist and conductor. She is known to Williamstown audiences from her appearances in 1975 as a piano recitalist and as acting director of the Williams Choral Society. Stevens has performed widely as a pianist, in recitals, as a soloist with orchestra, and in chamber music, including numerous appearances at the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, where she held fellowships in piano for two consecutive summers.

Combining a performing and a scholarly career, Stevens recently received the Doctor of Music in piano from Boston University, where she studied with Leonard Shure. Other noted teachers included Leon Fleisher and Bernhard Abramowitsch. She has received numerous academic and professional honors in addition to her awards as a pianist: the Alfred Hertz prize, the University of California Concerto competition, and several fellowships for advanced study in piano.

Stevens joined the piano faculty of the University of Richmond last year. During the current season she will direct the choruses of the University of Richmond on tours of the Southeast and several major European cities. She was recently married to pianist and composer Richard Becker.

Besides Brahms' monumental Sonata in F Minor, Stevens will perform several lesser known piano works, including Schoenberg's Five Pieces, Op. 23, and Mozart's Sonata in F Major, K. 533-494.

Clark offers city art series

Rome, Antwerp, Madrid, Amsterdam: all are cities with a rich tradition of art. They will be featured as single topics in a five-part lecture series entitled "Cities of Art" at the Clark Art Institute in Williamstown every Sunday at 3:00 for five weeks. The first lecture will be an introduction to the series and is entitled "Cities of Art: The Urban Setting." To be delivered this Sunday at 3:00, the talk will be given by Christopher Tunnard, Professor of City Planning, Emeritus, Yale University. Subsequent lectures will feature talks by Sheila Somers Rinehart on Rome (January 16), Julius S. Held on Antwerp (January 23), Rafael Fernandez on Madrid (January 30), and John Walsh on Amsterdam (February 6).

Christopher Tunnard, who will deliver this Sunday's lecture, is the author of several books, the most recently published being The Modern American City, and has just finished one on scenic values in city and country. His work as consultant to UNESCO on the development of cultural heritage has included missions to Jamaica, Nepal and Indonesia. He has been a member of the U.S. Advisory Council on Historic Preservation and is currently on the U.S. National Committee for International Council on Monuments and Sites (ICOMOS). Born in British Columbia, he was educated in Canada and England, and has honorary degrees from Union College and the University of Victoria.

All lectures in the Cities of Art series will be held in the Clark Art Institute auditorium Sundays at 3:00 and will be free.

WCFM reveals schedule

WCFM announced the Winter Study program schedule this week which includes, along with the regular music programming, a number of special weekly programs. On Sunday afternoon from 1 to 2 Judy Harley and Dave Bass will present a program of Gospel music. Immediately following will be The Music of ... from 2 through 5. Aired at a different time this term, the program continues the tradition of each week presenting a history of an artist or group—through music and feature presentations—A different individual is featured each week.

Sunday evenings will feature Roots: An American Music Perspective with Tim Treadway. The first show will be a parallel history of piano and guitar from 1917 to 1940. The second in the series will be 1930's guitar—a new prominence and development of guitar. The third show will present the music of three pianists: James Johnson, Duke Ellington, and Thelonius Monk. The show can be heard from 8 to 9 p.m.

Sportstime, Thursdays from 7:30 to 8 p.m. will present interviews, features and talk about the sports world and will be produced by Sports Director Dan O'Connell. Sportstime will be followed by Broadway Baby!, show tunes from the best of Broadway with Martha Williamson.

The week winds up with What's New on Friday evening from 8 to 11. The show will present featured cuts, reviews, and information from the latest record releases received at the station. WCFM will also broadcast virtually all college Hockey and Basketball contests. The schedule is effective through Winter Study.

Jongkind art film arrives

In connection with the present major exhibition at the Clark Art Institute, "Jongkind and the Pre-Impressionists: Painters of the Ecole Saint-Simeon," the Institute will show a thirty-five-minute color film on the Dutch artist Jongkind on four Saturdays while the exhibition is on view. "Portrait of a Great Painter: Johan Barthold Jongkind" will be shown first this Saturday at 11:00. Admission will be free.

The film surveys Jongkind's career, following him from his early years in Holland to Paris, where he settled and worked for most of the rest of his life. Many of Jongkind's paintings and drawings are illustrated, and using these the film demonstrates how skillful Jongkind was in rendering the clarity of light and atmosphere. Because of his influence on other artists he is considered by many to be one of the most important precursors of the French Impressionists.

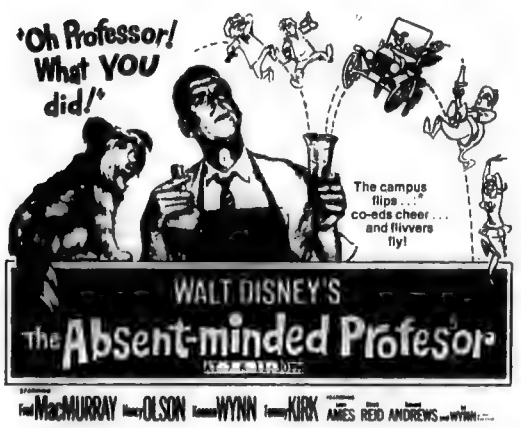
Rob Smit, the director of this 1972 film, enables the audience to make a number of interesting comparisons by juxtaposing Jongkind's works with views of the same landscapes as they appear today. The film is on loan from the Royal Netherlands Embassy and will be shown, besides this Saturday at 11:00, also on January 22 at 4:00, February 5 at 11:00, and February 12 at 4:00.

"Stasis" auditions

Auditions for Stasis In Darkness, an experimental theatrical piece based on the life and work of Sylvia Plath, will continue tonight in the Greylock rehearsal room until 8:30 p.m. There are parts for five women.

The piece will be directed by Dianne Thompson, '77, and is the culmination of her senior thesis. The script, said Thompson, was adapted and "loosely constructed around a central theme—the creativity and psychological despair of one extraordinary woman. It is an ensemble piece, in which all five actors will play one woman. We will really create the piece together through the rehearsal process, exploring Plath's images as fully as possible through improvisation, sound, and movement. The staging will be environmental."

Auditions are open to all members of the community. Any interested women are encouraged to audition. No experience is necessary. For more information call Dianne Thompson at 6627, or leave a message at the AMT Box Office.



Lionel Hampton, "the master of energized rhythm," appeared Thursday with a small group. Hampton began in Benny Goodman's swing band and is known for having introduced the vibes as an instrument to jazz.

Council considers new constitution

A majority of the Council opposed the elimination of at-large representatives, but the Council came to no consensus on how these representatives should be elected. Presently, the Council consists of four officers, representatives from each of the residential houses, four freshman representatives and six at-large representatives.

Larry Mitchell '78, a member of the By-laws Committee, said that elimination of the at-large representatives "cuts down on the size of the council." Ginsberg said the committee felt "four officers provide sufficient at-large representation."

But Council members pointed out that the elimination of at-large representatives would mean that no sophomores would serve on the council between September and February. The proposed constitution requires that residential house representatives be elected to fill a full year term beginning in February. Freshmen are not assigned to residential houses until April and are, therefore, ineligible for these positions.

This procedure would also prevent seniors from serving on the College Council during the second semester of their senior year.

The Council debated the clause requiring automatic expulsion for representatives who miss three consecutive meetings even if they send alternates. Tom Ebling pointed out this would force the Council to expel members who are away for Winter Study or who are in the hospital for three weeks. Various Council members suggested less strict provisions. Presently, the Council may expel members who miss three consecutive meetings.

Some Council members challenged the proposed provision which would require two-thirds of the student body (rather than two-thirds of the students who vote) to approve any amendment to the constitution.

Clifford Mitchell '78 proposed adding an open meeting clause to the constitution.

The Council will meet at 9:00 p.m. Tuesday night to continue discussions on the constitution. Any change in the present constitution must be approved by a two-thirds majority of the students voting on the change. An amendment may be initiated by a two-thirds vote of the Council or upon specific petition of at least ten per cent of the student body.

Steve Piltch, president of the College Council, said the Council will have an opportunity to discuss a proposed constitution written by Harry Kelly '78.

Kelly's constitution proposes an executive branch consisting of the four officers and a legislative branch consisting of the entire Council. The four officers would be elected as a ticket or team. The president would appoint the chairman of student committees and would nominate from the membership of the College Council all members of student faculty committees subject to the advice and consent of the Council.

The legislative branch would consist of residential house representatives, freshman representatives and five students from each of the three academic divisions. The Council would elect a Council Speaker who would "serve in opposition to the Executive Board".

CEP discusses proposal, paternalism

The Committee on Educational Policy regrouped Monday to discuss the faculty's defeat of their two double major proposals. After deciding to restudy the problem and submit another idea at some later date, the committee explored the area of "educational paternalism."

The first motion would have allowed double majors to count courses fulfilling requirements in two departments as one of the nine courses for both majors.

Under the CEP proposal a student could, for instance, count Political Science 202 for both political science and sociology majors, thus completing both majors with only 17 courses.

The second CEP suggestion asked that a candidate for honors be allowed to integrate his two fields into a single thesis, instead of having to write two theses for the double major.

The remainder of the meeting dealt with a number of written and unwritten college rules. After discarding the legend and the trivial, discussion focused upon the E-deficiency rule and a college policy not to return final exams.

The E-deficiency rule, which permits professors to give a final exam only to those with a passing grade in all course work, forces the failing student to work in other areas where his time might be more productive.

Committee formed to study expansion

A committee composed of athletic department members, students, and representatives from Buildings and Grounds and the faculty has formed to consider proposed expansion of the College Athletic facilities. According to Athletic Director Robert Peck, the project is still in the early planning stages.

The new building will probably be located south of the squash courts, on land presently owned by the College, Peck said. Planned facilities tentatively include a swimming pool, gymnasium, weight room, dance studio, wrestling area, and offices.

In accordance with College policy, construction will not begin until enough money, from donations or grants, can be raised to cover building costs. This figure has not yet been set. Also required are funds from the endowment to be earmarked for maintenance of the building.

Purple cagers to face Bates

by Andy O'Donnell

Coach Curt Tong's varsity cagers return to action tomorrow night after a three week layoff when they entertain Bates at 7:30 in the cozy confines of the Lasell Gymnasium.

Williams will be out to even its record at 2-2. The Ephs cropped their first two contests to Hamilton and Tufts—"two of the best teams on our schedule", according to Tong—before posting an 82-70 win over Drew in their last encounter before the Christmas break.

The key to the game could be Williams' ability to wear down what should be an exhausted Bates five. The Bobcats play five of their first six games on the road before returning to Lewiston for seven straight home games during January. Tonight they travel to New Britain to play a physical Central Connecticut team and then hop on the bus for Billsville, arriving early tomorrow morning.

Entering tonight's contest Bates has posted a 2-2 record, losing to Babson and Brandeis and defeating two of their University of Maine neighbors, UM at Portland-Gorman and UM at Farmington.

The Bobcats return seven lettermen from a club that went 9-11 last year, including three year starter Jim Marios, a 6' 2" guard who directs the Bates offense and also leads the team in scoring with a 16.2 average. Earl Ruffin will start at the other backcourt spot but sophomore Steve Schmeltz, with 19 assists in four games, will probably replace him early.

Up front for the Bobcats will be 6' 3" senior Brad Smith and 6' 6" junior Jay Bright, who had 16 points and 14 rebounds in his last outing against UM-F. Center Tom Goodwin, who had 29 against the Ephs last year en route to an 88-87 Bates victory, anchors the front line. The 6' 6" junior was injured in the UM-F contest but will be set to go tomorrow evening. Tom Burhoe (11 pg), a Matt Spangler type forward, is first off the bench.

Williams will counter with a frontcourt that has performed above and beyond the call of duty, carrying the scoring and leadership burdens. Meanwhile the backcourt is recovering from several injuries which, together with inexperience, have hampered its performance thus far.

Co-captain Mike Tanner and forward Brad Wolk have been the most prominent of this frontcourt contingent. Tanner seems to have regained both the scoring and shooting consistency of his freshman year and blended it with a senior's experience. He already has a 29 point night against Tufts to his credit and leads the team in scoring with a 20.7 average.

Wolk has been the team's early season MVP, consistently turning in strong performances in all phases of the game. The 6' 5" junior is the team's second leading scorer, hitting at an 18.7 clip and shooting a blistering 61 per cent from the floor. He also is the leading Eph rebounder, pulling down nearly 13 caroms per game. Tom Balderston, shooting an excellent 54 per cent from the floor, Matt Spangler, who helped break open the Drew contest and co-captain Tim Hester, round out the frontcourt.

Which brings us to the backcourt trio of sophomore Gerry Kelly, freshman Andy Straka, and junior Bill Whelan. Long on potential and very short on experience, their rate of development holds the key to Williams' success this season.

Kelly leads the bunch with an 8.7 average but has been to the line only once in three games. Straka and Whelan are averaging 4 points each but have been slowed by injuries. Against Bates they'll have to look for their shots more on offense and stop Marois on defense if the Ephs are to come out on top.

Named to the Williams Invitational All-Tournament Team were Jim Norton, Williams defense; Steve Paluseo, Oswego State goaltender; Kim Wescott, Oswego State winger; Seth Johnson, Williams winger. Also named to the team but not pictured were Dan Clarity of North Adams State and Ken Knowles of Bishops University Ontario.

Pucksters down Boston, 5-4

by Tim Layden

Settling comfortably into the friendly confines of Lansing Chapman Rink and displaying a distinct flair for the dramatic, the Williams varsity hockey team took two of their first three games of the new year. The Ephs bid adieu to 1976 with a second place finish in their own holiday tourney before posting a thrilling 5-4 overtime win over Boston State Wednesday.

Williams embarks on the road for a pair of contests this week carrying a 4-2 overall season record, including a 1-2 mark in division II. The Purple skaters will be without sophomore center Dan Sullivan, who has been lost indefinitely with a knee injury.

Williams came into the crucial test with Boston State winless in Division II. The visitors came in with a 1-7 overall mark, but with a reputation for being scrappy enough to make three of their losses one-goal defeats.

The Ephs skated like master showmen, playing listless hockey for nearly two periods before snapping out of their slump just in time to treat the rapidly filling rink to some fine come-from-behind hockey. Boston State netted a pair of goals in the game's first eight minutes, as George Hooper and Don Pacific each beat Chuck Cremens. Junior Peter Gonye got Williams on the board with just 1:14 remaining in the first period, with a hard shot from the top of the left circle.

The stubborn visitors once again opened the scoring in the second period, reestablishing their two-goal bulge as Jim Murphy slapped in a nice pass at 2:29.

It was over the middle ten minutes of the second period that Williams crept back into the game. The Ephs consistently outhit the slower visitors and put good pressure on the Boston State net. Senior wing Jim Hield put Williams within a goal at 9:57, pumping home a Bob Duffy rebound from the left side with a shot which goalie Brian Cusack still hasn't seen.

Chick Johnson and Jim Norton kept the pressure on Cusack with near-misses and John Bessone picked up the first of his two goals at 14:06, rolling a rebound in from Patch Mason and Gonye. The period ended 3-3 and the crew rolling into the rink from free university registration found themselves at a barnburner.

A hard-hitting, action-filled third period was highlighted by a picture-perfect goal for Bessone. The junior took an excellent feed from linemate Bob Caruso and knocked in the go-ahead goal. Williams fans began to breathe easier, but the gutty visitors would have none of it. With just four seconds remaining on a penalty to Caruso and only 2:38 in the game, Tim Morril boomed a slap shot past Cremens to send the game into overtime.

Boston State fired several close shots at Cremens early in the extra stanza but Williams senior defenseman Chris Vogelsang decided the issue and made the Purple crowd a happy one. Vogelsang slapped the game-winner past Cusack on assists from Bessone and Gonye, each of whom picked up the slack left by the loss of Sullivan, with four points.

The exciting win followed up a post-Christmas runner-up finish in the Williams holiday tournament. The Ephs had been defending champs in the event but dropped a hard-fought 5-3 decision to Oswego State in the final.

The Ephmen opened their tourney play with a perfect example of how difficult it is to play good hockey with just two day's practice following a two-week layoff. Williams fell behind early and were tied 2-2 with ten minutes remaining in the opener.

Having taken two-and-one-half periods to get the kinks out, Williams erupted for four goals in the final ten minutes to rout visiting Bishop's University from Lennoxville, Ontario. Caruso, in his first action of the year, started the scoring from Rick Zeller and Bessone and team-leading goal-scorer Chris Egizi (5) picked up his second of the game on assists from Sullivan and Chick Johnson (team-high seven assists).

Freshman Jim Rooney got his first varsity goal on a breakaway from Geoff Daley and Bessone closed out the scoring with an unassisted goal.

Oswego State, a Division II rival, featured an excellent goalie in Steve Paluseo, and topped North Adams State, 6-3 in the first round. The visitors needed only 52 seconds to get on the board, as Stan Moore scored on a center from Kim Wescott. Tom St. Louis and Wescott added first-period goals to give the visitors a comfortable 3-0 first period edge.

McCormick's Ephs fought back in the second period, as Rooney broke the Paluseo spell with a nice deak and score from Daley and Hield at 2:41. Johnson brought the Purple within a goal, beating the goalie with a backhand from Jim Norton just five minutes later.

Oswego's Rob Olsen pumped in the momentum-breaking goal for Oswego at 17:58 and Williams found themselves on the short end of another two-goal deficit.

A penalty-filled third period which featured two near-fights and a glove and stick throwing exhibition by Oswego captain Dan Ane saw the Ephs draw back within one goal on Norton's slapper. Paluseo was brilliant, however, through the final eight minutes and Greg Preston's empty-net goal at 19:44 set the final count at 5-3.

The Ephs travel to Clinton, New York tomorrow night to face the Hamilton Continentals, a tough Division II foe.

Coach McCormick and President Chandler pose with the runners-up trophy for the Ephs own Invitational Hockey Tournament.

Tracksters, women's squash reopen seasons

Women's squash

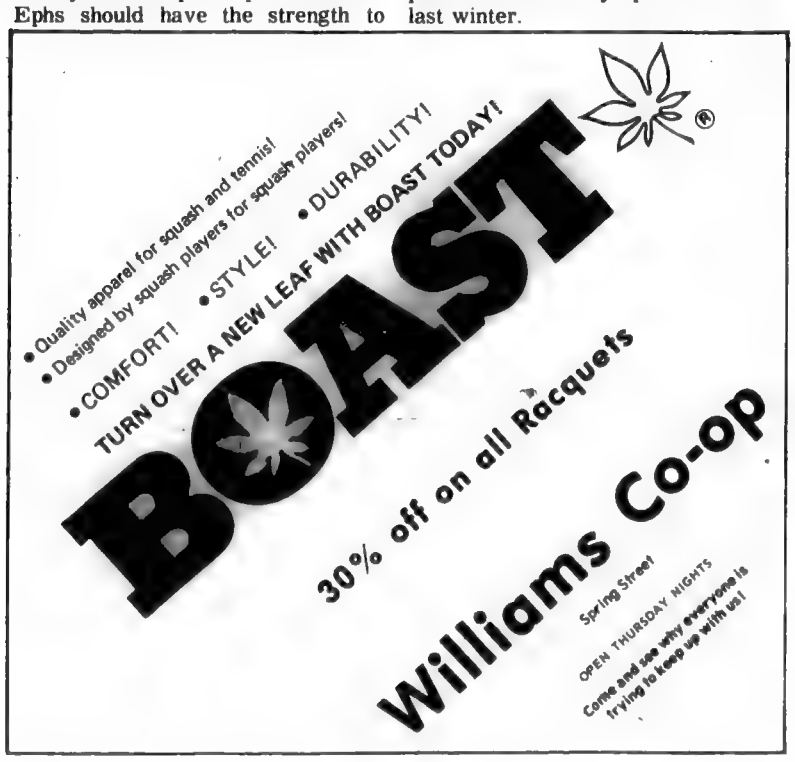
The Williams Varsity Women's squash team will meet Middlebury Saturday in the team's season opener, at 1 p.m. in the Lasell squash courts.

The squad, coached by Graham Hone '76 is led by Martha Cook who was ranked eighth nationally last year. Also returning from last year's 7-3 squad are Jane Garvey, Marcia Johnston, Holly Boyer, and Janet Costikyan, who will hope to better last year's third place finish in the Nationals.

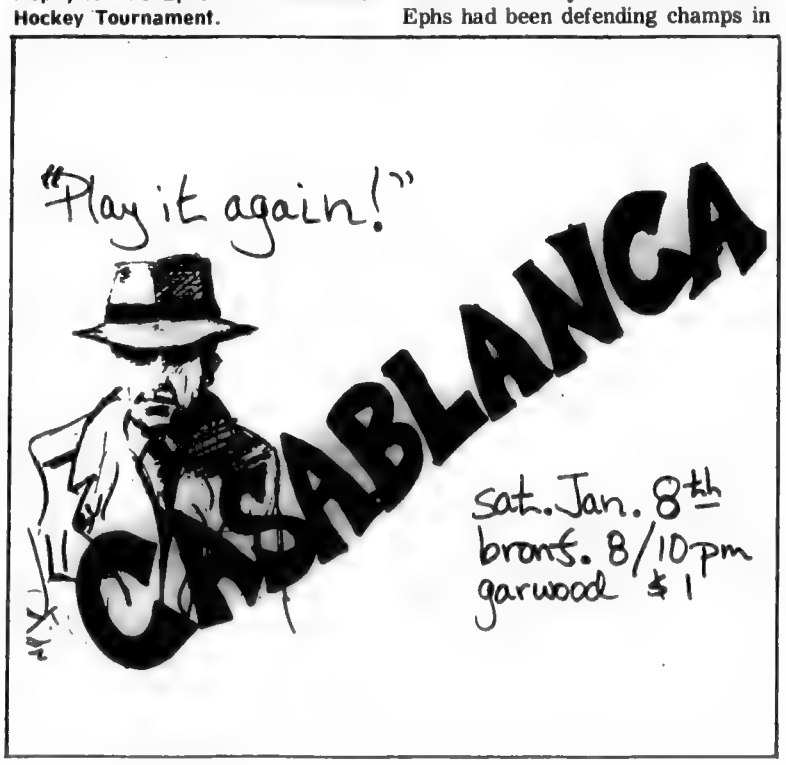
Varsity track

Tomorrow Coach Dick Farley's indoor track squad opens up the 1977 season with a tri-meet at 1:00 p.m. in Towne Fieldhouse. Visitors Hamilton and Westfield State will provide the competition for the Ephs who rolled over both teams a year ago.

The 1977 Eph tracksters will have a tough time matching last year's 12-3 record. The distance crew has lost four of its top runners from '76 and the graduation of Scott Perry could cost Farley about 15 points per meet. The Ephs should have the strength to demolish Hamilton, but Westfield boasts an eager and well balanced squad including Kevin Dalton who ran a 1:56 half-mile and a 9:14 2-mile last season.



The purple power will be provided by co-captains Dave Bass and Ken Leinbach along with Ron White in the hurdles, Larry Tanner in the weight events and Joe Kolb in the 2-mile run.



Wrestling

The Williams wrestling team will compete in their first meet since December 4 as they face Coast Guard Saturday in New London, Connecticut.

Coach Joe Dailey foresees a difficult season for the 0-1 squad, "We're a very young team and the beginning of the season should be rough, but we should get better as the season goes along."

Leading the team's middleweight division are co-captains Scott Conant (158-167) and Jeff May (167). Looking strong in the lightweight classes, the team will depend on sophomore standout Hal Zendle (118-126) who competed in the U.S. Olympic team trials last winter.

Course guide
Survey response lags

Sarah Baldwin, chairman of the Student Course Guide Committee reported Sunday that only one quarter to one third of the student responses to the course guide questionnaire have been returned to the committee.

Baldwin said that the aim of the committee is a 60-70 per cent response, although certain courses can be reviewed with smaller samples, according to their nature.

In its Sunday meeting the Course Guide Committee discussed the possibility of a discount night at the Log for those returning completed forms. "We must have a greater number of opinions to draw upon if the course guide can be a reliable source," Baldwin said.

The purpose of the guide is to supplement the catalogue and student hearsay on the subjective value of Williams courses. "It's not the absolute word, nor is it an objective study," Mark Lanier, a member of the committee, said. "Obviously students cannot accurately judge the quality of teaching."

The guide will include a numerical evaluation, a numerical average and a written evaluation of each course and section in conjunction with the questions on the questionnaire. Each evaluation will include a grid on which the percentage of responses will be plotted.

Last year the threat of libel suits induced students connected with it to take the guide out of circulation less than two hours after it had been released. Direct quotations from some of the questionnaires impressed some members of faculty and administration as being possibly libelous, according to Rick Siegrist, one of the 1976 guide's co-editors. Baldwin will not quote student response verbatim, but rather rephrase and edit it.

"The College Council has given us guidelines to follow," she said, "including the institution of a Faculty Relations Subcommittee, so that trouble of the same kind does not arise. Michael Lissack, head of faculty relations, has drafted a letter to inform the faculty of our progress."

The committee, which consists of nine members appointed by the College Council, will be making a concerted effort this week to collect as many questionnaires as possible before they begin to collate and edit the material. They ask that students co-operate in returning them.

Frosh inquiry courses cancelled

Because of a surprisingly widespread lack of interest, the two Winter Study Freshman Inquiry Courses have been cancelled.

One student chose "Facts and Values" as his first choice for the January term and only a few elected "Understanding and Explanation: The Common Venture." Both courses were designed as challenging introductions to a liberal arts education as a result of a proposition last year by the Freshman Year Committee, which noted a deficiency in this area.

According to the report by the committee, the freshman year is characterized by "variety without coherence." This year's Winter Study Guide described the two courses as ones whose object "was not the acquisition of skills, but the development of self-consciousness about the approaches of various disciplines . . . contrasting approaches is a valuable way to see different perceptions."

Professor Daniel O'Connor, intended lecturer for "Facts and Values", said that the purpose of offering the courses was to provide freshmen with an inter-disciplinary introduction to higher learning which focuses on modes of understanding rather than specific subject matter. The original plan reviewed by the committee last year was to offer such courses in the fall, but professors were unsure that enrollment would be high enough to warrant it.

O'Connor said that the future of the inquiry courses is uncertain. He said he believed that the popularity of the courses might not be adequately gauged by the WSP response, because the pervading atmosphere of the January term is not academic.

CAP recommends Pasachoff's tenure

by Ann McCabe

Jay Pasachoff, Assistant Professor of Astronomy, has joined the list of assistant professors who received positive recommendations for tenure from the Committee on Appointments and Promotions.

Pasachoff is currently Chairman of the Astronomy Department and Director of the Hopkins Observatory, posts he has held since his arrival in 1972. The CAP agreed last year to make the final decision on Pasachoff after the end of first semester classes rather than with other candidates in late November.

The trustees will meet in the third week of January to make final decisions on tenure candidates; they rarely reverse CAP decisions. Pasachoff will become an associate professor with tenure as of July 1, 1977 if approved—the first in astronomy. He received his A.B. in 1963 and Ph.D. in 1969 from Harvard.

The tenure procedure begins in an assistant professor's fifth year at Williams. Each department evaluates candidates from that department and submits a recommendation to the CAP.

The trustees make the final confirmations. The Panel of Six, a faculty board, handles any tenure disputes.

The Committee also recommended Lynda Bundtzen (English), Michael Katz (Russian), Gary Jacobsohn (political science), Mark Taylor (religion), and Lee Drickamer (biology).

Jay Pasachoff

CC. Rep. Harry Kelly '78 and By-Laws Committee Chairman Stu Ginsburg '77 attend a College Council meeting. Kelly and the By-Laws Committee have each proposed constitutions for the council's consideration.

Free U attracts mobs

Unexpectedly large student interest in the Free University led to an unusually high number of oversubscribed courses at last week's registration, said University director Shailah Stewart.

The amount of interest was "incredible," she said. "Certain courses are always filled up," said Stewart, but more courses were oversubscribed than expected, causing many instructors to have waiting lists. Others, who Stewart described as "willing to really extend themselves," organized extra sections of their overenrolled courses.

The Free University registration will not be tabulated until later in January, said Stewart. At that time the total number of students enrolled and the number actually attending classes will be counted and the success of the Free University evaluated, she said.

Most of the teachers are Williams students, according to Stewart, but several instructors from North Adams and Pittsfield are also participating. One course, "A Study of American Furniture," is taught by Matt Larkin, a high school senior from Pittsfield. The University attempted to get more freshman instructors, but was unable to get very many, said Stewart, which she attributed to the lack of time and unfamiliarity of many freshman students.

Student panel set to hold discussion on admissions

The Admissions Committee will sponsor an open forum on admissions Wednesday night at 7:30 p.m. in Jesup Hall, according to Admissions Director Philip Smith.

Smith described the forum as an "opportunity for students to express their feelings and opinions about the College." According to Marcus, the discussion will focus on "how attractive is the College, do students have an accurate assessment of the College when they apply, and do their expectations change when they enter Williams."

The panel will begin the discussion by briefly explaining what their original expectations were and how they have changed. Marcus said the panel would consist of Dave Libardi '77, Sue Tuttle '78, Ray Porfilio '78, Ron White '78, and Bill Spriggs '77.

Constitution vote tonight

by Dave MacGregor

The By-Laws Committee has completed a formal draft of a new constitution, which it will present to the College Council tonight for approval, according to committee chairman Stu Ginsberg. If approved, the constitution would be submitted to a student referendum, requiring approval by two-thirds of those voting for passage.

The proposed draft makes a few substantial changes, but does not drastically alter student government at Williams, said Ginsberg. Some changes have been made in response to criticism of the preliminary draft by council members when it was presented to the council for discussion last week.

Major changes in the constitution, he said, were reapportionment of at-large representatives, an open council meeting clause, a provision for the expulsion of representatives who miss three consecutive meetings, and a requirement that all house representatives serve full year terms beginning in February.

According to Ginsberg, the provision dealing with at-large representatives was inserted in response to the expressed opposition of the council to banning at-large representation. In the new constitution, there will be two sophomore, one junior, and one senior at-large representatives, elected by their own classes only.

Automatic expulsion of members missing three consecutive meetings is necessary to assure "continuity and effectiveness" of the council, he said. Members so expelled would be ineligible to run in the special election to choose their successor. Intended primarily as a check on at-large representatives, who now can only be expelled by direct vote of the council, the provision would also apply to house representatives, he said. Ginsberg noted that there is no way to make an exception to this rule in special circumstances, but maintained "there is no loophole we could create that would not defeat the purpose of the provision."

The committee considered the opinions of all students who offered them, both inside and outside the College Council meeting, said Ginsberg. He described the constitution proposed by CC Representative Harry Kelly as "another input which we considered equally with others."

OCC panels held

The Office of Career Counseling will sponsor a program of career discovery panels on the creative arts tomorrow and Thursday, according to Jeff Wood of the OCC. Tomorrow's program is the second of a series of four programs to be conducted during January.

Each program will take place over two days, and will consist of afternoon panel discussions of specific areas followed by a more general discussion in the evening. The next day, panel members will be available for individual interviews arranged beforehand through the OCC, said Wood.

CAREER DISCOVERY PANELS ON THE CREATIVE ARTS—coordinated by Bill Hutton '79, sponsored by OCC.

"Arts Management", Makepeace Room, 3 P.M. with George George '41—producer, Donna Lindsay Goodwin '73 - Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts, & Steve Harty '73 - New Dramatists as panelists and Shane Riorden as moderator.

"Portrait Of An Artist", Weston Lang. Center, 3 p.m., with Bing Bingham '73 - songwriter, Andrew Smith '64 - TV-screen comedy writer, & Jane Yolen - children's author as panelists and Clark Art Institute's Rafael Fernandez as moderator.

"Life In The Arts", Dodd House, 7:30 p.m. with all six above panelists and Asst. Prof. Lynda Bundtzen as moderator.

B-1 should be grounded

Carter and Congress will soon make a decision on potentially the biggest boondoggle of the 1970's, the B-1 manned nuclear bomber. The B-1 could be yet another case of pork-barrel politics victorious over military sense and human needs—unless we protest now.

How is the B-1 different from the current B-52 bomber?

The B-1 flies at supersonic speeds, and at near-treetop level. It would fire rockets at Russian targets from 100 miles away, not bomb them directly. All three make defense more difficult.

How much will the B-1 cost?

A few years ago the Air Force said $40 million per plane, or $9.9 billion for the fleet of 244. Their latest estimate is $88 million each or $22 billion total, although some Air Force sources admit $100 million each is more likely. Add in operation and maintenance costs and development and procurement of those special 100-mile rockets, and the total reaches $50 to $100 billion.

Don't we already have enough atomic bombs?

We do, but military strategists say we need the "triad" of land missles, bombers, and submarines to guarantee our ability to retaliate after a Russian surprise first strike. Soviet missles are becoming accurate enough to destroy some of ours in their silos. Our submarines are invulnerable, although eventually both sides will develop technologies to attack submarines. A bomber may be necessary to complement the missles and submarines. That bomber need not be the B-1, however.

Why is the B-1 militarily unnecessary?

Our current fleet of B-52 bombers will function well into the 1990's, says the Air Force. The B-52 cannot attack as many targets as the low-flying B-1, but can still inflict unacceptable damage on the Soviet Union.

Military strategists suggest "cruise missles"—small pilotless jet planes—launched from tankers flown to outside Russia's borders. Defense Department studies show the cruise missle system would inflict more damage than a B-1 fleet and cost much less—only $17 billion.

Don't we need to show the Russians our determination?

That argument makes as much sense as to burn down one's house to protect it from arsonists.

Even if we do want to "flex our muscles," a militarily effective cruise missle program or a stepped-up civil defense program like the Soviets have made more sense.

Won't the B-1 create many jobs?

It is a sad day when the best jobs project available is an unneeded weapons system!

Bureau of Labor Statistics data show each $1 billion spent on health care, education, mass transit or pollution control creates 2 to 4 times as many jobs as $1 billion spent on capital-intensive systems. Also, jobs from public works go to high unemployment groups: construction trades and unskilled labor instead of engineers, inner cities instead of suburbs, minorities instead of middle-class whites.

In addition, weapons spending does not add to general economic wealth. Some economists now suspect defense spending, which returns no goods to the economy for ordinary consumers to purchase, is an important cause of inflation.

The problem is the poor have little political muscle, while B-1 contractors like Rockwell International and General Electric can easily finance Congressional lobbyists.

What is the status of the B-1 in Congress?

Congress last summer postponed the key B-1 program decision, a $1 billion appropriation for the first three planes, so that a popularly elected President and new Congress could decide. The B-1 will be one of the first items of business after Carter's inauguration.

What can we do to stop the B-1?

To act now is imperative. Suggestions: 1) Write your Congressperson (c-o U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C. 20515), Senators (U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C. 20510), and Carter (Transition Staff, Washington, D.C. 20006.) and express your opposition. 2) Send contributions to Clergy and Laity Concerned, 235 East 49th Street, New York, N.Y. 10017. 3) Help gather signatures here in North Berkshire with Americans for Democratic Action. Reps must be accountable

Harry J. Kelly

This month, the council has set itself about the task of revising our constitution. I say "our" constitution because, properly viewed, the new document will be more than just a renovation of existing council procedures. It will incorporate a new order at Williams, seeking to recognize our role at Williams more positively than the present constitution. Hopefully, it will integrate the students more actively into the Williams policy-making process.

It seems to me that the most pressing issue which our new constitution should attack is the issue of representation on the student-faculty committees. In reality, these are the bodies with the greatest impact upon policy-making here; their decisions eventually become Williams policy. Today, however, students are systematically excluded from an effective role in these committees. True, we elect "representatives" to these committees, but there is a great gulf between an elected official and a true representative. For example, twice in the past year, the CEP has established a policy opposed by the majority of the student body. I am referring to the CEP's vote to end physical education credit for the band and its recent vote to exclude students from its meetings. The representatives we elected apparently were unable to assess the will of their constituents. It's not that anyone did anything purposely malicious; but rather we are presented, as they used to say, with a failure to communicate. The commotion which both instances caused indicates a break-down in the lines of communication between students and their representatives on these committees.

The problem is two-fold. The reps we elect are hardly able to sample student opinion and vote accordingly. Usually, in fact, they campaign on their personalities, not their policies. We elect them, therefore, not to execute our orders, but to think for themselves and act thusly. The two controversies I cited indicate how calamitous this can be. Without proper indication of student opinions these representatives can make policy grossly out of tune with our needs and wants. And that, my friends, is wrong, because as our representatives, they ought to represent us, not themselves. There is a second problem also, because the representatives are not legitimate,—in the political sense. Since they cannot sample student opinion, they have no way of knowing which policies to support, oppose, or initiate. They are, therefore, uncertain at best whether their actions represent the student's desires. Without someone to legitimize their actions, without something to indicate to the reps that they are acting correctly, they are liable to be overwhelmed by the more organized intents of the faculty and administration. Pressed between the College's more organized agenda of priorities and the lack of their own mandate, the representatives must succumb too often to policies which are not representative of us. They have no one to guide them or support them, and so frequently, they make mistakes in our eyes and are embarrassed. Their credibility and consequently their efficacy in policy-making suffers, and so our ability to influence school policy is dealt a hard blow.

Let us seize this chance to improve the system we've got now . . . .

The need, therefore, is to organize a mandate—a list of priorities—which is truly representative and wise and then to select representatives in a way which ensures that mandate will be advocated fully. Enter the College Council and our new Constitution. With a little luck and much boldness, the College Council could, take a serious role in improving the students' role on campus. Let's remember, first, what the College Council is: the only representative assembly of students on campus. It is also—and this is most important—the only body which can collect student opinion, organize it into policy and then execute that policy. Perhaps the light begins to dawn? I support that—to solve the problem of the student-faculty committees, the College Council could very easily assume the task of representing us there. It could supply, with just a few changes, the sort of agenda of priorities which is now lacking. If what we lack is a mandate for the student-faculty committee representatives which adequately expresses our needs and wants, we only have to adapt our current council machinery to the task. The council then could sample student opinion, organize an agenda, and execute it. We would have to eliminate the autonomy of the student-faculty reps, however, because the student-faculty representatives must be held accountable to the policy-maker—the council— to insure that the agenda is adequately enacted. The council must have the authority to ensure that its programs are carried out by its members, for only they will have an interest at stake in executing the council's wishes. Otherwise, the autonomous student-faculty reps we have now could easily ignore what they dislike, and all our work would be for nothing. No, the legislative program must be executed by those who are representatives of the council. That way, they are tied to enacting student opinion, not their own.

Here's how the system would work, as I see it: The College Council would organize a committee of its own members, which would correspond to the CEP in jurisdiction. Call this committee the "Curricular Review Committee" (CRC, for short). Now, shortly after the spring elections, the CRC would hold a series of open meetings with students, faculty and administration, carefully assembling a list of practical priorities for the coming academic year. It would send this list, as a report, to the council as a whole, for their approval. So far, the process parallels the Finance Committee's budgeting process (though, hopefully, less lengthy!). Then, the council would select members of the CRC to act as representatives to the CEP, bringing their mandate with them. They would then have a list of priorities and programs to present to the faculty, representing our plans for the future. The mandate, because of the depth of the agenda-building process, would certainly be more representative of our opinions than the current system, and because they would have a program endorsed by the council representing the whole student body, the legitimacy of the student-faculty reps would increase enormously. Our ideas, therefore, would carry the same weight as any other's, because they speak with the authority of 1901 students, ratified by the action of the council. The reps would not stand alone, unsure of who or what they represent,—our ideas would be legitimately assembled in writing, held in their hands. If attacked or opposed, they could count upon the support of all of their council colleagues, and all of us. Other committees, for other areas, would perform simularly.

No system is fool-proof. It is entirely possible that no one will attend the council's committee's meetings. The list of priorities might not actually represent the student body. We may have to lobby exhaustively for the abolition of autonomous student-faculty representatives. Nevertheless, the system we would produce would at least have the potential for greater representation and legitimacy than our current set-up. That is considerably more than we have now—at best, the student-faculty reps can now perhaps guess our opinions, but if we adopt this method, nothing but a complete collapse would prevent our opinions from reaching the student-faculty committees more fully. The opportunity for a small revolution which is present now will not occur again for several years, until another new constitution is attempted. Let us seize this chance to improve the system we've got now, and integrate our wills more fully into the future of Williams College. Speak to your representatives now. Let them know you want to be co-partners in Williams' future.

Harry Kelly '78 recently submitted a draft for a new CC constitution. Kelly has served on the council and on the Finance Committee. He was defeated in a run-off for the position of CC vice-president last spring.

Hampton's style lacks old "swing"

by Steve Robinson

Lionel Hampton and his Orchestra opened the ACEC's fifth annual Williams College Jazz Festival last Thursday evening in Chapin Hall. Hampton is the premiere vibist of the swing era, and has led both big bands and smaller ensembles in the years since then. More than anyone else, he is responsible for making vibes accepted as a jazz instrument.

How surprising, and disappointing, then, to find this fine jazzman leading a band that neither swung, nor rocked, nor funked. The musicians backing Hampton looked bored and tired and played that way. Not that Hampton's playing can be disparaged. On the contrary his performance was consistently first-rate. But in the end, it was hurt by the shoddy musicianship of his band. Several illustrations of this are possible, but the organist is an outstanding example. The belches emerging from the organ always came at the worst times. The organist, along with the drummer, was responsible for the lack of rhythmic drive.

The music selected for the program was also a disappointment, particularly because it contained so little of the style of music that made Hampton popular. There was little music of the swing era in the program, and only once, during a ballad in the first set, did Hampton show the form that made him famous.

Most of the tunes played were popular songs which can be heard at many weddings and bar mitzvah parties. A jazz player of Hampton's class could have played these familiar melodies in a jazz setting. He didn't. Instead, he played the music of a bar-mitzvah band the way a bar-mitzvah band would have played it. He blatantly pandered to the audience. Who needs another band—let alone Hampton's—playing The Hustle?

In spite of all of this, Hampton is a master showman. His toothy smiles and on-stage antics won the audience quickly. He entertained, but he didn't play jazz.

The ACEC met its attendance goal of 750 for the Lionel Hampton concert, according to co-chairmen Jim Bowe and John Dombrowsky. Although final figures are not available, in "very round numbers" receipts totalled $2000. This covers the cost of the band, and limits losses to production costs, about $700.

ACEC members report they are pleased with the turnout and expect a "substantial" crowd at the Charlie Mingus concert Thursday.

Afro-American film series focuses on history, culture

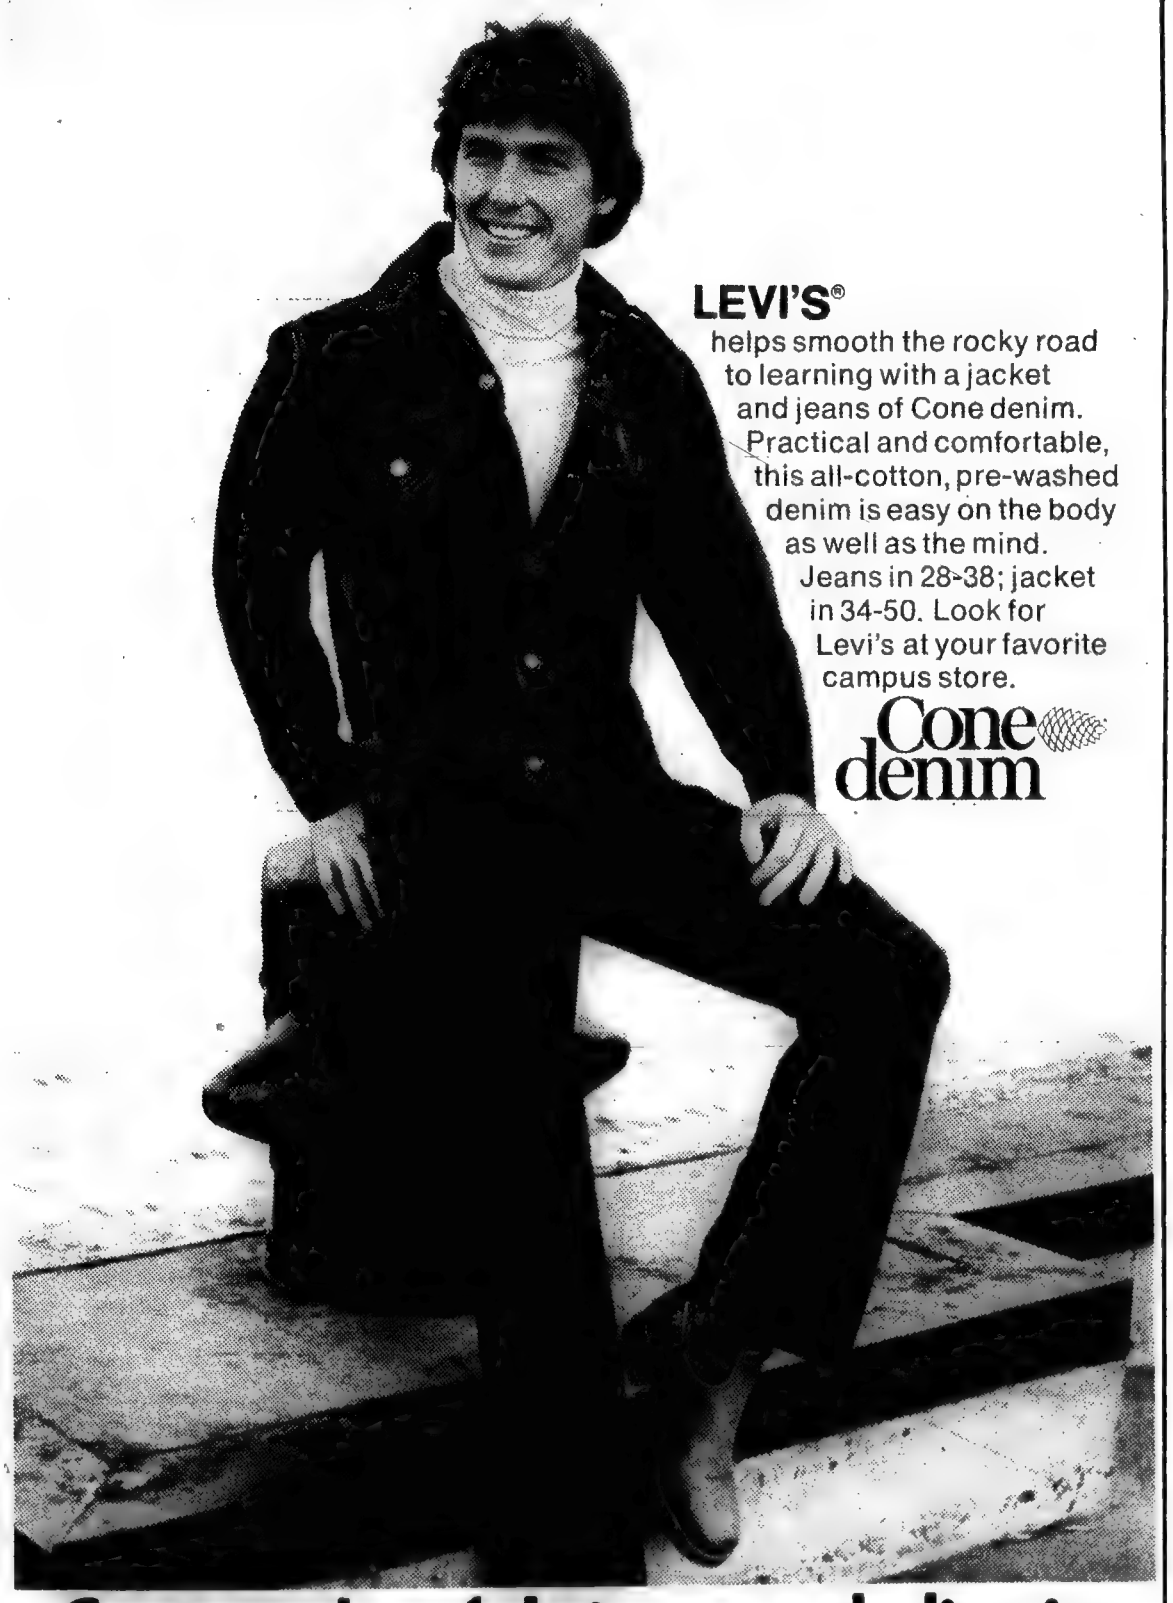
A series of films with Afro-American themes will be presented beginning today, at 8 p.m. in Room 111 of the Thompson Biology Building. The series, open to the public without charge, is sponsored by the Williams Program of Afro-American Studies, an interdepartmental program.

The series begins Jan. 11 with "Cry, the Beloved Country," a screen adaptation of the best-selling novel about a black country priest in South Africa. Jan. 13 a two-part documentary entitled "South Africa Essay" will be shown.

On Feb. 8 and 10 the series will feature films starring actor Paul Robeson: "The Emperor Jones", a screen adaptation of the Eugene O'Neill play, and "Proud Valley," a documentary-like recreation of life in a Welsh mining village.

On March 8 and 10 the focus shifts to blacks in urban America with "Raisin in the Sun," based on the award-winning play about a family on Chicago's South Side, and "The Pawnbroker," a portrait of a man who escaped a Nazi concentration camp only to encounter further horrors in Harlem.

The series concludes on April 12 and 14 with two films dealing with the image of blacks in American films. "Nothing But a Man" portrays the problems of a young black man in present day Alabama who trys to live in peace and dignity. "The Defiant Ones," a multiple-award-winning drama, centers on two convicts, one black and one white, who escape from a prison while chained together.



Fourth 'Music' on Friday

MUSIC IN THE ROUND, the chamber music concert series sponsored by the Williams College Department of Music and directed by Julius Hegyi, will give the fourth concert of its current season Friday at 8:30 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel.

The Williams Trio, Hegyi, violin; Douglas Moore, cello; and Stephen Dankner, piano, will play Villa-Lobos' Trio No. 2. Toward the end of the 1920's, the Brazilian Villa-Lobos composed several trios which are inexplicably still unrecorded and nearly completely unknown in this country. This trio, a kind of fantasy for three separate instruments, is the second of the series to be played by The Williams Trio in the Music in the Round concerts.

Hindemith's Quintet for six instruments—string quartet and two clarinets played by one player—will mark the second appearance this season of Susan Hohenberg, whom concertgoers will remember from her performance in Messiaen's Quartet for the End of Time in November. Hohenberg will play both the clarinet in B flat and in E flat, while Hegyi, Moore, Janet Rowe, violin, and Susan St. Amour, viola, make up the string quartet. The Hindemith work has five movements, with the fifth movement an exact note-for-note mirror image of the first, a sort of canon known as cancrizans.

Hoopsters stop Bates

by Andy O'Donnell

It was, as Rex Harrison would say, simply unbelievable.

Combining an outstanding effort by guards Andy Straka and Gerry Kelly with the finest first half of basketball that this reporter has seen a Williams team play in four years, Coach Curt Tong's young and upstart varsity basketball squad sliced, diced, chopped, and cropped a good Bates five to the tune of 85-58 Saturday night before an appreciative Lasell crowd.

This was your basic, unadulterated, takin' it to the streets rout, and it was all the more fun because it was so unexpected.

The Bobcats entered the game with a deceiving 2-3 record, having lost the previous night to a strong Central Connecticut club 97-84. Williamstown was the last stop on a suicidal road-swing that stationed them everywhere but Lewiston during their first six games. But on paper they matched up well with the Ephs and had basically the same personnel back that had beaten Williams 88-87 last year, including smooth shooting guard Jim Marois and center Tom Goodwin, who had 29 points in that contest.

Williams never gave them a chance to get involved in the game this time around, however, continually stifling any offensive threat with a variety of aggressive defenses, some strong defensive board work, and the superlative performances of Kelly and Straka.

Kelly looked like the perpetual motion machine of last year, igniting the team with his hustling, Kami Kaze brand of defense and penetrating the Bobcat zone on offense en route to a game high 21 points. Indicative of his effectiveness was the fact that he went to the line five times against Bates as opposed to just once in the first three games.

Straka, who was forced to miss most of his Lasell debut against Drew after a first half collision, gave all those who cashed in their rainchecks an impressive shooting display, connecting on all seven of his first half shots and finishing with 20 points for the evening, 16 above his average.

The team aspect of the victory is revealed in the fact that seven players scored for Williams during the six minute stretch when the Ephs broke the game open, outscoring the Bobcats 17-2 to create a 21 point bulge, 33-12. A 10-2 outburst at the end of the half, with Straka and Tom Balderston each netting four points, upped the margin to 51-23 as the teams headed for the lockerroom.

Things became even worse for Bates in the anticlimactic second half. The Williams bench upped the lead to 37 at one point (81-44) and it wasn't until just 3:50 remained in the game that Bates finally matched the Eph first half output of 51 points. Unfortunately, Williams had 83 at the time.

Assisting Kelly and Straka in the scoring column were Balderston with nine and Mike Tanner and Brad Wolk with 10 apiece. Marois had 10 and Goodwin 9 for Bates. The Bobcats shot a miserable 30 per cent for the game while the Williams starting five hit for almost 57 per cent.

Gerry Kelly picked Athlete of Week

Sophomore Gerry Kelly, pumping in a game high 21 points to pace the Ephmen to an 85-58 victory over the Bates Bobcats, leads the list of outstanding performances this week to become the first 1977 Athlete of the Week. Kelly's hustle, offensively and defensively, was reminiscent of his performances last year which earned him similar honors from the Record. Kelly's real test will come Wednesday night when the Ephs face a tough Springfield team.

Honorable Mention—Captain of the 2-0 varsity track team, Ken Leinback picked up wins in the mile and the 1000-yard runs with fine early season times of 4:24.5 and 2:20.0 respectively.

Also receiving honors this week is freshman hoopster Andy Straka, who gave the Eph fans quite a show, turning in 20 points for the team. Straka's showing in his first substantial playing time this season indicates he will be someone to watch in the weeks ahead.

Trackmen place first in opener

by Frank Carr

Picking up its first two indoor track wins of the season, the purple athletes garnered six individual first places, plus a victory in the mile relay Saturday. Coach Dick Farley put together somewhat of a "skeleton crew" which produced a 67 point tally for Williams, with Westfield State well behind at 47 and Hamilton bringing up the rear with 23.

Junior Larry Tanner put the Ephs in the lead from the start by demolishing the competition with a 52' 1" heave in the 35 lb. weight throw. Tanner also took second in the shot put which was won by freshman Jim Desimone at 42' 4". In his first outing, Desimone earned an additional two points for his third place effort in the 35 lb. weight throw.

Greg McAleenan was the only other field event winner, springing an even 21 feet in the long jump and then hitting 6 feet for third place in the high jump. Greg Collins picked up fourths in the long jump and in the 60-yard dash, while Jim Holmes and Mark Eckert finished two-three in the pole vault. Freshman Jim Rouse leaped to second place in the triple jump and fourth place in the high jump.

Captain Ken Leinbach blasted out to an early lead in the one mile run and held on for the victory with a 4:24.5 clocking. Frank Carr trailed runners from Westfield and Hamilton and managed a fourth place finish at 4:35.9. Leinbach returned about an hour later and used the same tactics for an excellent 2:20.0 first place time in the 1000-yard dash.

Junior Ron White floated over the 60-yard hurdles for the victory in 7.9 seconds, followed by Vernon Davis in third (8.3) and Jim Rouse in fourth (8.3). Terry O'Reilly battled with two opponents for the entire length of the 600 yard dash but could only manage third place at 1:17.6. Sophomore Lee Jackson was right behind in fourth at 1:20.4.

Joe Kolb's powerful stride paced the field in the two mile run and led the competitors through a 4:40 opening mile. Fatigue slowly crept up on the swift junior, allowing Westfield's Jim McGilloway to melt down Kolb's early lead. Kolb was finally passed with about two laps to go and crossed the line in second place with a time of 9:36.4. Freshman Mike Behrman donated two additional points, in running 9:57 for third place.

The Ephmen capped off the meet with an easy victory in the mile relay. McAleenan, Paul Untch, and O'Reilly, gave Ron White a slight lead which he turned in to a comfortable margin of victory.

Next Saturday, Williams hosts M.I.T. who may prove to be the toughest team the Ephs will face all season. M.I.T. will bring to the purple valley a full compliment of field event athletes, sprinters and Cross-Country All-American Frank Richardson who has already run a 9:13 two-mile this season. The field event action starts at 1:00 p.m. in Towne Fieldhouse, followed by the running events at about 2:00.

Skaters in overtime loss

Coach Bill McCormick's varsity hockey squad fought from five goals back in the third period only to drop a heartbreaking 8-7 overtime decision to homestanding Hamilton Saturday night. The loss dropped the Purple to 4-3 on the season and 1-3 in ECAC Division II play.

The pucksters made the three-hour trek to Hamilton and wasted little time in spotting the hosts a quick three-goal first period lead. The smooth-skating Continentals tallied the first goal of the second period against Williams netminder Chuck Cremens (44 saves) to take a 4-0 lead before the Ephs caught fire.

Junior defenseman Jim Norton broke the ice at 6:16 of the second period, pumping in the first purple goal of the night on assists from Rick Zeller and Wade Smith. Two Hamilton goals followed the Norton tally and gave them a 6-1 lead.

At 11:53 of the period, senior captain Patch Mason netted a two-men-up power play goal from Zeller and Chris Egizi. Just two minutes later, Egizi notched his sixth goal of the current campaign, also on a power play from linemates Zeller and Chick Johnson to send the Ephs into the dressing room down 6-3.

Just one minute into the final period, Zeller scored from Egizi and Johnson to narrow the deficit to 6-4, but the Continentals retaliated 40 seconds later.

Bob Caruso brought Williams back within two from Peter Gonye and Chris Vogelsang and Egizi's second score of the contest narrowed the margin to 7-6 before Bob Duffy sent the game into overtime with under five minutes remaining.

A Hamilton goal at 2:05 of the extra session decided the issue and gave the hosts their first win over Williams in the last three, all overtimes. Williams will remain on the road Wednesday, facing another Division II foe, Norwich at 7:00.

Eph swimmers dunk Hamilton

by Dennis O'Shea

Todd Piper and Duff Anderson cracked open a close one with a one-two sweep of the 200-yard butterfly as the varsity swim team knocked off Hamilton, its first post-Christmas opponent, 67-46, at Clinton Saturday. Nearly four seconds worth of open water separated Piper and Hamilton ace Brian Hogan when Anderson swept from way back in fourth place to also beat out the Continental three event All-American on the final length.

Phil Wild's full second victory in the 100 freestyle and Dave Amlicke's semi-casual 200 backstroke win followed the fly and set up Stuart Deans' tremendous swim from behind second place in the 500 free, clocked at a very swift 5:07.8.

After the 500, Chris Clark and Paul vom Eigen settled things for good with a meet clinching one-two in the 200 breaststroke that left the nearest opposition better than five seconds in their wake. Jeff Erickson's second place in optional diving and a pool record triumph in the final relay rounded out the Ephs' own version of Continental breakfast.

The Connies had the Ephmen worried in the early going, threatening to take the opening relay off the strength of Jimmy Yow's impressive backstroke leg. Phil Wild turned that threat aside quite nicely, though, with a 48.7 anchor split, his first of three sub-50 second 100 yard swims on the day.

Freshmen Piper and Tom Beckett kept the splashers narrowly ahead through the first half of the meet with a pair of wins that neutralized Strehlow's classy 10:33.5 win in the 1000 and Vickery's 1:50.0 touch-out of Amlicke in the 200 free.

Beckett stopped the watches at 22.7 in the 50 free—while Piper outlasted Hogan in the 200 individual medley just two events before they dueled again in the butterfly.

Women's squash posts strong win

The women's varsity squash team opened their season with an exciting 6-1 victory over Middlebury Saturday in Lasell gymnasium.

Playing in the number one spot, junior Jane Garvey shut-out her opponent 3-0. Number two player Janet Costikyan won her match 3-1, while teammates Marcia Johnston and Holly Boyer each defeated their Middlebury foes 3-0.

Playing in her first varsity match freshman Becky Chase won her set 3-1 while number six player Lee Costikyan gave the Ephwomen their sixth victory with a 3-0 shut-out. Leslie Conant, ranked seventh on the squad, was the only team member to be defeated.

Grapplers fall to tough Coast Guard

The Williams wrestling squad, attempting to post their first victory this season, were defeated by a tough Coast Guard team 48-3 Saturday, in New London.

Although the match opened on a good note as lightweight Joe Caresse won 10-4 decision, the rest of the afternoon was all downhill for the Ephs as they forfeited three and lost six of the remaining weight classes.

Following the Caresse win, the Ephs had to forfeit the next two matches as team stand-out Hal Zendle (126) is out for a week with a knee injury and Coach Joe Dailey had no one to wrestle at 134.

Holding out until the last minute, middleweight Mark Walsh (142) was defeated 6-5. The team then forfeited the 150 weight class while John Fasano (158) was pinned in 3:43.

Facing difficult opponents, the heavyweight classes did not fare as well, as team co-captain Scott Conant (167) lost 13-5. Freshman Keith Passaretti (177), meeting up with one of the best wrestlers in New England was pinned in 2:40. Co-captain Jeff May, winning throughout his 187 match was pinned in the last minute as was heavyweight Colin Hart.

Commenting on the loss, co-captain Conant noted that the three team forfeits hurt the moral of the squad: "We knew we were going to lose. It's really hard to get psyched for your personal match when you know that the meet is down the drain."

The team should do better next week against RPI-WPI as both Zendle and Hugo St. John at 150 should be off the injured list.

Council adopts proposal to revise representation

by Ray DeMeo

The College Council voted Tuesday night to accept a proposal to reapportion the council representation system, and rejected a bid to make the offices of secretary and treasurer elective.

The proposals were part of a revised draft of a new constitution introduced by By-laws Committee Chairman Stu Ginsberg and discussed by the council. The council voted to accept with revisions, the first three articles of the draft.

The council voted to change the present system of at-large representation, in which four freshmen and six at-large representatives serve on the council, to a system in which four freshman representatives, and two at-large representatives each from the sophomore, junior and senior classes are elected by their respective classes. As in the past, each residential house will have a representative on the council.

The council rejected a proposal in the draft that called for the secretary and treasurer, in addition to the president and vice-president, to be elected directly by the student body. Council vice-President Randy Sturges moved that the secretary and treasurer be elected by the council as in the past, claiming that their duties were so complex that direct election might fail to secure a qualified candidate.

In other discussion of the proposed constitution, the council voted overwhelmingly to strike a provision calling for house representatives to be elected to one-year terms beginning in the second semester. Many council members felt that the houses should determine the terms of their representatives.

Also rejected from the proposed draft was a provision that called for all houses to submit its procedures on alternate representatives to the council secretary at the beginning of each council term. One council member called the clause "excess baggage," and another described alternate procedures as "the responsibility of the representatives, not the secretary."

The proposed constitution contains an impeachment clause which allows for the removal of any council officer for non-fulfillment of duties. Removal is contingent upon a two-thirds vote of the council.

The most heated discussion of the evening concerned the reapportionment clause of the draft. Ginsberg defended the draft's method of class representation, claiming that the proposed system creates "defined and delineated constituencies." Defenders of the present method of representation claimed that class consciousness at Williams is not strong enough to warrant class representation. The original draft called for one representative each from the junior and senior classes respectively. The committee amended this to two representatives each after last week's council discussion of the initial draft.

The Housing Committee proposed that the council investigate the Business Office's method of dividing house social dues. At present, $10 of the $15 fee goes to the house itself, and the remaining $5 goes to the Business Office. Council President Steve Piltch suggested that the council call in Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad to explain the distribution procedures.

The College Council amended the rewritten Constitution which the By-Laws Committee submitted for consideration at Tuesday night's meeting.

Tests halt plans for Mt. Hope Farm

A poor showing by the Mount Hope Farm soil in a series of percolation tests indicates a very marginal chance for success of the Kellogg Plan for the sale of the property, according to College Treasurer Francis H. Dewey '41.

The Kellogg Plan calls for 50 investors to pay $20,000 each for four acres of land. The remaining 800 acres would be set aside as a land trust, which would be used to maintain the property. The land would also be tax deductible.

James C. Kellogg III '37 donated money to have the Mount Hope Farm soil tested for its ability to handle sewage. For example, a pit is dug and filled with water: the faster the water soaks into the soil, the better the sewage capability. Unfortunately, only two of the 43 tests were positive, suggesting that the proposed construction of 50 houses on the site may be infeasible.

Alternative plans have been explored. The state water pollution officials have acknowledged the possibility of a sewage treatment system similar to that used by the Mt. Greylock High School. The cost of such a system, presently seems prohibitive.

Many modifications to the Kellogg Plan involve the loss of the Elm Tree House, a 72-room Georgian mansion.

Mount Hope Farm, which is located in South Williamstown, was purchased in 1963 to supplement the College's educational facilities. In the past decade it has been used solely for infrequent conferences and college functions. Considerable reflection by the Board of Trustees, and a $100,000 annual deficit led to a search for a new proposal.

In 1974, a Mount Hope Study Committee formed to discuss the options. It eventually recommended, as stated in the Fall '76 Alumni Review, "a minimum sale of property and maximum retention of land."

CEP will debate double majors role

by Chip Buckner

In the coming weeks the Committee on Educational Policy will continue to discuss the role of double majoring at Williams. At the December faculty meeting the faculty rejected CEP proposals to allow courses to count for more than one major and to permit theses to fulfill the requirements for honors in two departments.

The first CEP proposition would permit double majors to count one course for more than one department. For example, a student majoring in Religion and History of Ideas needs nine courses from the former and ten from the latter departments. As it now stands History of Ideas 102 - Religion 202 counts as one course for either department, but not for both. After completing this course, a student must complete 18 additional courses. The CEP plan would count this as one course for each department, reducing the total requirement to 17 additional courses in these departments. Committee members defended the proposal saying that the number of courses taken is less important than the amount of information learned.

Double counting is the "intelligent and efficient" way to handle course counting for double majors, said CEP member Gordon Winston. Since double majors exist, the sensible policy is the logical and simple one, Winston added.

Committee member Larry Mitchell '78 commented that the double counting proposal made it easier to integrate courses into a double major. Mitchell noted that the proposal would also reduce the total number of courses needed from the two departments, making it easier to double major.

18 to study at Mystic Seaport

by Nancy Richman

Next fall, 18 students will participate in the first session of the one-term Williams College—Mystic Seaport program in American Maritime Studies. History Professor Benjamin Labaree, who will serve as program director at Mystic, explained that he "wanted to make it possible for Williams students and others to be able to study maritime history in a milieu in which the subject is best suited." The seaport museum, he said, provided an ideal setting in which to learn about man and the sea.

The participants will live on the outskirts of the historic village but will have access to many of its facilities. The curriculum includes such courses as American maritime history, literature, and art. Marine biology and physical oceanography will be the science offerings and an interdisciplinary seminar is planned, entitled "Uses of the Sea." Present and former faculty members from the 18 schools participating in the Williams College sponsored program will teach the courses.

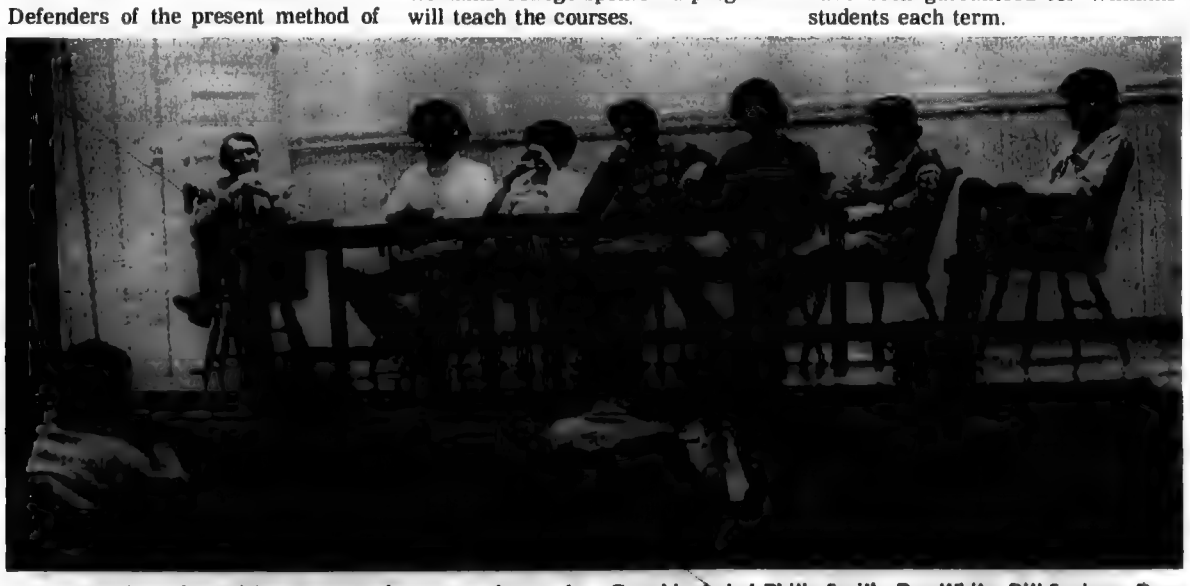
In addition to the required four courses, students will be required to develop at least one maritime skill during their stay. Labaree explained that such activities might range from boat building or boat restoration to celestial navigation or scuba diving. He said that he hoped students might be able to work in conjunction with members of the seaport's staff.

Professor Labaree has been involved with summer programs at the Seaport for the last 6 years and has offered successful winter study programs at Mystic in the past. He feels confident that the new semester long program will be able to generate sufficient interest. Over 20 Williams students attended an organizational meeting held on Tuesday.

Participation in the maritime studies curriculum is limited to students at institutions in the 12 college exchange group and also at six other colleges: Tufts, Colby, Bates, Hamilton-Kirkland, Union and Middlebury. Associate Dean Nancy McIntire explained that six places have been guaranteed for Williams students each term.

Increase in price forces coffee off luncheon menu

by Tim Wang



The wholesale price of coffee rose from $1.82 to $2.49 a pound since the beginning of the year, according to Ross Keller, Director of Food Services. Keller said this "big and shocking increase" was one of "a number of factors" that led to his decision to remove coffee from the luncheon menu.

Calling coffee "a very expensive drink", Keller remarked that his action was in part a protest, "in order to add our little voice to all the other people who said no to paying high prices for coffee." Although Keller did not know exactly how much money the school would save, the move was also made to cut back on costs.

Keller stated that there was no student input into the decision, and that so far, there had been no negative feedback. He noted that "students drink coffee mostly in the morning and in the evening", so his decision was "not really a big deal". Keller also noted that coffee is still served in the snack bar.

In explaining his decision, Keller emphasized the law of supply and demand. "When a house is priced too high," he observed, "you don't buy it." He compared the coffee situation to last year's price problems involving sugar, and said he hoped the same cumulative effect of cutting back on consumption would happen with coffee.

Keller noted that the practice of not supplying coffee at lunch would continue indefinitely. "Let's see what the market does", he concluded.

The Admissions Committee sponsored an open forum to discuss feelings towards Williams Wednesday night. The Panel included Philip Smith, Ron White, Bill Spriggs, Dave Libardi, Ray Porfilio, Sue Tuttle, and George Marcus.

Admissions and student forum discuss expectations of Williams undergrads

The College fulfills the expectations of most incoming students, although its atmosphere of isolation disturbs a number of undergraduates, commented students attending an open forum on admissions Wednesday night sponsored by the Admissions Committee.

The Forum, designed, according to Chairman George Marcus, to let the Admissions Committee know how well they were presenting the college to prospective students, opened with a short panel discussion between five upperclassmen. The consensus of students attending was that with a few exceptions, Williams had realized their pre-enrollment expectations.

Despite this feeling, several panelists and audience members felt that the Williams community as it stands is too much in isolation, socially and intellectually as well as physically and culturally. One panelist described Williams as a "Never Never Land" populated by "incredibly naive" students.

It was pointed out that one could become isolated at any college, especially an urban university, and that "all the problems of the world" may be found right here in Berkshire County. Most students agreed, though, that they would rather not deal with those problems.

At several points, the discussion hovered near but never actually attacked the question of the college's duty to make students aware of other life-styles than their own. One audience member noted that if one wanted to live in the "real" world, he was wasting money by coming to Williams.

Rivalries and Feuds

Tomorrow night's basketball encounter between Union and Williams is not your typical shake hands and see you after the game for a beer kind of affair. No sirree, gentlemen. Amherst may be our rival, but any game with Union is a feud. And over the years basketball contests between the two schools have been nothing short of wars. If ever a relationship personified the meaning of pus, this is it.

By now most sports fans know about Union's efforts to rejuvenate its sports program by hiring two bona fide, heavyweight coaches—Tom Cahill in football and Ned Harkness in hockey—and by building two beautiful athletic facilities. The changes seem to be paying off, too: the football team is on the upswing while the hockey team has risen from the cellar to the top of the Division 2 rankings in just two seasons.

Hidden underneath all this change, however, has been the unflagging excellence of the Union basketball program. In three years under head coach Bill Scanlon the Dutchmen have compiled an outstanding 57-14 ledger and have reached the New York ECAC playoffs the past two seasons despite a starting line-up averaging under 6' 2". Make no bones about it—basketball is THE sport in Schenectady and Union fans support their team with a religious fervor bordering on fanaticism.

During the past five years, moreover, the Williams game has become a religious crusade for the Dutchmen. Forget about Hamilton or RPI or their other New York opponents; a victory over Williams in basketball wipes out the memories of those football and soccer drubbings and restores their battered egos by securing them the Peter Hillman Memorial bragging rights in the bars of Saratoga Springs. Witness the past four years' contests:

January, 1973: The game is in Williamstown. By 7:30 Lasell is packed. Only a third of the fans are from Williams, though. Union arrived early and en masse. Ephs fans, notorious for their lateness, are shut out of their own gym. Union wins a squeaker, 63-61, with much of the credit going to the "home" crowd and its cowbell.

January, 1974: Union has been playing in its brand new gym for over a month but has yet to dedicate the place. The reason? Williams doesn't come to town until late January. The game is a sellout. Peter Hillman describes being in the stands as almost like being at a South Boston parents' meeting. With the omnipresent cowbell clanging in approval, Union pulls away for a 63-52 victory.

January, 1975: Union men are a year older and a year wiser to Lasell. Once again they pack the Gym by 7:30. Williams fans are a little wiser, too, and get there earlier. But Union men prove cagier, spreading themselves out in small bunches to every section of the gym to disrupt the Eph vocal attack. Harry Sheehy stands at halfcourt during the player introductions trying to get the crowd fired up. The crowd responds, the cowbell is drowned out, and Sheehy leads the Ephs to a thrilling 81-77 triumph.

January, 1976: A 6' 4" freshman from Florida comes off the bench late in the first half to break open a close contest. Union coasts to an easy 76-57 win. The cowbell doesn't shut up.

When you come right down to it, The Williams-Union game is more than just an athletic contest—it's a battle for superiority between those who have and those who don't. Deep down all Union men wanted to attend Williams but couldn't get in so they've spent the remainder of their college careers spilling beer in the bars of Saratoga Springs and pusing on Williams with an Amherst-like lack of tact and wit.

And you can bet your new pair of Converse that they'll all be here very early tomorrow evening with an entire semester's store of pus ready to burst. The challenge for Tim Hester, Mike Tanner, et al. is clear: blow the Dutchmen out of Lasell. The challenge for Eph fans is even more obvious: fill the place by 7:00, then lock the doors and send that damn cowbell to Mt. Hope to rust.

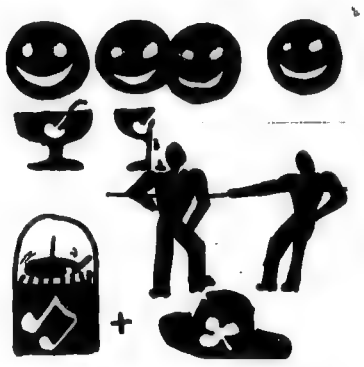
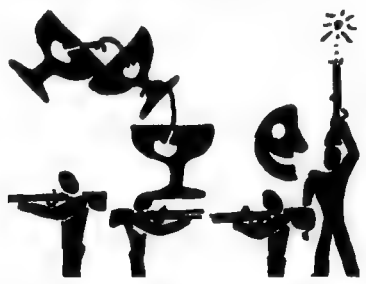
A Guide to Billsville Bars

PART ONE



This week, THEY WRITE BY NIGHT offers a guided tour of Williamstown's varied and surprisingly sophisticated "watering-holes." Each establishment will be given ratings on various qualities; the code to the symbols is given below.

This column was made possible by a generous grant from the Newman Association, with the reminder, "If Saturday night's a hoopla ... Sunday's for 'mea culpa'!"



We started our night at the bar of the CAPTAIN'S TABLE (nee Captain's Cabin). We tried their Campari & Water and their Rum & Tonic, and both were satisfactory; plenty of the obligatory lime. A brief sampling of their whiskey drinks showed that everything was fine in that department, and then we both attempted the house special, a "Davy Jones' Locker." My companion said that her drink was "greasy" and it made her slightly pale and nauseous. Oddly, mine tasted nothing like hers, and its strange taste puzzled me until a quick trip to the men's room confirmed that the drink was primarily a Lysol blend. We decided to go on to the next stop. RATING:

A short, pleasant drive brought us to the AMERICAN LEGION. If old time corner-bar atmosphere is what you crave, this is the place for you. My companion said that her glass was "filthy" and admittedly my Gin & Tonic was strangely thick, almost mucous, but the American Legion really comes through on that old time ambience. Their liqueur selection is non-existent, and difficult drink orders are often met with a "you-must-be-kidding" expression, if you get any reaction at all. But that's exactly what the place is all about! The stone-face bartender (who was shyer with us than with his friends; he occasionally reduced them to stitches, and they constantly looked towards us as if to include us in their jokes!) was eager for us to try what he called "The Belford-Stratview Special" (the drink that made the "Legion" famous) but we didn't have the time. Ah, these salty New Englanders! RATING:

At the PURPLE PUB we were pleased with the large, tasty, chock-full-of-ice Bloody Marys. They have the strange custom of serving frosted pitchers of beer to be drunk in warm, disposable cups—we suspected some sort of management problem. Within minutes my companion claimed that "everyone is looking at us," and almost immediately I heard someone refer to her as "the ugliest thing on hoofs." He was surprised to feel my fist in his stomach, and everyone in the bar was delighted to have some entertainment of the fashionably violent sort. Everyone except my companion; for when the proprieter flipped on the glaring overhead lights, they went unnoticed by me. I was severely beaten and bruised, lying face down on the juke box. A little first aid, a contribution to help with the damaged video-pong game (more thanks to the wonderful Newman Association!) and my companion and I were ready to continue our interrupted night. RATING:

We ended up our enjoyable night at the WILLIAMS TREADWAY INN. The bar at "the Inn" is a pleasant, if tacky setting to have a late night cordial, mixed drink, or even a midnight swim! My companion said that she was "bored as hell" and that the live music was "crap" and suggested—demanded—that we return to her dormitory to drink some "Jim Beam." I explained that it was best to milk the Newman Association for all we could, and picking up the idea quickly, she spent the rest of the night ordering rounds for everyone in the bar, suggesting—demanding—that many of the male patrons join her in a rented room upstairs. She ended up on the floor of the Ladies' room, vomiting. I wonder how she got home.

Course comment

To the editor:

Your Jan. 11 article "Frosh Inquiry courses cancelled" stated that "One student chose 'Facts and Values' as his first choice. I hasten to inform you that I (as well as 30 per cent of the student body) am NOT a his!

Poetry reading

To the editor:

Unfortunately, due to the relatively minute size of Williams as an institution, the area of creative writing remains a comparatively obscure segment of the college community. The territory of verse covers an even more exiguous domain. Despite this, a wealth of poetic dexterity exists on this campus. In order to facilitate an expanded awareness of this literary talent, Back Talk magazine, a student publication; is sponsoring a poetry reading on Sunday evening, January 16, at eight p.m. in the Rathskellar Lounge.

Your attendance at the evening's performance is enthusiastically requested. Representing a broad spectrum of both styles and methods of presentation the eight student poets; Judy Harley, G. Bernard Hutchinson, Jeff Nicholas, Bill Spriggs, Gwen Sullivan, Ronald White, Steven White and David Wood Jr. will embark upon an hour's entertainment, featuring their original poetic works with the background music of Jake Raskob on guitar. This is a fortuitous opportunity to experience a form of metaphysical entertainment rarely offered on this campus. Won't you join us, Sunday, in Rathskellar, on the evening of the 16. Refreshments will be served after the performance.

Stevens displays talent during 'musical blizzard'

by Valerie A. Sarantos

When Claudia Stevens sat down at the piano last Monday evening in Thompson Memorial Chapel for the first of the Young Artists Series, little did an already snow-covered audience realize that it was about to witness a truly magnificent musical blizzard. Stevens' diverse program of works by Schoenberg, Mozart, and Brahms revealed an impressive technical virtuosity encompassing an interpretive scale ranging from authoritative violence and passion, to lyrical sweetness and dignity.

Schoenberg's highly atonal Five Piano Pieces, Op. 23, was excitingly percussive. Never becoming muddled or overly harsh, the sprinkling notes were clear, well articulated, and always separately maintained.

Throughout the pieces Stevens gestured and mumbled as though engaged in a conversation with the instrument. Sometimes, however, this practice detracted from the pure sound of the piano, particularly during more complicated passages.

Mozart's difficult Sonata in F Major, K. 533-494, particularly the first and third movements, was generally beautifully performed, with piercingly clear trills and runs. However, the middle Andante movement lacked the usual emotional quality assigned to it. Here, emotion was sacrificed for technique.

Following an intermission, Stevens concluded with the massive Brahms Sonata in F Minor, Op. 5, where she displayed the far reaches of her technique. Despite the brilliant runs, powerful chordal passages, and flowing melodic lines, she seemed to lack the overall confidence evident in the previous works, particularly the Schoenberg. However, thunderous applause coaxed a charmingly expressive Schumann piece out of the pianist for her encore.

Andrew Rangell, pianist, will give a free public recital in Thompson Memorial Chapel at 8:30 p.m. on Monday.

Rangell to play Beethoven

The second concert in the Music Department's Young Artists Series features Andrew Rangell this Monday in Thompson Memorial Chapel at 8:30 p.m. The highly esteemed pianist will play an all Beethoven program.

Rangell made his New York debut at Carnegie Recital Hall in 1974 as the winner of a Concert Artists Guild Award. Since then he has given numerous solo recitals in the East, Colorado, and Washington State, which include guest appearances at the New England Conservatory, S.U.N.Y. at Albany, Denver University, and the University of Colorado. An active chamber musician and concerto soloist, Rangell has gathered critical acclaim wherever he has played. The New York Times called his Carnegie recital "one of the more striking debuts of the season—a pianist of dazzling technical ability—uncommonly intense—his interpretations offer fresh and satisfying insights—" The Philadelphia Inquirer said: "His technical ability seemed complete—purling even runs and a general even-handedness.

Rangell's program includes Beethoven's Sonata in D Major, Opus 28 and the Sonata in A flat Major, Opus 110, as well as the Diabelli Variations.

Films move to Saturdays

Last Fall term, WCFG showed films on Wednesday night. This spring, thirteen films, will be shown instead on Saturday night, at 7:30 and sometimes 9:30 in Bronfman auditorium. There will be an admission charge of $1.00, but a season pass, good for all thirteen films, is available for only $5.00. These passes will be sold at the door, and also in Baxter, Greylock and Mission dining halls during the months of January and February. Some of these films are shown in conjunction with English 204, The Feature Film.

This month there will be a meeting, still to be scheduled, for all those interested in joining WCFG and eventually in helping choose films to be shown next year. It is the purpose of this organization to bring films to campus that usually are not available to Williams College students. It is still necessary for this organization to help support itself and the best way to do this is to get more students involved. If there are any questions, please call 597-2721 or 2720.

The schedule of films is as follows:

Feb. 5 The Blue Angel (1930) Joseph von Sternberg - Germany.
This film launched the career of Marlene Dietrich as the incomparable Lola Lola, a vulgar and sensual nightclub singer who shatters the respectability and self-importance of an English professor played by Emil Jannings. 7:30 and 9:30.

Feb. 12 Shadow of a Doubt (1943) Alfred Hitchcock - U.S.A.
Starring Joseph Cotton, Teresa Wright, and Hume Cronym. Considered by Robin Wood to be a key film of Hitchcock's career, this work is one of his first successful films to come out of Hollywood. The finale is a chase scene that ends up in—of all places—the Statue of Liberty. 7:30.

Feb. 19 I Am a Fugitive from a Chain Gang (1932) Mervyn LeRoy - U.S.A.
With Paul Muni. This film is one of those works that is interesting not only because it is a good "movie", but also, because it is a document of social protest. When it was made, it was hoped that it would "ameliorate the condition of convicts", particularly in the Southern states. 7:30.

Feb. 26 Nights of Cabiria (1957) Frederico Fellini - Italian.
Acclaimed by many critics as one of Fellini's finest films, Nights of Cabiria deals with the life of a street walker whose tough veneer readily exposes an innocence and gullibility which are her salvation. But, in true Fellini fashion, all images of good are mixed with those of evil. Guilietta Masina, Fellini's wife, plays the streetwalker, a character revived and amplified from The White Shiek. 7:30 and 9:30.

Mar. 5 Medium Cool (1969) Haskell Wexler - U.S.A.
With Robert Forster. In Wexler's film, a TV cameraman "shoots" the 1968 Democratic Convention in Chicago and becomes involved in a romance. Actual riot footage is used by Wexler. John Simon writes: " . . . a Hollywood film for the first time faces up to the wretchedness beneath our prosperity; dares to give us a political America, and one whose politics are not suffused with health. I wish I could like Medium Cool completely. But intermittently, at least, I can love it." A rare statement for Simon. 7:30 and 9:30.

Mar. 12 Voyage to Italy (1953) Roberto Rossellini - Italian.
Ostensively, this film is about the second courtship of a married couple, Ingrid Bergman and George Sanders. Because Rossellini is concerned with "the sense of eternal life", spiritual rather than psychological penetration, the action is qualitatively actionless. The images are internally revealing and Rossellini renders his characters beautifully naked with total empathy. Considered by some to be among the finest films ever made. 7:30 and 9:30.

Apr. 9 Greed (1925) (silent) Erich von Stroheim - U.S.A.
Although relatively unknown today in 1958, Greed was voted one of the ten best films ever made. Based on Frank Norris' McTeague, it is about the destruction on McTeague, his wife, and all those around him due to their relentless obsession with gold. 7:30. Stroheim disowned the film due to the way in which it was edited by MGM, but it remains a masterpiece due to its intense and disturbing realism. All scenes were filmed on location, and the final one, shot in Death Valley, is particularly noteworthy.

Apr. 16 Ashes and Diamonds (1958) Andrej Wajda - Poland.
This film takes place just after Germany's surrender in World War II. But because the war is not really over yet, a young Polish resistance fighter must chose between love and his commitment to a social cause. The film revolves around the tension between instinct and idealism, duty and desire. Many critics point out that Wajda's aesthetic conventions are similar to those of Eisenstein and Pudovkin, and consider him responsible for the renaissance in Polish cinema. 7:30.

Apr. 23 Beauty and the Beast (1946) Jean Cocteau - France
Beauty, the youngest daughter of a merchant, takes her father's place as the hostage of the Beast. He falls in love with her, and when he sees how much she misses her father he allows her to visit him on the condition that she return—for without her he will die. After a long time and many tribulations, Beauty sees a vision of the Beast dying and rushes back to him.

Apr. 30 The Crazy Ray (Paris qui Dort) (1923) Rene Clair - France
In this silent short, Paris is frozen in time by a scientist in possession of a crazy ray. Everyone is stopped in their tracks; except, the passengers of a small airplane who, before landing in Paris, were above the range of the ray. Thus begins their adventure, with Paris all to themselves. A wonderfully photographed and extremely witty film. 7:30 and 10:15.

Apr. 30 Dishonored (1931) Joseph von Sternberg - Germany.
Marlene Dietrich is an espionage agent who falls in love with a Russian spy and betrays her country. One of the greatest Dietrich films by von Sternberg. 8:30.

May 7 Frenzy (1972) Alfred Hitchcock - Britain.
Alfred Hitchcock's return to Britain, after his Hollywood sojourn, yields this classic thriller of London terrorized by a murderer who strangles women with neckties, and the inspector who tries to track him down. Vivian Merchant is wonderful as the former's wife who serves ghastly gourmet dishes to her long-suffering husband. 7:30 and 9:30.

May 14 Ugetsu (1953) Kenji Mizoguchi - Japan.
Set in the Sixteenth-Century, this film is about the tragedy which befalls two married men who leave their rural lives to seek honour and wealth in the city. The film has strong ties with Japanese symbolic theatre and the scenes are made up of both ordinary and supernatural life. Lush photography. 7:30.

May 21 The Magician (1957) Ingmar Bergman - Sweden.
Vintage Bergman. Max von Sydow gives a brilliant performance as Dr. Volger, the magician-hypnotist who, through a series of illusions, seeks his revenge upon an unbelieving medical officer who has humiliated his troupe. Considered by Bergman to be a comedy, this bizarre film will be more likely to disturb its audience. 7:30.

Purple faces Union next

Springfield slams Ephs, 91-80

by Andy O'Donnell

Before we get to the Hatfield and McCoy (alias Williams-Union) matchup tomorrow evening, there's an affair that occurred Wednesday evening at Springfield which should be mentioned first, for the bubble that so gloriously floated out of Lasell after the Bates game came to a rough halt in the dark emptiness of the Memorial Field House on the Springfield College campus.

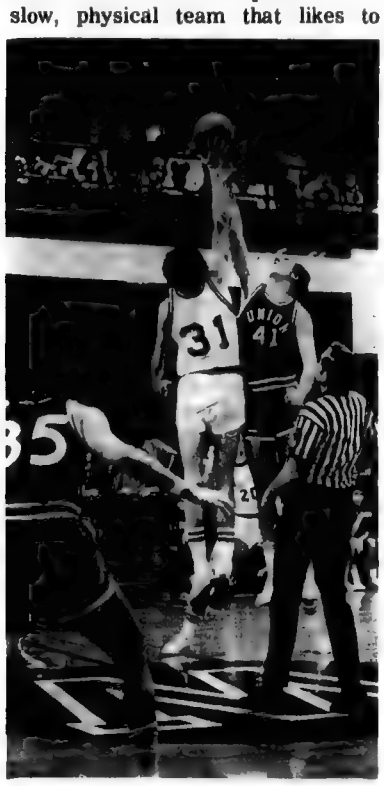
After struggling futilely for 40 minutes to climb into a game totally controlled by a strong Springfield club, the Eph hoopsters finally succumbed 91-80 and saw their season record drop to 2-3.

Springfield entered the game with a solid 7-3 record and a reputation as a slow, physical team that likes to assert itself early. They then control the tempo of the game, by allowing 6' 5" jumping jack Dave Pugh to do his thing on offense and letting burly center Don Jarvis clean up any missed shots by his frontcourt mate.

Williams, which was coming off a textbook display against Bates, either didn't take the Chiefs seriously enough or were just plain flat and thinking ahead to Union. Except for the initial few minutes when it jumped out to a quick 6-2 lead, the team was playing Sisyphus all night.

It's not that the Ephs didn't try, however. In the first half, for example, Williams actually outrebounded Springfield and took more shots as well. But while the Chiefs were connecting on over 48 per cent of their attempts, Williams was shooting a paltry 32 per cent, with most of those shots coming from at least 15 feet.

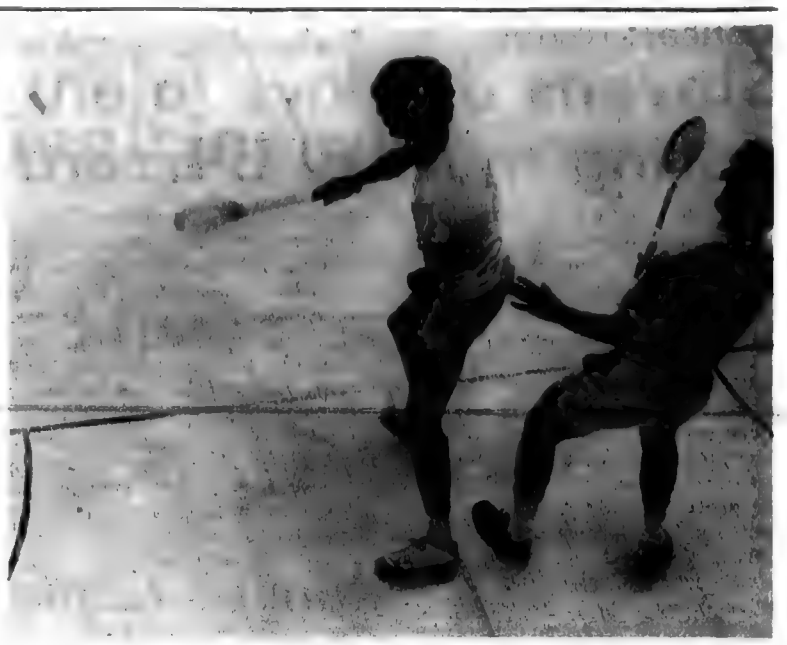
Mike Tanner kept Williams in the game during the early going, hitting for eight of the Ephs first sixteen points before picking up his third foul with ten minutes left in the half and Williams down by three, 19-16.



With Tanner out, Springfield gradually began to assert itself, building a 39-30 halftime lead on the strength of Pugh's inside repertoire, which included a couple of beautiful slam dunks and a bundle of tip-ins. Tom Balderston almost single-handedly refused to let Williams fold, scoring eight of the last fourteen Williams points following Tanner's departure.

The Ephs drew to within eight twice during the second half but each time Pugh and sophomore forward Dave Porter were there to stifle the threat. Springfield ever so slowly began to pull away, increasing its margin by a point or two every minute until they had stretched the lead to twenty, 85-65, with just 4:27 left. Gerry Kelly and Tanner brought Williams back to within ten, 85-75, but Springfield regrouped and sealed the victory on the foul line.

Tanner led the Williams attack with 25 points. Balderston added 15 (13 in the first half), Brad Wolk 14, and Bill Whelan 9 in his best performance of the season. Pugh led Springfield with 25, and his JV associates downed the Ephmen as well, 106-102.



A few notes about Union: The Dutchmen are off to a surprisingly slow start, at last count having only two victories against six defeats. Two standout players return from last year's 17-6 squad, however, forward Pete Meola and guard Gary Borhese.

Union's philosophy is simple: make the opponent earn his pay every time down the floor. This translates into continual guard pressure and a number of full and half court presses. Although their offense is suspect this season, the key to the game should be how well Kelly, Straka, and Whelan can handle the backcourt harassment. The shootout begins at (8:00 p.m.) tomorrow night at Lasell gym.

Harry Sheehy outjumps this flying Dutchman in the Purple's stunning 81-77 upset of Union 2 years ago. The Ephs hope to avenge last year's 76-57 loss tomorrow night.

Harvard topples Eph squashmen

by Evan Bash

Coach Dave Johnson's racquetmen travelled to Cambridge on Wednesday with dreams of an upset over a powerful Harvard squad. The Ephmen could not make the dream come true, however, as they hoisted the white flag of surrender after a 9-0 Crimson triumph. The loss gives the Ephs a 2-1 season record as they now head into the middle part of this year's campaign.

Captain Mark Reinhart drew as tough an assignment as one will find in collegiate squash today, playing the 12th ranked player in North America. Reinhart performed well in losing three games as did Arnie Cogswell against a player who would be a fine no. 1 on most other teams. Chip Lindquist and no. 4 Martin Goldberg both fared no better as they each lost in three games. The drubbing Williams took in the top half of the line-up was completed when Charlie Haines also went down at no. 5.

Returning to a Williams team for the first time in almost two years was Bruce Giammatei, and he was the only bright spot of the day for the Ephs, jumping out to a 2-1 game lead before falling 3-2. Senior Tim Belk and no. 8 Jim Little came close to winning some games but both lost in three straight. Often neglected Michael Fitzhugh was the final Eph victim of the day at the number nine spot.

Williams returns to the friendly Lasell courts tomorrow afternoon at 2:00 p.m. for a triangular match with Hobart and Middlebury.

Women cagers to play Yale

A strong, rebounding, and fast breaking basketball team will take the court against Yale Saturday in New Haven and with its speed and attitude, open a season which should be both exciting and victorious.

Looking good as they begin the 1977 season with new coach Sue Hudson, the Williams women's basketball team returns to action tomorrow with four '76 starters back again. Returning forwards Maggie O'Brien and Leigh Wilson will provide height and rebounding ability for the team while coach Hudson looks to veteran guard Anne Youngling to lead the Eph's scoring drive. Freshman guard Monica Grady and center Robin Ellett round out the team which Hudson describes as talented and very quick.

Providing depth for the squad is junior Lisa Capeldini who returns from last year's 11-3 team. Hudson will also expect to see action from freshman Karyn Allison and sophomore Lucy Bledsoe.

Although the team was defeated in a pre-season scrimmage with Springfield, Hudson is confident of an excellent season with traditional powerhouses University of Vermont and Radcliffe presenting the toughest challenges for the Ephs.

Expecting a win tomorrow, Hudson will send her psyched-up squad, just off a victory over Union Wednesday, against Yale in the two team's first meeting. Hudson will rely on the defensive ability of her squad to force the Bulldogs to the outside. This same strategy will be put into use next Tuesday when the Ephs return to those famous "cozy confines" in Lasell in their home opener against Skidmore. The Skidmore game should set the tone of the season for the team which Hudson calls fast, with an ability to "get rebounds and move down the court. We look good and we should go far."

Skiers begin year finishing well in local competition

Men's Skiing

Coming off its first strong performances of the season, the alpine team will compete in the Williams Outing Club grand slalom at Berlin Mt. tomorrow and Sunday. The Nordic team, hampered by an injury to Captain Gary James, will compete in the Brattleboro race tonight and the Putney relays on Sunday.

In a tri-state qualifying race at Bousquet (Mass.) Mt. last Saturday, the alpine team placed five skiers in the top ten in a field of about 100 racers. Sophomore Andy Mikell was the individual winner. In a grand slalom race at Brodie Mt. on Sunday, the Ephs placed three in the top ten with Mikell again leading the way, this time finishing second.

Women's Skiing

The Nordic team will participate in the Brattleboro race tonight and the Putney Relays on Sunday.

Alpine captain Marty Epstein led the Ephs with two second-place finishes last week, one in the slalom at Bousquet and the other in the grand slalom at Brodie.

At the Hanover Relays, the women's Nordic team, led by All-East Anne Waters and second team selections Ellen Toll and Rachel Potter finished ninth among the best competition in the East, and were the fourth collegiate team to finish.

Double major discussed

Mitchell said that the CEP considered double majoring "at least not bad, and maybe a good thing." The faculty apparently did not share that opinion, Mitchell observed. The committee did not attempt to decide whether double majors were good or bad, but just how to make the present system more efficient.

The faculty rejected the CEP proposal by a large margin reportedly to avoid encouraging multiple majors.

The second CEP idea, to permit honors candidates to count one thesis for two departments, was equally unpopular with the faculty. Though the committee felt any thesis that could satisfy two different departments must be a "marvelous document" deserving double honors, the faculty again saw this as an encouragement to double honors and rejected the suggestion.

VOL. 90, NO. 27 WILLIAMS COLLEGE JANUARY 18, 1977

Trustee committees convene to discuss future of College

by Ann McCabe

Nine committees of the board of trustees will convene between Thursday and Saturday in the first of four meetings in 1977.

The trustee Committee on Campus Life, the Committee on Undergraduate Life, a group of selected students and Dean of Students Peter Berek will discuss issues of interest to the student body on Thursday and Friday.

The Budget and Financial Planning Committee will review the updated budget for this school year as well as the projection for next year. Students and parents will be notified of the tuition change through letters sent out January 24. Treasurer and Vice President for Administration Francis H. Dewey III said a tuition hike is probable: "Until four years ago, tuition was raised every other year, now it is raised annually." He cited a ten per cent increase in the cost of heating oil as one cause of the hike.

The Capital Drive of the Seventies set three construction priorities: first in the area of music, then art, and then indoor physical education facilities. The Buildings and Grounds Committee will review recently completed Chapin Hall renovation phase I, and future plans for the expansion of music facilities. Dewey stated that phase I was completed within the budget. Funds needed to finish Chapin have not yet been raised. The trustees will also discuss how many and what architects should be assigned to the art and physical education projects. Proposals to enlarge the museum, art classrooms, basketball and swimming facilities could be discussed.

The status of Mt. Hope Farm is in a state of flux after the recent soil tests which dismiss any possibility of extensive construction. As to the future of Mt. Hope, Dewey said, "The Kellogg proposal looks marginal after the percolation tests. Some party may be interested in buying or leasing all or part of Mt. Hope ... we are forever considering different ideas, clients, and uses."

The Committee on Instruction and Degrees will determine who will receive honorary degrees and who will speak at graduation. It will also approve tenure candidates, make appointments and determine salaries, and possibly discuss the tenure process.

The Development Committee will review the capital drive, Alumni Fund results, and deferred gifts from wills or trusts.

The Executive Committee is the last to meet Friday. The committee chairmen plus a few other members discuss matters unrelated to the other eight committees. Saturday, in the board meeting, the chairmen will discuss the outcome of individual meetings.

CC plans to ratify constitution

by Tim Wang

The College Council will finish revising and accepting the last six articles of the proposed new constitution at tonight's meeting, according to CC President Steve Piltch.

The new constitution was introduced to the council last Tuesday by By-Laws Committee Chairman Stu Ginsberg. The council will consider the entire constitution article by article until each article has been approved or amended, he said.

At tonight's meeting, the council will consider articles concerning open council meetings and automatic expulsion of members who miss three consecutive meetings. Also under consideration will be articles deleting the provisions in the old constitution which empowered the council to discipline residential houses and giving it the right of approval of all actions of student-faculty committees.

Ginsberg said that "in fact, the council does not have the right of approval." The relationship between the council and student-faculty committees needs to be defined, but I'm not sure the By-Laws Committee should do it."

The section of the proposed constitution omitting the council's power to discipline a residential house is primarily a change in wording, he said. While commenting that "it's tough to envision a case where the council would discipline a house," Ginsberg did not think the new wording would preclude such discipline.

According to Ginsberg, the committee is "seriously considering" a proposal by which, if a council member missed three consecutive meetings, a motion for his expulsion would automatically come before the council. This "would remove the burden of proposing such an expulsion from any individual member," probably making the council more likely to act, he said, but would still leave a loophole for the protection of members with special reasons for their absences.

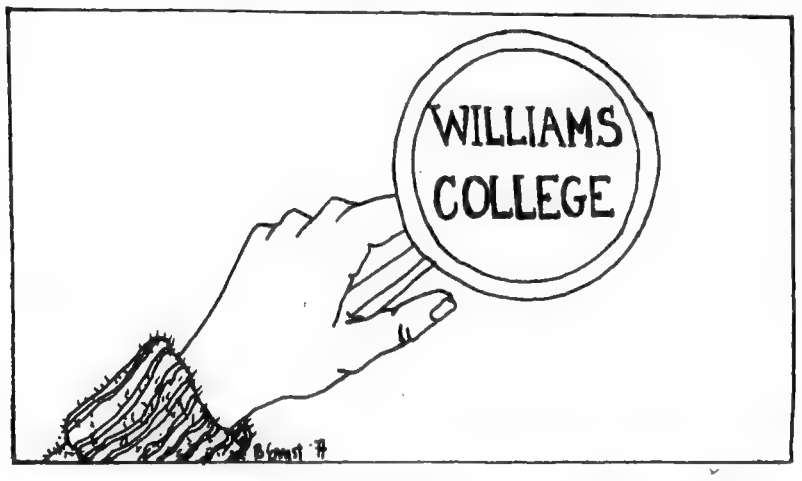
College readies for decennial review

by Lisa Hartigan

This fall, Williams College will have its accreditation reviewed by the New England Association of Schools and Colleges. The last time the association reviewed Williams was in 1967; it is mandatory that a school be inspected every ten years to maintain its accreditation. There are two stages involved in the accreditation process: the school first prepares a self-study report and is then evaluated by a group of representatives from other schools selected by the Association.



Dean of the College Peter Berek described accreditation as "a nationally used standard for a college," which institutions use in transferring credits and which graduate schools refer to when examining the qualifications of applicants. "Being accredited is not a particularly great distinction, but not being accredited is a serious handicap to a college."

According to Berek, the association is instituting a new program of self-evaluation for colleges such as Williams whose accreditation is assured. In the past, the self-study report consisted of a detailed description of college facilities, finances, and educational programs to the extreme of listing the number of periodicals received in the library. This year, however, Williams will be permitted to concentrate on issues it considers important to the College in its study. Three student-faculty committees have been formed, said Berek, to report on student life, the curriculum, and the budget.

The self-study, which Berek said he hopes will be completed by the end of the summer, is followed by an inspection by the faculty representatives from the association. In 1967, these included a philosophy professor from Amherst and deans from both Bowdoin and Wellesley. Faculty representatives for the coming accreditation have not yet been designated, he said.

The association will compile a confidential report on the school which will include its recommendations for improvements as well as the visitors' thoughts on what they saw at Williams. Ten years ago, the visitors were impressed by both Williams' morale and its academic program, but recommended increasing faculty office space, upgrading the library, and expanding the athletic facilities.

Williams is undertaking this self-evaluation because it is good for Williams, not because the College expects to be denied accreditation, said Berek. Among the issues to be studied are how residential life has been developed at Williams since the 1967 study, including the creation of the residential house system, he said. The changes in the student body at Williams will also be studied, and plans will be considered for changing admissions policy in response to the anticipated decline in applications due to a decline in birth rates, said Berek.

Alaskan expert teaches community development

by Jim Levinsohn

The near-zero temperatures and heavy snows battering New England this year are nothing new to Tim Kennedy, for the visiting instructor normally resides in Alaska near the Arctic Circle.

Kennedy flew from Anchorage in order to teach an Environmental Studies Winter Study project entitled Community Development. Students in the class are captivated not only by the course material but also by Mr. Kennedy as a person.

A native of New York, he attended a small Jesuit college for three years. Then, some what confused with what his life was all about, he left without receiving his degree. In 1966 Kennedy decided to join VISTA. VISTA gave him three choices of location. After selecting Puerto Rico first, American Samoa second and the Virgin Islands third, VISTA assigned him to Alaska.

Kennedy and his wife of two days, were sent to Noorvik Alaska—a community north of the Arctic circle. He stayed there for two years. In this time, Tim's life changed a great deal. When he arrived, Tim considered himself a "white liberal". Says Kennedy, "It soon became apparent that the liberal's war on poverty created havoc rather than help." Tim became totally engrossed in the Eskimo society and soon found the Eskimos to be a people plagued by cross-cultures. Noorvik schools, used Dick and Jane readers. The young Eskimo read about children playing with their dog Spot. Because in Eskimo society dogs are often considered dangerous, the child would wonder "Why in the world are these fools, Dick and Jane, playing with a dog?"

Kennedy found that the Eskimos often felt "absolutely weak." Thus, Tim decided to try to act as what he terms an "enabler" rather than an "advocate" and try to give the Eskimos power as a group. In the eyes of public officials, the Eskimos often appeared "childlike, for they often spoke with broken English." While Noorvik appeared passive, the opposite was true. According to Mr. Kennedy, "the Eskimos imploded, not exploded." The 60's had falsely raised the hope of the Eskimos, thus creating more frustration.

Through his experience dealing with this problem, Mr. Kennedy developed a process now known as Skyriver. This is a process whereby the Eskimos expressed their problem through the medium of video interviews. The Eskimo being "interviewed" then had absolute editorial rights over the interview. After he approved the interview, the community as a whole then edited and approved the film. At this point the interview would be shown to government official who would normally never listen to an Eskimo.

One day, by chance, Tim met some fellows from the National Film Board of Canada. The NFB liked what Kennedy was doing, and without even writing a full request, Tim received a large monetary grant to continue his work. In Kennedy's words, "Things built up and happened, they weren't planned."

Tim became the program producer for the Canadian National Film Board. His films have become world acclaimed, and the process he developed, SKYRIVER, is now being used throughout the world. He has appeared in Life, the New York Times, and at the Nairobi Kenya International Conference. His still photography has been shown in art museums in New York City and his films all over the world.

This May, Kennedy will get around to receiving the degree. Tim will be entering a Ph.D. program at Cornell and possibly at the same time, teaching there. The State Department, is interested in using his process in Africa through the Agency for International Development missions. Eventually he would like to organize an Institute for Social Change, but until then Tim Kennedy will just let things happen.

OCC panels held

The Office of Career Counseling will sponsor a program of career discovery panels on business tomorrow and Thursday, according to Jeff Wood of the OCC. Tomorrow's program is the third of a series of four programs to be conducted during January.

Each program will take place over two days, and will consist of afternoon panel discussions of specific areas followed by a more general discussion in the evening. The next day, panel members will be available for individual interviews arranged beforehand through the OCC, said Wood.

CAREER DISCOVERY PANELS ON BUSINESS Coordinated by Lynn McConnell '77.

"Women & Corporate Life", 104 Bronfman, 3:00 P.M. with Gail Meyers—IBM, Guy Verney '54—Conn. Gen. Life Ins., Glenda Reed—Aetna, and Audrone Misiunas as moderator.

"Entrepreneurship", 105 Bronfman, 3:00 P.M. with Bronson Fargo '51—oil entrepreneur, Penny Corbin—British Maid, Dan Fanning '59—CFI Construction Co. and Ray Bradburd as moderator.

"Business Careers", Dodd House Living Room, 7:30 P.M. with all six of the above panelists moderated by Bill Alden.

Panelists will be available for individual appointments Thursday morning. Make arrangements with OCC staff before or during panel sessions.

The CC Quagmire

The College Council debates tonight proposals for changes in Articles IV through IX of its constitution. The changes are part of a draft of a new constitution which Stuart Ginsberg '77 presented to the council on Jan. 5. The first three articles in the new draft were accepted, with revisions, at the council's meeting on Jan. 14.

While we find nothing objectionable about the council's proposed changes for Articles IV-IX, we see them as being largely inconsequential. While highly useful as bookkeeping measures, they do nothing to augment the council's now somewhat dubious ability to influence important issues and decisions on campus.

Specifically, the proposals in the new draft under discussion tonight would make only two substantive changes in the workings of the council. First, they institute and codify under Article V a system for including all council resolutions, official acts and procedural rules into the council bylaws. In the past, the council has kept no complete record of procedural precedents and resolutions and has had no systematic ability to refer to procedural decisions made by earlier councils. Second, Article VII makes expulsion mandatory. Previously, Article VII has applied only to house representatives and has implied possible, not mandatory, expulsion for three consecutive absences.

The council fails to see the point. In debating these proposed changes it does nothing to expand, specify or clarify its functions under Article VI. The functions of the council as specified under this article of the new draft are:

Section 1: The College Council has the right to initiate disciplinary action against any student campus organization, and may recommend to the Dean reconsideration of any disciplinary action which he has taken against any student group.

Section 2: The Council must approve all budgets proposed by the Finance Committee, organization by organization, before they are put into effect.

Section 3: The Council must approve all decisions by the Nominations and Elections Committee before they are enacted.

Section 4: a. All actions of all Student-Faculty committees, with the exception of the Discipline Committee, are subject to review and comment by the Council. b. All actions of all College Council committees are subject to review, comment and approval by the Council.

Section 5: The Council may concern itself with any matter of importance to the entire campus, with the exception of funding political activities with student activity funds. Political is defined as "primarily organized to directly influence local, state, and federal governments." The foregoing shall in no way be construed as applying to funding speakers brought to the campus.

Section 6: The Council shall conduct all student referendums. The Council must conduct a referendum if a petition signed by one-tenth of the student body calling for a referendum is presented to the Council.

The College Council is the only truly representative assembly of students on campus. In recent years whatever power the council has had stemmed from its role in allocating student activities tax funds to campus organizations. Its potential for input into campus decisions goes far beyond this.

For instance, sections 4 and 5 of Article VI could be used to bolster the council's powers. Currently, council action under section 4 is of a purely passive nature. It consists primarily of CC representatives reporting back to the council on decisions which have already been made in Student-Faculty committees. The council will then sometimes comment on these decisions.

What the council should be striving for, as Harry Kelly noted in a Viewpoint published in the Record on Jan. 11, is input into the initial decisions made by Student-Faculty committees. While Kelly's goal is correct, his own proposal for providing student input, which essentially would have made CC decisions binding on all student representatives to Student-Faculty committees, has been rightly ignored by the council. At worst it is impossible and at best it is impractical.

Nevertheless, another avenue for increased student input does exist. The council should be kept informed on all important issues pending in the Student-Faculty committees by its representatives on those committees. It should then discuss these issues and attempt to reach a consensus on them. The council could then inform all student and faculty representatives on a committee of its position on an important issue before that committee made any decision. The council's opinion would not be binding on student representatives but would provide them with a sorely needed source of student opinion. In this manner student interests would be better organized and better able to confront organized faculty interests in these committees.

The council has a rare opportunity to boldly further student interests tonight. We hope they seize it.

Letter: Defense of Lionel Hampton

To the editor:

Re: Steve Robinson's review:

Admittedly, there were many technical flaws in the performance of Lionel Hampton and his band on Thursday January 6, and criticism of these flaws has obvious importance. However, your obsessive concern with the concert's technical aspects, as displayed in your review of it, indicates to us a narrow, insensitive attitude altogether too common to the Williams cultural environment.

We feel sorry for you that you were disappointed by the band and the music selection, rather than joining in the chanting, singing, applause-in short, the electricity generated by the band and the audience from the early moments of the show.

Why should an artist of Hampton's stature be subjected to such rigid and banal criticisms as yours (enjoying only the gracious complement that his individual performance was "first-rate"), especially when he can provide, with the help of his band and other friends, such a forceful and absolutely vigorous performance. Tell us, Steve, isn't that indescribable gut feeling what "jazz", if so it must be categorized, is all about?

Personally, we really dug belting out "When The Saints Go Marching In" and even "God Bless America". We were awestruck at the amazing tapdance display and overjoyed at Hamp's own attempts at the twist and the bump. We're glad to have participated in such a rich, unforgettable and moving concert, and do not feel that the ACEC need seek out bands to "swing", "rock", or "funk" for you, nor provide clinical demonstrations of technical prowess. Magic similar to that which we witnessed last Thursday night in Chapin Hall will more than suffice.

Respectfully,
David Clement '79

SENIOR RESUME WORKSHOP—OCC Library, Mears House, Tues. Jan. 18, 4:30 P.M.

Council plans to ratify new constitution

Committee commented that "things should go fairly smoothly", since the rewriting of the constitution had been done in a fairly "conservative" fashion.

Mitchell noted, however, that Article 7, regarding absenteeism "may cause some debate," although he feels the clause is essential for the effective operation of the College Council. "The council loses continuity," he said, "if many of its members don't show up."

The By Laws committee anticipates revisions in the last six articles. "There may be some revisions that the council will desire," said Mitchell. Ginsberg also commented that "after watching last Tuesday, I'm sure the articles will be revised," although it's "anybody's guess what the revisions will be."

At last week's meeting, the council accepted the first three articles of the new constitution, after major revisions. These articles, as they now stand, involve few changes except a reapportionment of at-large representatives. Proposals to make the offices of secretary and treasurer elective, to force houses to submit procedures on alternative representatives, and to provide for one year terms were rejected.

Neither Ginsberg or Mitchell of the By-Laws Committee said they expected any problem with acceptance of the new constitution by the student body once it is approved by the council. The student referendum will require two thirds of those voting for passage.

Correction

In the January 11 Record article, "CAP recommends Pasachoff's tenure," Assistant Professor of English Robert Bell should have been listed among those faculty members recommended for tenure by the CAP.

NEWS BRIEFS

ACEC loses $1000 on jazz concert

The ACEC lost an estimated $1000 to $1500 on last Thursday's Charles Mingus concert, second of the scheduled three part Williams Jazz Festival.

Attendance hovered around 550, but dwindled during the performance. Two of Mingus' backup musicians did not arrive until after nine o'clock; Mingus himself almost left the concert when he discovered a problem with an amplifier.

John Dombrowsky, Co-Chairman of the ACEC, said, "Mingus played for perhaps fifty-five minutes and left. He was difficult to deal with."

After a good turnout and estimated $750 loss on the first concert of the series by Lionel Hampton, Dombrowsky said he felt that the series was going as well as can be expected. Dave Sancious will conclude the Festival with a 7:30 Thursday night concert in Chapin Hall.

Athletic Committee plans meeting

The Athletic Committee will hold an open meeting at 7:30 PM Monday January 24. On the agenda are the futures of varsity and club sports, women's and co-ed intramurals, the physical education program and facilities and the New England Small College Athletic Conference rules on post-season athletic participation. Chairman Robert W. Friedrichs has asked that additional items for the agenda be submitted in writing as soon as possible.

Log sponsors foosball tourney

The Log is sponsoring an all-College foosball tournament starting this Friday, January 21. The tournament will select three teams to represent Williams at the first annual Eastern Collegiate Foosball Tournament to be held at Middlebury College January 28, 29, and 30. The tournament at the Log will offer gift certificates for beer as prizes. All entrants must sign up in pairs on sign-up sheets available at the Log and in the Baxter mailroom. Entries will be closed Thursday night when the Log closes. The opening round match-ups will be posted Friday evening at the Log with further rules and deadlines for each round. Questions should be directed to Gene Falk or Dave Forrester.

Mingus, mime perform well

by Steve Robinson

Mime Trent Arterberry split the bill last Thursday evening with the Charles Mingus Quintet in the second concert of the ACEC's annual Jazz Festival. Arterberry appeared for nearly an hour to open the concert and presented routines on a wide range of subjects, each done with grace, sensitivity, and when warranted, humor. The audience responded continuously, and called him back for an encore and two bows. He was certainly a great attraction.

The quintet performed for the second half of the concert. Charles Mingus has been a giant of Jazz bass for more than thirty years. He has played with Louis Armstrong, Charlie Parker, Dizzy Gillespie and many other jazz greats. Mingus has a reputation as an innovator. His music is always energetic with a unique rhythmic style.

The quintet that Mingus brought to Williams had plenty of drive due in large part to fine drumming by long-time Mingus sideman—Dannie Richmond. Ricky Ford, the tenor saxophonist, played masterfully. Constantly working for new ideas, his stunning technique made each of his solos high points of the concert. The trumpet player also displayed great technique, but played dispassionately at times.

It is unfortunate that Mingus played only a single short solo. Although not known for taking extended solos, Mingus was the main attraction of the concert, and it was a disappointment not to have heard more from him.

On the whole, the quintet played very well, maintaining a high energy level and in spite of some difficult performance circumstances, they gave a fine concert.

Many people, however, seemed disappointed and confused by the music that Mingus played. A number left during the concert, some in a real hurry. It is perhaps difficult to enjoy Mingus' music without some appreciation for what has preceded it. Mingus music has been constantly evolving since the be-bop era, around 1945. His music is not audience oriented—it is not for everyone.

Piano recital

Charlotte Hegyi and Jane Jenkins will present a free public recital of piano music for four hands tonight at 8:00 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel.

Hegyi and Jenkins are both local professional performers and piano teachers. Hegyi is a regular member of the Music in the Round chamber music series.

The program includes Schumann's Ball - Scenen, Op 109; Debussy's Petite Suite; Mozart's Sonata in B flat, K. 358; and Bizet's Children's Games.

Sancious ends jazz fest

The Fifth Williams College Jazz Festival comes to a roaring close this Thursday evening as David Sancious brings his quartet to Chapin Hall at 8 p.m. The 22 year old jazz musician is best known as a pianist but performs on guitar and percussion as well. He will be accompanied by a percussionist, a bassist, and a singer.

Sancious began playing keyboards at age 6 in Asbury Park, New Jersey and joined his fellow townsman Bruce Springsteen at age 19, performing with that group on tour and on the first two Springsteen albums Greetings from Asbury Park and The Wild, the Innocent, and the East Street Shuffle, also writing a number of the songs. A jazz performer at heart, he left Springsteen to cut a solo album of his own. Since that time he has played as a featured guest musician on albums by Springsteen, Chick Corea, Stanley Clarke, Jeff Beck and Stevie Wonder.

Tickets are $3 for students and are available in Baxter Hall from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m., in major dining halls during dinner and at the door.

Matmen pinned twice

The Williams wrestling squad, showing signs of improvement after last week's Coast Guard loss, was handed a duel defeat yesterday at RPI, losing 36-12 and 26-18 to WPI and RPI in Troy.

Although the Ephs had held hopes for a better showing with the return of Hal Zendle at 126, three important forfeits at 134, 150, and 158 again cost the team the match.

In the lightweight classes freshman Joe Caresse (118) lost both his matches while Zendle split his with a pin against his RPI opponent. Although Zendle dominated the early part of his WPI match, fatigue resulting from his recent knee injury, allowed his opponent to effectively use a pinning combination to win the match. Following the 134 forfeit, Mark Walsh won two decisions in his 142 class.

Looking strong against WPI after the 150 and 158 forfeits, co-captain Scott Conant pinned his opponent and decisioned his RPI challenger. Freshman Keith Passaretti at 177 did not fare as well as he lost two tough matches.

Winning both his battles, co-captain Jeff May outscored his WPI foe and won his RPI match by forfeit. Heavyweight Colin Hart, who turned in a good performance against tough competition, lost both his contests.

stepping M.I.T. opponent, and finished second and third respectively. The 600-yard run brought quite a vocal response from the crowd to Terry O'Reilly's "neck and neck" battle with Dunlay from M.I.T. O'Reilly turned on their jets in the home stretch but was just outleaned at the wire and his 1:17.8 was only good enough for the runner-up spot.

A 1-2-3 sweep made the 2 mile run the scoring bonanza of the meet for the Ephmen. Distance veterans Joe Kolb and Frank Carr pulled away in the early going and lapped the slower moving runners from M.I.T. enroute to the finish line. Kolb's 9:30.5 victory is just one-half second over the Eastern qualifying standard which he hopes to break this Friday night Union and Middlebury. Carr took the runner-up honors at 9:33.6 followed by freshman Mike Behrman who turned in an excellent third place time of 9:47.7.

Williams closed the scoring gap to 15 points by topping off the meet with a mile relay victory.

The 400 medley relay quint of Don Cameron, Chris Clark, Guy Hoelzer and Dave Amlicke went 1.6 seconds faster than last week and nearly as fast as the Ephs have ever gone before in the regular season.

Todd Piper and Peter Howd both logged their best times of the year in the 200 individual medley, finished second and fourth, while all four breaststrokers also dropped their best clockings of the season. Frogkicker Bryan Volpp turned in a "most outstanding performance," noted Samuelson, busting his personal bests in the 200 breaststroke 200 individual medley and a 400 freestyle relay leg.

Union cagers wear out foul-plagued Ephs,77-71

by Andy O'Donnell

To call it disappointing is to greatly understate the case, both for the 800 Eph faithful who made the extra effort to pack Lasell early Saturday night and the dejected Williams squad that left it a few hours later. But there really isn't a better word for it.

Employing the same pressure tactics that have proved so successful in the past, the Union Dutchmen wore down a game Williams five late in the second half and then capitalized on a foul plagued Eph frontline to post their fourth win in the last five years over Williams, this time by a 77-71 count.

Despite the curious absence of the Schenectady loyal, the contest was a typically emotional, hard fought, nip and tuck affair from beginning to end, with eight points (62-54) comprising the largest margin and the lead either changing hands or being knotted a total of 20 times in the course of 40 minutes.

But if there was a difference in the game it was the performance of Peter Meola, one of the Union co-captains who has a habit of saving his best efforts for Williams. And this year proved no different.

Meola destroyed the Ephs in the same fashion that Springfield's David Pugh had last Wednesday, using his cat-like quickness and leaping ability to continually beat the slower Eph frontcourt to rebounds en route to a game high 22 points. It was Meola's rebound and subsequent three point play that rallied Union from a 50-49 deficit and propelled it into the largest lead of the game, 62-54, with 9:31 left in the contest.

Before that play the Ephs had come back from a 40-37 halftime deficit to forge their largest lead of the night, 47-42, on the strength on a pair of buckets by Mike Tanner and a couple of steals by Andy Straka and Gerry Kelly. But, the backcourt tandem was visibly beginning to tire and when Meola hit a jumper with 7:04 left in the game to put Union on top by six, 66-60, Williams not only looked pooped but found each of its frontcourt players tagged with four fouls.

Williams refused to quit, however, clawing its way back to knot the score at 68 on two Kelly jumpers with 4:59 remaining. Ken Marshall responded with two hoops for the Dutchmen, and then Union coach Bill Scanlon created a clever catch-22 situation for the Ephs: he instructed his team to go into a stall for the final four minutes knowing that Straka was the only Williams player who could foul and not leave the game. Straka (and most everyone else in the place) didn't realize this and with Union controlling the ball Williams couldn't call time out to remedy the matter. When the Ephs finally managed to halt things, Union hit the subsequent foul shots to seal its third win against six losses (including a 67-56 win over Amherst). Williams fell to 2-4.

Kelly and Brad Wolk paced Williams with 17 points each, while Straka chipped in with 15 and Tanner added 12. Union also came from behind in the final minutes to win the JV game, 61-60.

Tonight the Ephs face their biggest challenge of the season when they entertain Yale, 75-49 victors in last year's meeting. At last count Yale was a deceptive 3-8, having played top 20 teams Clemson and Holy Cross, dropping the latter game by just thirteen. Williams travels to Clark Thursday before returning to Lasell Saturday night, to open Little Three play against Amherst.

Johnson, Rooney tally twice

Skaters hold off Holy Cross

by Tim Layden

Looking around the inside of Lansing Chapman Rink during Saturday afternoon's Williams-Holy Cross hockey clash, an interested spectator could find nearly as many Eph skaters limping, hobbling, and nursing a variety of injuries as were on the ice. With some three first-line players sidelined with injuries, prospects for the Ephs' snapping out of a two-game tailspin seemed slim.

While one-time first liners and top scorers Chris Egizi and Dan Sullivan watched from the sidelines, Coach Bill McCormick played musical wings and managed to come up with enough makeshift lines to out-gut the stubborn Crusaders in a deliberate 6-5 see-saw battle. The win was a must for the Ephs, who now stand at 5-4 on the season and 2-4 in Division II.

The teams hopped on a teeter-totter at the start of a second period, which featured ties at two, three, and four, before Bob Duffy's slapper sent Williams into the locker room on top, 5-4 at the end of two periods.

Crusader freshman Frank McCarthy opened the scoring in the period knocking a wrist shot past Weiss, Courtesy of a fine screen by Jay Parker. Bob Caruso's rebound shot sprouted legs and crawled past Costello to put Williams back on top just fourteen seconds later at 3:41.

Holy Cross captain Glenn Graves swiped a Jim Hield pass at 6:00 and scored on a solo effort to knot the game, but Johnson's second goal of the game, on a pretty slapper along the ice and in the corner, gave Williams the lead back, 4-3.

At 11:36 Daley was slapped with a pair of two-minute penalties and the Crusaders converted a tying power play goal 23 seconds into the second. The Eph penalty-killers dumped the puck out of the zone only once and the Crusader pressure eventually paid off as Graves' second goal knotted the count.

With just 2:34 gone in the final period, Rooney gave Weiss and the Purple a little breathing room with a score off the skate of a Crusader defenseman from linemates Zeller and Hield. Williams controlled the puck for the majority of the third period, as the Crusaders managed only two shots on net in the first 12 minutes of the period.

Challenging Weiss with just over two minutes remaining in the game, Holy Cross junior Jim Murphy climaxed 30 seconds of solid goal pressure with a tally to make it a one-goal game. Weiss and company stopped five Holy Cross shots in the final two minutes to seal the win.

Yale bounces women, 63-54

by Nancy Rhein

Traveling to New Haven to open a new season with a new coach against a new opponent, the Williams women's basketball team had an excellent debut, but came up short losing to the Bulldogs 54-63, Saturday.

The Ephwomen, looking strong with a winning combination of veteran stand-outs Maggie O'Brien, Leigh Wilson, and Leslie Milne, and new talent Monica Grady, were stopped by the first period shooting of Yale's 6' center and were unable to overcome Yale's small lead. As a result of the Eph's defensive strategy to force outside shots, Yale was only able to score on the height of their center, with 24 points, and through the use of "garbage shots" from rebounds took an early lead, standing 33-27 at the half.

Playing catch-up for the second half, the Ephwomen were up by one or two but were unable to hold that lead.

The Ephs, utilizing a press and man to man defense outplayed the Bulldogs defensively combining for 30 defensive rebounds with Leigh Wilson grabbing ten for Williams.

Wilson, at forward, turned in an offensive performance similar to that of last year with 13 offensive rebounds and eight points for the day, while Maggie O'Brien rounded out the fourcourt scoring with 15 points. Looking strong in her backcourt debut, frosh Monica Grady went for 16 points and five rebounds. Also tallying for the Ephs were Lisa Capaldini with six and Leslie Milne with four, while Karyn Allison and Robin Ellett had three and two respectively.

Coach Sue Hudson had nothing but praise for the team as she was pleased with their defensive showing. "We really played an excellent game. Leigh was really outstanding on defense while Monica and Maggie played tremendously. The game was fast and really close."

Meeting Skidmore this afternoon at 4 in Lasell, the Ephs expect to secure their first win according to Hudson.

So. Conn. swamps swimmers, 81-32

by Dennis O'Shea

A highly talented and thoroughly tapered Southern Connecticut State swim team reeled out a series of awesome efforts in blowing away the Williams Ephmen, 81-32, in New Haven Saturday. Southern coach Bruce Hutchinson, seeking his first dual meet win over the Ephs in six years, put his squad through two weeks of reduced training to rest them up for the Williams meet, and shaved down several of his top swimmers.

He had them so wound up they might easily "have beaten anybody in the league," according to co-captain Duff Anderson. Despite some excellent swims, the Ephmen managed to deny the Owls only one first place all afternoon.

Carl Samuelson, Eph mentor, noted that it will be interesting to see if a team that peaked so early in their schedule "can sustain themselves through the rest of the season and through the New Englands." Normally it is very difficult to peak effectively twice in a single season.

"We responded very well" to the pressure of Southern's very obvious psyche-up, Samuelson contended. "Several of our performances are going to blow some minds around the league."

Tom Beckett and R. J. Connelly took the Southern Conn. sprinters by surprise, sweeping first and second place honors in the 50-yard freestyle for the Ephs' only win. Connelly touched one-hundredth of a second before Southern's Gary Wolff to earn second, while Beckett posted his best clocking since he broke the freshman record in his first outing in December.

Engineers halt trackmen,64-49

by Frank Carr

The indoor track squad was handed its first loss of the season Saturday by a well balanced M.I.T. contingent. The Engineers programmed a score of 64.0 while the purple cows could only manage a 49 point stampede. The score was a lot closer than coach Dick Farley had expected as the Ephmen outscored M.I.T. 34-25 in the running events. The field events, however, were dominated by the visitors who won five of the six contests.

College record holder Larry Tanner easily outdistanced the field in the 35 lb. weight throw and gave Williams a temporary lead. M.I.T. pulled ahead by taking first and third in the next three events. Breaking up the possible sweeps with second place efforts were: Greg McAleenan (long jump— 21' 3"), Jim DeSimone (shot put— 42' 6") and Jim Rouse (high jump— 6' 2"). Greg Collins donated the final field event point to the Eph cause, springing to third place in the pole vault.

Captain Ken Leinbach turned in an impressive performance by winning the mile and the 1000-yard run for the second straight week. Leinbach followed the early pace of M.I.T. miler Chris Svendsgaard and then steadily pulled away after the half-mile to break the tape at 4:24.1. After a brief rest, the senior captain galloped to victory in the 1000 and dipped under the 2:20 barrier by .4 seconds. The other captain, Dave Bass, returned to action this week and zipped across the tartan surface for second place in the 60-yard dash with a 6.6 clocking.

CEP debates class deadlines

by Chip Buckner

The Committee on Educational Policy postponed any new action concerning the double majors discussion, voted to take a proposal on fifth course registration to the faculty, and decided to elaborate and expand upon a list of "paternalisms."

Each year the CEP reviews all the course offerings and major requirements for each department. Because of the time this will take, Chairman George R. Goethals suggested they wait until March or April before returning to the double majors question.

The fifth course proposal deals with the timing of registration. Currently students sign-up for fifth courses along with their other four classes. The change would require students wanting to take an extra course to obtain verbal permission from the instructor within the first 2½ weeks, and then formally register during the sixth week of classes.

Proponents claim the change will reduce the paperwork necessary when students register for, and then drop fifth courses. Opponents feel this procedure might make getting into fifth course more difficult.

Most of the meeting consisted of further discussion of the "educational paternalisms" suggested by Gordon Winston at the last meeting. Some, he claimed, protected the student from himself, while others just did not make sense.

Dean Peter Berek attended this meeting to attempt to explain and clarify some of the regulations.

The first custom Berek shattered was the "rule" that does not allow professors to return final exams. "That's foolish," Berek said. Earlier Winston argued that retaining the exam, and giving the student only the grade made it appear that the letter was more important than the content.

Dean Francis Oakley noted that professors might feel it necessary to write more extensive comments, which though a good thing, would slow the reporting of grades to the registrar. The committee unanimously recommended that students be allowed to collect exams, and that professors continue with their "cryptic comments" to be explained to the students. The "late-paper rule" later retitled the "work completed by the end of classes rule" requires, as the name implies that all papers be turned in by the last day of classes. Members argued that this meant people studying for exams had 13½ weeks for a course, and that courses with papers lasted only 12 weeks. The committee decided it needed more time to formulate a proposal, but the consensus clearly indicated that in the case of classes with a paper and no final exam, a

Council questions role in campus community

The College Council discussed its role in the campus community Tuesday night and the possibility of changing that role and approved two more articles of the proposed constitution.

In later discussion on the constitution, the council accepted an amendment from Cliff Mitchell to make all meetings of student committees and subcommittees open to the college community "except when the committee is discussing a particular individual or individuals."

The council passed Articles IV and V, dealing with council meetings and by laws, with Mitchell's amendment. However, members voted to suspend discussion of Article VI, which deals with council functions, until its next meeting, when further discussion on possible changes in the role of the council will resume.

The council had planned to spend the bulk of Tuesday's meeting on the remaining articles of the proposed constitution. However, several representatives voiced dissatisfaction with the development of the tentative draft, which vice-president Randy Sturges called "basically the old constitution reworked." Bob Carter stated the need for "a revision of the whole idea of the council," and added, "I'm not sure the present process can do this." The council accepted a motion from Cath Carpenter to temporarily postpone the business at hand for an informal discussion along these lines.

Several council members expressed dissatisfaction with the effectiveness of the present council. Don Toumey commented, "the only real important thing we do is financing student organizations." Wit McKay voiced a need for parity of students and faculty on student-faculty committees. Tom Ebling proposed that the council establish several independent student committees, with activities paralleling those of student-faculty committees.

Council President Steve Piltch, reported that he had discussed the issue of increasing student power with President Chandler. According to Piltch, Chandler suggested that the council meet regularly with the faculty Steering Committee, which Piltch called "the most powerful faculty committee in the school," in order to express student viewpoints.

Carpenter suggested that the council needs to become a more effective voice of student opinion, and urged representatives to actively seek out the issues that most concern the student body.

Committee discusses house maintenance tax

The Housing Committee discussed on Wednesday night a proposal to distribute all maintenance tax revenue among residential houses instead of the present two-thirds, with one third retained by the College.

At present, each student is assessed a house maintenance tax of $15 per semester. $10 is immediately turned over to each house on a per capita basis to be used as the house sees fit. The remaining $5 of the tax is pooled and split into 15 equal parts, one for each house on campus. The College uses this money to pay damages and returns to each house whatever is left in its "account" at the beginning of the next semester.

James Barickman, chairman of the Housing Committee and president of Dennett House, proposed last week that the $5 per student held by the College also be allocated among the houses on a proportional basis. The present system benefits smaller houses, like Bryant and Fort Hoosac, at the expense of the larger houses.

Those in favor of this proposal claim that the amount spent on house maintenance is directly related to the size of the house. Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad said that evidence supporting this claim will be presented by Randy Sturges at Monday's College Council meeting, though this contradicts a finding made in 1974 by that year's Housing Committee that maintenance expenditures are essentially independent of the number of people affiliated with a given house.

Another proposal, which would complement Barickman's, would have damages to the main corridor, dining hall, and piano lounges at Mission Park paid for by College Building and Grounds funds, rather than by maintenance tax revenue from Mission Park houses. Their presidents and Roosenraad agreed that the easy access to these areas by any members of the College community preclude effective policing against damage.

Board and committees confront College issues

The Board of Trustees and nine trustee committees are meeting this weekend to make tenure decisions and to discuss tuition and the College budget, new construction of College facilities, and other College issues, according to College Treasurer Francis H. Dewey III.

The Trustee Committee on Campus Life met last night with members of the College Council and today with the Committee on Undergraduate Life to discuss student issues, he added.

tenure decisions

The trustee Committee on Instruction and Degrees is meeting today to recommend appointments of faculty members to tenured positions, approve other appointments, and determine salaries, according to Dewey. The committee will also select commencement speakers and award honorary degrees.

The committee will probably not recommend any fundamental changes in the tenure decision process, commented Dean of the Faculty Francis Oakley, adding that he felt the issue was too important and complex to be acted upon without lengthy discussion among trustees, faculty and students.

Faculty favorably recommended to the committee for tenure by the faculty Committee on Appointments and Promotions include Robert Bell (English), Lynda Bundtzen (English), Lee Drickamer (biology), Michael Katz (Russian), Gary Jacobsohn (political science), Jay Pasachoff (astronomy), and Mark Taylor (religion).

The Board of Trustees will make the final appointments to tenured positions. Any disputes can be appealed to the Panel of Six, a faculty board which examines tenure problems.

tuition hike

The Budget and Financial Planning Committee of the Board of Trustees is meeting today to discuss the financial position of the College, budgets, and a possible increase in tuition, said Dewey.

According to Dewey, a tuition increase is probable. A ten per cent increase in the price of heating oil coupled with an unexpected increase in fuel consumption of more than five per cent is one factor making the tuition increase likely, he said. "Until four years ago, tuition was raised every other year; now it is raised annually," commented Dewey.

The committee will also review the updated 1976-77 budget and the projected budget for 1977-78, he said.

CC and CUL

The Trustee Committee on Campus Life met with members of the College Council last night and the Committee on Undergraduate Life this afternoon to discuss issues of "special interest" to the student body.

According to Dean of the College Peter Berek, the Thursday night meeting with the College Council, is an annual, student-planned affair. The council chooses the issues which are discussed.

An agenda prepared by Steve Piltch, CC President, included four major areas of discussion. This year's budget was reviewed, along with the whole budgeting procedure. As in the other areas, emphasis was placed on

Park powers clash in winter games

by Jim Cohen

All the glamor, pomp, and pagentry of Innsbruck, Sapporo and Grenoble have been painstakingly recreated this weekend for the first Mission Park Winter Olympic Games.

The contest between park powers Armstrong House, Dennett House and Pratt House enters its second and final day tomorrow with teams squaring off in such diverse sports as snow football, cross-country running, downhill skiing and the ever-popular spink.

The first Mission Park Winter Olympic Games began today. The game spink, shown above, was included in the events. (photo by Davis)

All events will be staged in the Mission Park—Cole Field region. Armstrong House President Peter Friesen promised, "We will have final tabulations to see which house wins. This is inconsistent with the Olympic spirit, but consistent with the rivalries between houses."

Opening ceremonies this afternoon, replete with a parade, flag-raising and the lighting of the Olympic torch by President John W. Chandler, were followed by broomball; speed-skating; the 60-yard dash and bicycle racing across ice; tray-jumping, and the foot slalom.

Friesen, whose Armstrong House team uses the tune from the movie "Patton" as its anthem, said ribbons would be awarded to the winners of each event, followed by the customary flag-raising and anthem-singing. Friesen sees this gala competition as a "prelude to Winter Carnival." "I would like to see it expand school-wide. It would be a spectacle," he predicted.

The official schedule for tomorrow shows snow football beginning at 9:30, followed by the remaining events at 1:30. Downhill skiing will take place on the slopes leading to the Mission Park dining room, with obstacles added to challenge skiers.

Spink, the "finale" of the Olympics, will take place on the spink rink behind Armstrong House. This brutal sport, imported from Middlebury College, is played on a patch of ice approximately 20 feet by 30 feet. Skateless players attempt to score goals using hockey sticks and a taped sock as the puck. "There are few rules, except for high sticking," Friesen explained.

Armstrong, a perennial spink power, is expected to dominate this event. Informed sources give Pratt the edge in the downhill events and call the teams even in snow football.

The Olympic games, planned by the house presidents and social chairpersons of the three houses, are open to spectators free of charge.

Letters: Evaluating quality

course guide

To the editor:

I wish to clarify several points concerning my beliefs about the Student Course Guide. I believe that both The Record and its readership have been misinformed. I disagree most strongly with the statement, attributed to me in your issue of January 11, that "obviously students cannot accurately judge the quality of teaching."

That students cannot accurately judge the quality of teaching is neither obvious, nor true. On the contrary, students are best qualified to make certain judgments about the quality of teaching at their college. The students are the object of the teaching. The effect of teaching, its most important quality, is reflected by the students. The students certainly know if a teacher has excited them into further study of a subject or unfortunately, if a teacher has been so ineffective as to foster the students disinterest. The students know if readings, lectures or labs are particularly weak or strong. No one in the college community can more accurately judge these aspects of teaching quality.

The Student Course Guide Committee believes that this knowledge can serve the entire campus. The conception of the Student Course Guide is based upon the belief that the students can make careful and accurate judgments on aspects of course material and teaching quality at Williams, that the responsible publication of opinions can educate the students as well as the faculty about the strengths and weaknesses of their college, and that this information, if attended correctly, will improve the college and the student's ability to take advantage of their school. The mission is ambitious. Its success, like all such tasks, will be a measure of the positive attention it receives. We will soon see if the students and faculty are receptive to our constructive attempts.

Gonga Din

Kevin O'Rourke stood at the edge of the Jesup Hall stage as the crowd slowly began to file out of the auditorium. "I hope everybody forgets tonight as quickly as possible," he quipped. "After all, I've got a career to think about."

Nattily attired in tuxedo jacket, light brown courdoroys, and L.L. Bean fishing boots complemented by a pink shirt and a midget bow-tie, O'Rourke was an appropriately inappropriate reincarnation of wit itself Wednesday night as he MC'ed the first annual Williams College edition of The Gong Show.

Part variety contest, part locker room vaudeville show, this was one of those events that took a Winter Study mentality to originate and a house like Carter to pull off. With Bob Kraus serving as behind the scenes manager, the boys from Carter culled 16 acts from Monday night's tryouts and primed them for the finals with ample help from the Utica Club.

They also convinced three faculty members to lower their eyebrows for an hour and serve as guest judges for the affair. Gordon "GO-GO" Winston ably filled in for an inexplicably absent Paul Newman, Charles "Call me Chuck" (Frenchie) Fuqua anchored the middle of the table with a quick and decisive hand on the gong, while the King of Gong himself, Carl "Slippery" Samuelson, rounded out the trio, demonstrating a curious reluctance to gong any act (onstage or not) with a female in it.

The mayhem began with Dick Clark ("a real victim of circumcision", according to O'Rourke) introducing his newest discovery—Space Rock and his Space Rockers—performing their soon to be legendary hit "Dog Eat Dog". Coach Sam halted their climb up the charts with a gong just 35 seconds into the show. Although the producers guaranteed each act at least 30 seconds, Sam stood by his decision. "I thought it was rather obscene," he explained.

The early pacesetter was Petri (as in Rob) Lemon Jello and the Velvetones, a rather greasy barbershop quartet from Lehman that wowed the crowd with some tight harmony and appropriately inane lyrics. Fuqua and Winston awarded the group 8's, but Sam, went all the way, giving the bunch a 10 in large part due to his fascination with Peter, the group's bass singer. "Anyone who can take it from that depth has gotta get a 10," said Sam.

The Masked Dancer, Farah Fawcett ("she forgot to shave her legs," complained Fuqua) and A Lady Juggler all failed to impress ("I thought she had a lot of balls, though," Sam remarked about the latter. "She could have taken her clothes off faster," replied Fuqua,) and the stage was set for The Amazing World of Oriental Dart Throwing.

This bit was totally bizarre, with some guy from the cover of Pacific Overtures re-enacting the revenge of Cato on Inspector Clousseau as he flung darts at a 6 by 12 foot board and practiced his jujitsu at the same time. For its originality, insanity, and in large part out of gratitude for escaping injury, the act received a score of 23.

Things became close during the next few minutes when John Rainey and The Legionnaires Disease surged into the lead with an extremely clever ode to Gerry Ford. But it was up to the last act, Big Ross The Freshman, to pull off a stunning (and somewhat dubious) upset.

Getting it all together in his final imitation of the evening, The Big Guy wowed the crowd with his version of Emmanuelle's welcome to her husband. For his efforts Big Ross received a check for $21.87 ($2.10 more than $19.77 O'Rourke explained.) An appropriate ending for an appropriate Winter Study evening.

NEWS BRIEFS

Cold weather ups heating costs

The present extremely cold weather has added more than $10,000 to College heating costs, said Director of Physical Plant Peter Welanetz.

This winter has now been colder than last year by 510 degree-days, a 15 per cent increase. Due to successful conservation measures, said Welanetz, this has only led to an increase of 31,837 gallons in fuel used, a 5.7 per cent jump. Some outlying buildings, such as Tyler House, are heated by their own plants, whose costs have increased approximately the same rate, he said.

The heating problem was aggravated by the "very cold" fall we had this year, he said, which was 24 per cent colder in degree-days than last year.

Costs of snowplowing are not extremely high so far, according to Welanetz, because of the small amount of plowing needed before Christmas. "Snowplowing to date is not a significant problem," he said.

The College was prepared for an increase in oil prices, he said, but the large increase in price together with unexpectedly high consumption have created some problems. According to Welanetz, Buildings and Grounds is being "as careful as possible" to keep energy use down, and unless the present cold weather persists until spring, there will be "no significant variance from the budget."

Athletic Committee plans meeting

The Athletic Committee will hold an open meeting this Monday, January 24 at 7:30 p.m. in the Dodd House living room, committee chairman Robert W. Friedrichs announced. The committee "seeks to be informative and to discuss policy issues," Friedrichs said.

Currently on the agenda for the open meeting are the plans for athletic facility expansion, college and conference rules on post-season competition, priorities for the expansion of the athletic program and the development of women's intramurals. Suggestions for further items should be submitted to Friedrich's in his Stetson Hall mail box as soon as possible.

Nine trustee committees meet this weekend changes from last year and before. The new council constitution, which is still not completely ratified, was another topic of discussion.

The final two areas discussed, according to Piltch, were the Course Guide and student power. Council members described the progress of the Course Guide thus far and the changes that have been made to avoid the problems of last year's guide. In discussing student power council members noted several areas in which they felt students should have greater input including the tenure process.

The CUL meeting with the trustees, is not an annual event. It was conducted this year primarily to discuss that committee's report on the residential house system, according to Berek.

future construction

The Board of Trustees will discuss future construction this weekend, reviewing Phase One of Chapin Hall, the renovation of its basement into practice rooms, and Phase Two, the addition on the hall's east side. In addition, the trustees will consider new facilities for art and physical education.

According to Dewey '41, sufficient funds for the Chapin annex have not yet been obtained. The Capital Fund for the Seventies drive supplies the capital for construction but, because of the lethargic economy, donations have arrived slowly, said Dewey. The first priority is the construction of the Chapin practice rooms, and Phase Two may require up to two million dollars.

The trustees will also review the design of the Chapin addition. With the approval of the trustees, the architects will draft working drawings which contain technical details needed for actual construction.

The trustees will consider two further renovations of the campus, including improvements of the basketball court and the swimming pool in Lasell Gymnasium. The expansion of the gym may extend south of the present gym and squash courts, in the vicinity of Drummond's Cleaners. The trustees will also discuss improving or replacing the pool.

A new art facility adjoining Lawrence Hall is also under consideration. The trustees will discuss where to situate the addition and the problem of its accessibility to the handicapped. Architects for the Physical Education and Art facilities will be interviewed this weekend in order to outline needs and possibilities. One architect may be used for both projects, or two for the two buildings.

The trustees will also review Mt. Hope Farm and its future, according to the Director of Physical Plant Peter P. Welanetz. Poor soil for sewage disposal has limited the farm's potential. The study will include the Kellogg Plan, by which a group of alumni would purchase residential lots and donate the remaining property to a land trust, and the future of the Elm Tree House.

Fincom to monitor SAT funds

The Finance Committee will monitor the expenditures of campus organizations receiving Student Activities Tax funds for conformity with Committee guidelines, according to College Council Treasurer Clarence Otis. Otis asked that executives of organizations being monitored should pick up copies of The Guidelines of the 1976-77 Student Activities Committee from him.

Panel attempts to define pressures and problems

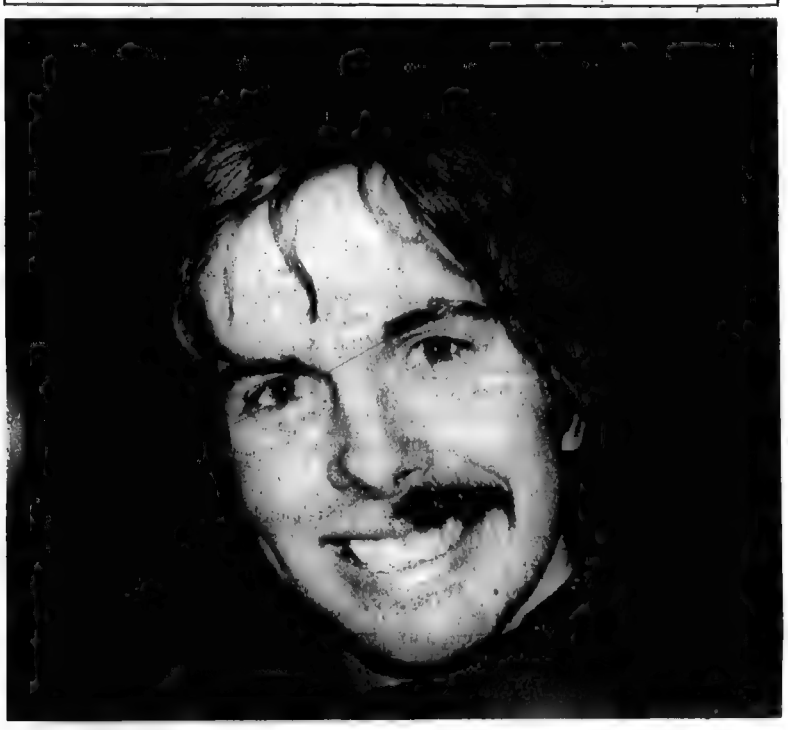
Students had a lot to say at the informal discussion of the intricacies of life at Williams College. The idea for Now the Pressure is Off, Let's Talk About What the Pressures Are came from a few students who see a need for more open and organized communication and interaction between students on their problems at the college.

Cynthia Clark and Irving Rowley organized the discussion as an attempt to answer some of the questions raised by an article in Backtalk. Backtalk, WBSU and Gargoyle Society sponsored the event, which took place in the Dodd House living room last Tuesday night.

They interviewed Professors of Psychology Andrew Crider, George Goethals and Dennis Klos. The professors emphasized that the source of many of the difficulties at Williams may be within the individual himself rather than with college institutions.

One professor said he believed that the focus of the discussion could rightly be on "personal attitudes; problems, people created for themselves."

Various themes were developed, following the underlying perception that a lot of things may be wrong at Williams. Discussion focused on the problem of competition between students, how healthy or unhealthy the situation is, and whether the college perpetuates such an atmosphere or the students themselves are responsible for it.



"... people have sexual hangups ..."

Many of the participants seem to feel that their classmates are closed and socially inhibited. One student said that "poeple really have a lot of sexual hang-ups," that Williams is "cliquesville" and a "fragmented place for its size." Another said that "most people deal with other people on a very superficial level" and that "nothing very serious is ever generated, even among friends."

Others expressed dissatisfaction with the classroom situation—too many students are reluctant to commit themselves in class and to contribute to discussion by expressing their views.

The discussion reached several conclusions but found no answers. Participants acknowledged an overly competitive atmosphere, attitudes of superiority, over-conformity and vague fears of vulnerability. The question also arose as to whether Williams should admit "well-rounded" students at the expense of a well-rounded student body.

There was a general consensus about the need for more such discussions in the future. According to Clarke, a demonstrated interest and enthusiasm will insure them.

The annual Spencer-Brooks Scavenger Hunt is this Sunday night. Last year, Dave Bennett was one of many who went half-shorn to give his team big points.

Scavengers hunt Sunday

What do a live ant, a Girl Scout in uniform, a fly swatter and a Playboy in braille all have in common? They were items sought by rival teams in last year's Spencer-Brooks scavenger hunt and 3-d trivia contest. High points were also awarded for a streaking co-ed couple and a Williams student with a freshly shaven head.

This Sunday, January 23, is the date of the 3rd annual chaotic and fun-filled event. The members of Spencer-Brooks House promise to ask for obscure and bizarre items which will tantalize even the most imaginative contestants.

The contest will run from 8 to 12 p.m., with registration in the Spencer living room at 7:30. According to participants in last year's contest, the frenzy increases until midnight when contestants lose their inhibitions and go to any lengths to win points. Items are reviewed by judges in the Spencer living room, which overflows with interesting displays and assorted paraphernalia.

The entry fee is $3.00 per team, and there is now no limit to team size. David Jacquez, one of the organizers, said that prizes will be awarded to the two teams with the most points, and that freshmen are especially encouraged to participate.

Lists including hunt items and contest rules will be distributed Sunday night.

Aruba offers sun, fun

by Eric Sundin

Are you frigid? Then get aroused in Aruba! Or so claim the numerous posters on campus. The first of its kind at Williams, Prospect Houses "Aruba Night", to occur January 28, will be an extraordinarily unique sort of party. The high price of the tickets ($10 a head) sold to fund Aruba Night enables Prospect House to present such an expensive extravaganza.

A student couple, selected at random from a list of the partygoers, will be chauffered that same night to Hartford, Connecticut, where they will be flown to Aruba, a small Caribbean island, for four days and three nights.

The idea for Aruba Night came from a party held at the University of Virginia last year, according to Prospect's Peter Gloo '78 and Tom Kondel '78. "We don't expect to make a profit on the party or sell the 500 tickets. With 170-300 people attending we might break even. But we feel that it is worth the gamble, since this is a new sort of exotic entertainment for the campus." The trip itself will cost the house over $1600; in addition, $200 to $500 will be given to each of the two winners as spending money. The amount will obviously vary on the number attending the party and the availability of funds. "We want to make sure that even the non-winners enjoy themselves. We're not only selling our tickets on the fantasy of winning the trip but also on the reality of a good party", added Kondel.

Indeed, the party itself will be unique, as the Mission Park dining hall will be heated beforehand to tropical temperatures; there will be elaborate lighting, exotic plants, drinks, leis; Hawaiian dress is required. Aside from the open bar and dancing, the real attraction of the party undoubtedly will be the buzzing conversation of the possible realization of everyone's fantasy. Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad will already have drawn the winning couple's ticket to confirm the flight reservations,but only he will know the result. The winning ticket will be taped to the bottom of the ticket bin, and the remaining tickets will be selected throughout the evening. The last 25 names drawn will be announced over the loud speaker creating an almost unbearable Miss Universe-type of suspense. But it's either all or nothing, as there are no runner-up prizes.

Area Arts Council offers life drawing for studio art tyros

The Northern Berkshire Council of the Arts will offer an eight week studio course in life drawing taught by Joel Rudnick. Rudnick is a figurative sculptor who considers himself "self-taught" but has had extensive training at the Art Students League, the Brooklyn Museum and the N.Y. National Academy. He has shown his work in many New York galleries and was the recipient of the Elizabeth T. Greenshield Foundation Grant in Canada. Rudnick is presently sculptor-in-residence at Hoosick Community Resources Corporation at the Windsor Mill.

The studio course is for those with minimum drawing experience and for those more advanced students who have difficulty in drawing the figure. Major emphasis will be on a simple, structural approach to the figure which does not rely on previous drawing ability but allows early progress in difficult areas such as proportion and foreshortening. Gesture drawing, contour drawing, the use of value and other approaches of use to the artist in dealing with the human figure will be explored.

Students are asked to supply a quality drawing pad, pencils, charcoal and kneaded eraser. The class will meet on Wednesday evenings from 7 to 9 P.M. or on Saturday mornings from 10 to 12 A.M. Further information available at the Council office in North Adams.

AUDITIONS

Actors are needed for a student production of "Swellfoot's Tears", a new play by Leon Katz which will be directed by Jon Stolzberg, '79. Parts are available for 10 actors, men and women. An Artistic Director is also needed to aid in the design and construction of sets and costumes. Auditions will be conducted on Tuesday and Wednesday nights at 7 in the basement of Greylock. For scripts or more information contact Jon Stolzberg, S.U. Box 1953, telephone 8-8238.

PETER TAKACS will give a free public piano recital as the final one of the Young Artists Series.

Students write, produce musical

by John Libertine

What started out as a Winter Study Project might turn out to be the start of something big for Martha Williamson '77 and Marc Lichtman '78. They are writing and producing their own musical, Presently Untitled and if all goes well, it could be the start of successful careers for both of them.

Although the guidelines for the project simply called for a finished script and score, both authors have decided to produce the show and rehearsals are already underway.

Both writers see this musical as a starting point for future work. "I am definitely going to follow this up after school," said Williamson. "I enjoy directing, working with people, and actually creating something. I enjoy the pressure."

The authors have made every effort to integrate the actual script with the music. The music will serve to reinforce the theme of the play and will reflect the natures of the characters.

The music is complex. Lichtman said that the result will perhaps be reminiscent of Stephan Schwartz and Stephen Sondheim, but that his score will be an original mixture of types. Lichtman also noted that he hopes for witty dialogue comparable to Gilbert and Sullivan.

Williamson said that the work is very hard but rewarding. The Winter Study deadline can allow for no slacking off. "It is very difficult to get up in the morning and say, 'Today, I'm going to write four pages of hysterically funny script,' but it's exciting."

Writing and directing are not entirely new to Williamson. She has always written pieces for her own enjoyment, and her fondest wish since her freshman year had been to direct the Freshman Revue which she did this year. If the success of this year's Revue is any indication, Presently Untitled promises to be an interesting, worthwhile, and successful experience.

One of the many challenges faced by any director is working with a cast of neophytes. Many members of Williamson's cast have never been in shows before. As a director, she must work with them, and cultivate their talents. "I know they're going to be good. It's going to be interesting to see what happens."

Williamson prefers not to divulge the entire plot of the show, but explains that basically it is a story about social life in the art world. "It concerns the reactions of critics, patrons, and gallery owners when a newcomer enters their world and changes the scene," Williamson elaborates it. "The play is a commentary on what one is supposed to like as opposed to what one wants to like."

Pianist Takacs appears last in young artist concert series

This season's Young Artist's series will come to a close Sunday at 8:30 p.m. in Thompson Chapel as Peter Takacs performs his selection of solo piano music.

Peter Takacs was born in Bucharest, Romania in 1946 and came to the United States with his family in 1962. His musical studies, which had been interrupted during the difficult period of emigration, were resumed with a full four-year scholarship to Northwestern University, a performing arts fellowship to the University of Illinois, and a federal grant to the Peabody Conservatory of Music, where he completed his artistic training working with the distinguished American pianist and conductor Leon Fleisher. In August, 1973, Takacs was named winner of the first prize in the University of Maryland International Piano Competition.

Takacs has concertized widely in the United States and Europe, receiving enthusiastic acclaim from critics and audiences alike. Wrote one critic: "Takacs combines a flawless technical skill with self-assurance to produce an electric kind of bravura performance." The Baltimore Sun said: "Peter Takacs is a stellar representative of the best of today's younger generation of keyboard artists. In its totality, his was a performance fresh and youthful, representing musicmaking of the highest order of intelligence and conviction." He is currently on the music faculty of Oberlin College.

In addition to the twenty-four Chopin Preludes, Opus 28, Takacs will play Beethoven's Sechs Bagatellen, Opus 126, Mendelssohn's Fantasy in F sharp Minor, Opus 28, and Stravinsky's Trois Mouvements de Petrouchka.

Pirandello play continues at AMT today

Luigi Pirandello's one act play, "The Man with the Flower in his Mouth" will continue in performance at the studio theater of the AMT this afternoon and tomorrow evening at 8 pm. The play takes place in a seedy sidewalk cafe in Rome and involves two characters who are played by Peter Bergethon and Bob Gregory. Cap and Bells president Jamie Spraigins will direct the piece. Tickets are available in the Cap and Bells office.

Pirandello was Italy's leading playwright in the 1920's and is considered today to be one of the foremost early experimenters in what was to become modern theater. His major work, Six characters in Search of an Author, was performed here too.

Ragnell proves brilliant in second jazz concert

by Valerie Sarantos

Baggy pants and a shy bespectacled smile greeted all those who attended last Monday night's second concert of the Young Artists Series, as Andrew Rangell made his entrance into Thompson Chapel. After ritualistically dusting off the piano keyboard and wiping his hands with a white cloth, the young pianist sat on the bench for several moments of deep meditation before commencing what would prove to be a truly brilliant and sensitive performance of exclusively Beethoven works.

From the first brooding note of Beethoven's Sonata in D Major, Op. 28, to the last of Variations of a Theme of A. Diabelli, Op. 120, Rangell consistently displayed dazzling technical wizardry and interpretive intensity. He coaxed the softest pianissimos and loudest fortissimos without once sacrificing his rich, strong tone which proved to be the most striking aspect of his performance.

Never once out of control, the confident pianist was a pleasure to watch as well as to hear. He was totally relaxed, communicating with the music, and his hands were so quiet that he could have performed most of the concert with a quarter resting on the back of his hand. Only at the end of a piece did he throw up his hands exultantly.

The highlight of the concert came in the second half with the Diabelli Variations, where Rangell out-did himself in every direction. It was exciting throughout, from the softest quivering trills to the loudest massive chords; his fingers always digging into, never hitting, the keys for the best tone and expression possible. For his much-appreciated encore, Rangell played an amusing jazzy little piece by 30's and 40's composer Kurt Weill.

It happened one night:

Poets, porn, and the pernicious weed

Sunday night in Bonn there's schnapps in Kneipes in Dallas prayers in the round in Bangor barroom brawling in Chile the junta's crowned.
But Sunday night in Williamstown
There's many a do or dare,
And here deciding where to go
Are Hyde and Zeke and Cher.
Hyde: So, what d'you want to do?
Zeke: Dunno, what d'you want to do?
Cher: Huh?

There's poetry reading in Baxter Hall,
There's porno flickin' too,
They're 'specteratin' in Hervey's spittoons,
A night for pitchin' woo!

Hyde and Zeke had signed up Cher
T'go chawin' for Free U.
"Terbacker's not my snuff," she said,
"But I'll go anyhoo."

The remaining two of the three
Went to hear the poetry.
Meanwhile . . .

The Boston Globe and Sanka cans
Lay sprawled on Mission's floors,
Where Cher and a dozen dixie boys
Chew-talk possum, hay, and whores.

While the other guys spat clean and far
With a holler and a hoot,
Cher, who played the J.V. hoops,
Would dribble before she'd shoot.
Meanwhile . . .
and we mean
Meanwhile . . .

The Rathskellar's laid back
Only a mike stands,
Still, sensitive, without ire.
Lightslow
Versenyi's charged and cryptic quietude
Have taken seats in every row.
A few lie listening on the floor,
Their heads nestling deeper into down parkas
Their shirts hiked up as if
To catch some color from the lighted stage.
They try but in vanity.

The last nylon notes
Wiffle wantonly from Raab's guitar.
Now only a clue of clacking pool balls
Steals into the skeller cache.

The themes:
"Hitchhiking through the cornfields of Illinois . . ."
"I was trying to bring on the most complete depression possible . . ."
"An Ad in the Times . . ."
"An Andrew Wyeth Painting . . ."
"An Afro American Sonnet . . ."
"Susan . . . . . "

And 120 backbones eased into Poetry recited by the voices
Which first whispered it.

Spoken melodies
Each a single pure scoop
Tight and whole
Distinctly flavored poems
Read in black and white.
The punctuating silences
Lingered,
With irony and hilarity,
Solemnity, love, and bitterness,
Flavoring the air.

It was 40 minutes before the lights came up,
Yet 40 minutes after that before all had gone,
Long after the last bottle of white chablis
Rocked empty on the counter.
(In tribute to the Whole Earth, the processed cheddar was left half-full in the can.)

The time has come, the audience said,
To talk of ill and well
Of aesthetic evaluation
And the next showing of Emmanuelle.

To the Snack Bar wandered Hyde and Zeke
To dunk their fries in Sprite
Hoping that a trend would set
In Baxter Hall that night.

Hyde and Zeke set out at ten
To meet up with Cher in Bronfman.
(Guess who didn't get an invite To read their poems that Sunday night?)

Despite the swellings of the crowd,
Despite the frumious Bandersnatch,
They coupled (tripled?) by the door
Waiting for Pratt to spring the hatch.

Watching the Jaws of Emmanuelle
Who would let no man boss her,
Feeling her rhythms bade them retell
Of Williams' chawers and Chaucers.

(The picture blurs. The vorpel sword goes snicker-snack. Flashback to sanka cans and nylon notes).

Loves remembered on rainy broken-hearted nights in rooms that smelled of lonely men; and of the blood red dust that makes for the bitterness of Georgian roads . . .

What was that ya said?

And it was here I watched your fingers turn blue . . .

I was sayin' Old Blue was the best damned yellow tooth hound dog what ever fetched a field of quail!

At dusk a ride hitched through row upon row of ripening corn . . .

Some of it I pickt cuz they looks good, some of 'em taste good, and o' courz some waz just thar!

The rhythm of their sway is timeless, over and over under the compelling sun they sink their roots quiescent in ignorance of fall . . . then, I was younger and just learning . . .

Ya gotta work up the justice first!

My mother knew his mother. They were friends. I used to play with him as they visited . . .

Hell, now I can shoot it and make a bullseye at 15 feet!

You know you never taught me the blues, only to play the banjo. Now I have learned both . . .

I'm Emanuelle—I can show you how to do both.

The 'ongest ever was 21 foot. Sheeeeeeeeit! What a muckin' spttttttttt!

Abhorrence that had no shape . . . Put a layer of white skin out to harden . . . Small, private, proud . . . Your silent inner steel . . .

He took the whole plug thing and didn't spit much neither!

And love has exuded from my body . . . leaving me numb . . .

Whatever you do, don't swallow it!

Beings meet beings . . .

Hey, how doz Big Red taste? . . . Don'tcha remembar that waz the first one weeez passed around!

That breath before the fuzzyhood of expectation . . .

I wuz 'specting lump Kadidle to come tonite!

Straight and narrow liquidly workings begin softly, findings: the coming of night . . .

Lump kin play tunes that'd send shivers up yar spine!

They tingle my tender places . . . Smoothly sliding in and out of my innermost depths, seeking my sacred spots and soaring me on to misty daydreams of malactic malaxation

Why the hell are you guys taking notes in here?

We're writing for the Record.

On the Joys of a Woman?

No, on poesy and tobacco chewing.

Must be a couple of loons from Lehman.

He shot it six foot, and the juice wuz still on his lip when it hit the ground!

Seeding the way home with uneasiness . . . This is what it means to ask forgiveness . . .

That thar farmar was more onery than a long tailed cat in a room full 'a rockin' chairs!

Men bending together to the breeze . . . no strings to tie them down . . . time and money to live it up any chance they get . . .

Hey, d'you see Emmanuelle tonite? Well what d'you think?

Ambiguous, recalcitrant, and bottomless . . .

majority favored giving the professor the option of extending the deadline.

The "E-deficiency rule" states that no student with a failing average may be admitted to the final. This means, as a corollary, anyone passing the final must receive a passing grade for the course. The rationale is that anyone who has totally failed a course should spend his time on his other courses, rather than waste it on his fourth.

Winston argued two points: if the student has no hope of passing, it should be his decision not to waste his time, not the professor's, and that this precluded a Herculean effort by the student who might be able to pass if he really worked during the reading period.

At its last meeting the CEP felt the rule sounded very cut and dried, but Dean Berek inserted an "at the instructor's discretion" clause. One professor wondered if he wanted the responsibility for deciding whether to admit students to the final. The Committee will continue deliberation in coming weeks.

The "eight-semester rule," Berek said, dated from a time when Williams was "a rich man's school" and students "kind of liked it here" and were happy to "stay as long as needed to pass enough courses . . ." Since the cost of college is much greater than the tuition, it cost the College to keep these people around. Now the College gives each student eight semesters to pass, and then requests that they leave to make room for somebody else.

The enforced reading period, professors felt, produced well organized essays. Winston wondered if not enforcing a reading period might teach students that it was important to allocate time for thinking. Oakley countered that enforcing the rule might also demonstrate its importance. The committee made no proposal either to change or to retain this rule.

The CEP debated whether it should reconsider whether to send grades to parents. Dean Berek observed that the College did alert freshman parents, and that upper classmen received two copies of their grades.

The CEP will next meet on February 1.

Matmen suffer 4th loss

It's beginning to sound rather repetitious as only the names seem to be changed, but the Williams wrestling squad dropped another meet as a result of key forfeits, losing to Albany Tuesday, 30-18.

The Ephs, according to coach Joe Dailey, knew the chances to win were slim as Williams once again had to forfeit 134, 150, and 158, giving 18 easy points to an already strong team.

Lightweight Joe Carrese at 118 used the forfeit problem to his advantage, picking up six points through the lack of an Albany opponent. Hal Zendle at 126 looked strong in his match, winning a 12-5 decision. At 142, freshman Mark Walsh met the Albany captain and lost a tough decision.

Williams heavyweight contingent wrestled well although Scott Conant at 167 lost a close match. Freshman Keith Passaretti (177) earned his first pin of the season, grabbing a third of Williams points. Adding a final three for the team, co-captain Jeff May, at 190 won a one point decision while heavyweight Colin Hart, plaqued by a lack of experience, was pinned.

Although senior Clarence Young will soon be joining the squad at 158, the team still lacks wrestlers at 134 and 150 as a knee injury still keeps Hugo St. John out of the line-up. The Ephs will travel to Union Saturday for what should be another dreary defeat, according to Dailey.

disappointing 5-5, including a 67-56 loss to Union.

Coach Rick Wilson has all but three players back from last year's 17-7 club that went on to win the ECAC Division 11-111 championship, including The Kid Who Can Do It All, senior captain Jim Rehnquist. The 6'3" son of the Supreme Court Justice has been poison against Williams during the past three years but has had to miss three games this year (including Union) with a sprained ankle. Last year Rehnquist had 29 and 32 point performances against Williams and is currently averaging 25.3 points per game.

Helping out up front for the Jeffs are center Gary Collins (16.3 ppg) and Dave Protiva (8.8). Newcomer Jim Strand and either Matt Martland or senior Jeff Gruskay round out the backcourt. Bill Swiacki, an end on the football team, should also see plenty of action at forward. Game time is 8:00, with the JV's beginning action at 6:00.

APRIL 15 DEADLINE

27 Italian Medical and Veterinary Schools Accept American Students

Medical and veterinary school aspirants who are thinking of applying to Italian medical schools, and their families, must act immediately. New Italian government regulations require that preinscription applications be filed with Italian Consulates before April 15, for consideration for medical and veterinary school admission in 1977.

27 distinguished Italian medical schools accept Americans. Several hundred Americans now are studying at Italian medical and veterinary schools. Medical, dental and veterinary school aspirants who need assistance in language and cultural orientation and preparation before, during and after medical school to enable the practice of medicine in the U.S., should contact the Institute of International Medical Education. The Institute has helped more Americans enter European medical and veterinary schools than any other organization. Advanced placement for holders of science post-graduate degrees.

Cagers shock Yale, 50-48

by Andy O'Donnell

This was going to be a routine preview of tomorrow night's basketball encounter between Williams and Amherst, but after the Miracle on Spring Street that occurred Tuesday evening in the cozy confines of the Lasell Gymnasium, the Lord Jeffs will have to take a back seat for a few paragraphs.

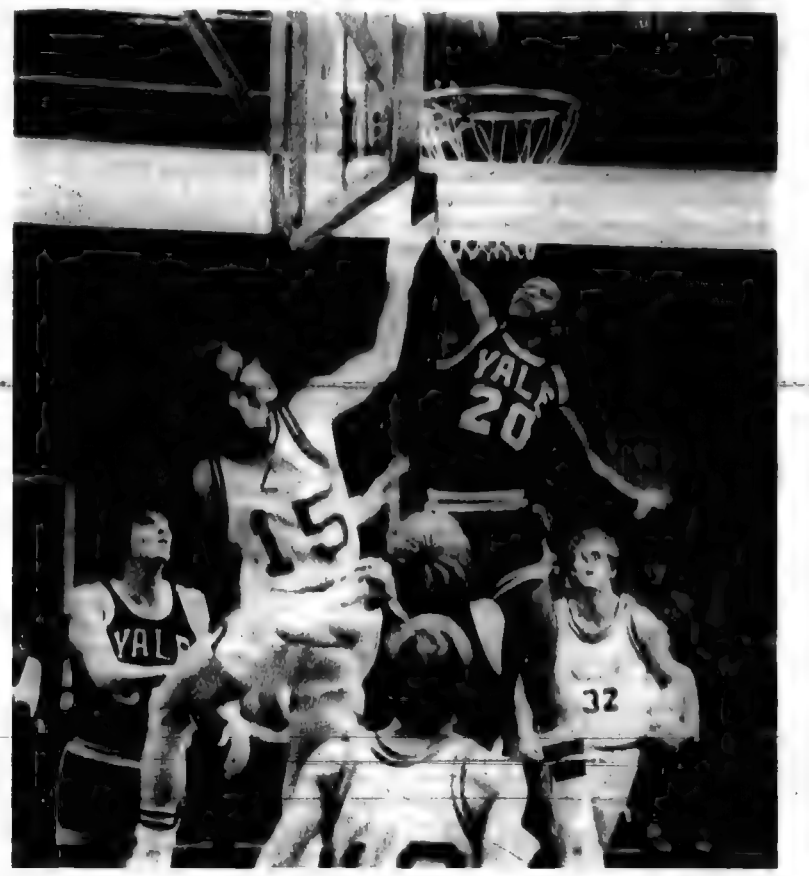
For those of you who missed it, suffice it to say that last week's Bates blowout couldn't begin to compare with the total team performance turned in by Coach Curt Tong's well drilled Ephs. Playing with remarkable intensity and desire in every facet of the game, an inspired Williams five absolutely stunned a heavily favored Yale squad, 50-48 before 800 ecstatic purple fans.

You'd have to go quite a way back in Eph hoop history before finding a game to top this one. Yale entered the contest with a very deceiving 3-9 record, having played such top 20 teams as Clemson and Holy Cross and having already spanked Clark, their other token Division III opponent, 102-59 earlier this year. But Williams wanted this one badly and its confidence snowballed after Spangler, Kelly and company quickly realized that they could stay with the Elis.

Gerry Kelly and Mike Tanner kept Williams in the game during the early going, combining for 20 first half points as the Ephs went into the locker room with a aprecarious 28-26 lead. Yale regrouped in the second half though, using a full court that gave Williams fits to ease its way onto the lead, 38-34, with 12:26 remaining.

The Ephs held their composure however, and behind the superb board work of Matt Spangler and the scoring of Andy Straka (10 second half points) eventually tied the game at 48 on a Brad Wolk tip-in. Straka then connected on a jumper with 1:50 left in the game and Williams weathered misses on the front ends of one and one opportunities by Tanner and Straka and a last second jump shot by Yale's Dick Shea before notching its third victory against four losses. Yale fell to 3-10.

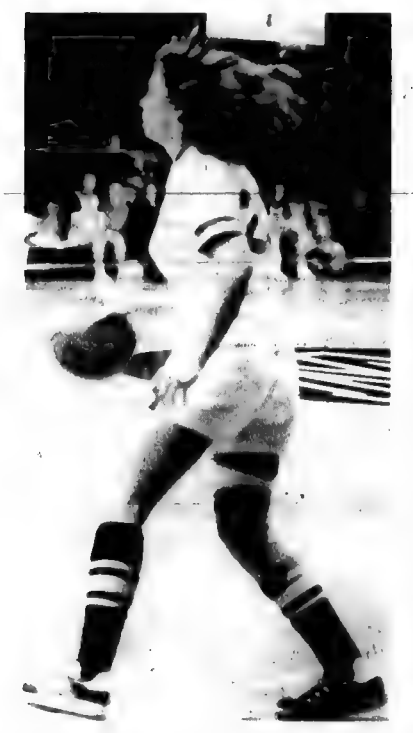
"In the back of your mind you always think it can be done," a happy coach Tong said after the game. "I'd seen them play, Coach Diamond had scouted them against Holy Cross, and we knew they were awfully big and very good but that we also knew they had some weaknesses."



"I told the team, hey, it'll take a whale of an effort, but it can be done. Everybody's going to have to produce his best possible performance, but we could do it. And we did. We really played out hearts out on that floor tonight. I thought we did a superb job, especially defensively."

Tanner led the Williams attack with 14 points, followed by Kelly with 12 (all in the first half), Straka with 10, and Wolk with his usual unobtrusive 10. Spangler pulled down 9 rebounds, a remarkable performance considering that Yale's front line boasted a group of leapers that could dust every rafter in Lasell and still have time for the light fixtures before returning to earth.

Williams really won't have much of a chance to savor the victory, however. Last night they attempted to accomplish something last year's team never could—reach the .500 plateau—against a Clark club that is always tough at home. And tomorrow evening they lock horns with Amherst for the 123rd time since 1901 in the opening Little Three contest for both clubs.



Last year Amherst snapped a 13 game Williams Little Three win streak as they upended the Ephs twice in a couple of barn burners en route to their first crown in five years. As of Wednesday night's game with Hartford the Jeffs were a somewhat

Women ward off Skid's second half comeback

by Nancy Rhein

As the Kazoo Band buzzed "Yard by Yard" in the stands, the Williams women's basketball team took the court in its home opener to defeat Skidmore, Tuesday, 61-56.

The final minutes had the Ephs sweating out what had looked like an easy win earlier in the game. Moving to an early lead as a result of the speed and drive of Monica Grady and Leigh Wilson, the Ephs allowed a seven point halftime lead to dwindle to one point with three minutes left in the game.

Although Williams effectively used their full court press and defensive tactics to control Skidmore powerhouse Sheila Killeen (22 points), they were unable to keep the pressure on early in the second half. Frosh Grady, playing chaser on Killeen, began to tire following a half of determined, hustling, play breaking.

As the Grady strategy and zone defense lost their effectiveness against the driving Skids, the Ephs kept their composure. Refusing to give up at 55-54, Anne Youngling, continued to hustle despite a knee injury that had been keeping her on the bench, hitting two foul shots to secure the Ephs' victory.

With 1:55 left, Skidmore continued to threaten but a strong defensive effort by Leslie Milne (6 points) and Grady forced the visitors to hold at 56 points, while Grady put up one more to finish it 61-56.

Joining Grady for a display of hard driving basketball was forward Maggie O'Brien (4 points) who played the entire game for the squad.

On defense, Wilson was again a sight to see as she frustrated the Skids' shooting and grabbed nine rebounds. Wilson was bad news for the opponents offensively as well, going for 13 points to top the Ephs' scoring stats.

Grady, despite her concentration on defense, had a 12 point total for the day while Youngling in the other half of the backcourt went for 10 points. Although Robin Ellett only had four points she looked strong defensively.

Forward Lisa Capaldini also saw action in the game going two for three from the floor and grabbing four rebounds in her limited playing time. Freshmen Karyn Allison and Jeannie Weeks also came off the bench for the Ephs, looking good in their varsity debut.

Although coach Sue Hudson was pleased with the victory, she expressed concern over the team's second half relaxation. While Williams "slowed down offensively" the Skids went to zone against the Ephs, who convert more effectively under man to man. Despite the second half slump, Hudson thought the team looked strong and should have been ready for yesterday's Clark game.

Ephs outski opponents

The Williams men's alpine ski team, dominated tri-state racing at Jiminy Peak last weekend grabbing first, second, fourth, ninth, and tenth place.

Sophomore Andy Mikell, who has skied well so far this season in slaloms at Bousquet and Brodie, skied to a first place finish Saturday. As a result of his recent victories, Mikell along with teammates Donald Tarinelli (second) and freshman Roger Prevot (fourth) have earned spots at the ESA cup race to be held at Waterville Valley.

The cross country team has been active as well, competing in the Dannon Yogurt Invitation Cross Country series. The caliber of competition was top notch as Williams racers Gary James, Jeff Magoon, and Will Schmidt finished in the top twenty, meeting the likes of Innsbruck champ Bill Koch.

The ski jumpers continue to train in preparation for the Eastern Jumping Championship, while the remainder of the team will be competing in the ESA Cup Alpine and National Cross Country Championship.

Preparing to compete in the upcoming Division I Winter Carnival series, the Williams women's ski team has participated in pre-carnival races including last weekend's competition at the Dartmouth Skiway.

Junior Marty Epstein finished in the top five Saturday, pacing Williams to a third place finish behind Dartmouth and Colby-Sawyer. Epstein and teammates Karen Ham and Corrie Johnson also finished well in the three ESA tri-state qualifiers held earlier in January.

Spangler awarded Athlete of Week

Sophomore Matt Spangler of the Williams basketball team has been named this week's Athlete of the Week following his superb defensive effort in Tuesday night's 50-48 shocker over Yale.

Starting his first game of the season, the 6' 4" sophomore forward hailed down 9 rebounds and conducted a boxing out clinic for an Eli frontline two to four inches taller than their Williams counterparts.

"His presence in the game was a definite factor," said Williams coach Curt Tong. "I put him in there because there was no way we could stay with them unless we had his rebounding ability and he came up with a great effort."

Watermen try for win after recent upset

The varsity swim team opens a three week home series tomorrow afternoon at 2:00 p.m. against the University of Vermont. The Ephmen dumped the northerners, 81-32, in last year's journey to Burlington, but expect a tougher time from Coach Les Legget's natators this year. Legget picked up a few whiz kids in last year's recruiting, and recently shipped his whole squad to Miami for two week's of intensive training.

Carl Samuelson's splashers sport a 2-2 record, thanks to last Saturday's 81-32 drubbing at the hands of Southern Connecticut. The Ephs put together several of their best performances of the year, but were no match for an owl squad that had tapered for two weeks and shaved several of its top swimmers.

Layden on Sports:

Meeting the man at the top

It started out just like any other field trip, ranging from warm milk and soggy peanut butter and jelly jaunts to safari land and the local museum in grade school to Lake Onota and the mountains of southern Vermont in college. But the normalcy of this field trip was to end soon.

A group of 25 or so budding broadcasters, producers, and simple curiosity seekers boards a bus for New York City from Williams to find out, in some 33 hours, all there is to know about the broadcast industries. The group will not only come away with enough connections in the industry to insure executive-level positions immediately upon graduation (and it snowed in Phoenix yesterday), but maybe even have a little fun along the way.

The first afternoon of the trip started out innocently enough. A long bus ride, lunch and a chat with a guest speaker at the luxurious Williams club. Next came an offer from one of our group; a hockey player and ersatz football play-by-play man who shall remain nameless, to visit ABC and chat with an old buddy. His old buddy was (is) a coordinating producer of ABC sports and was willing to visit with eight or so of us. What a trip.

A bus ride, a short walk, and 28 floors up—suddenly we're on the offices of ABC sports, awaiting the arrival of one Denis Lewin, the aforementioned coordinating producer. As we nervously wait, past walks a man with a familiar nasal voice, wearing a rat mask (or at least a face which looked like one) and seeming for all the world to be the famous companion of Muhammed Ali . . . nah, it couldn't be.

We ask a few nervous questions of Mr. Lewin and try and act intelligent, though we're all as awed as schoolchildren. The meeting goes on for fifteen minutes and then it happens. He comes into the room. Appearing with a flash of light and a clap of thunder (the flourescent lights flickering and the soundproof door slamming) and a hearty high-ho "what the hell's going on here," Howard Cosell was among us.

As he takes a seat next to our previous speaker, Cosell looks so much like the ugly man on the tube that it's frightening. The relaxation which was setting in suddenly leaves. Howard Cosell, the mouth almighty, the man from vocabulary, the most obnoxious man alive is waiting for questions from us. What the hell do we ask him? His first ten-minute diatribe went right over my head. Where's the bathroom? I gotta get outta here.

Suddenly Cosell, as revoltingly intelligent and obnoxious as he seems, is talking about the value of sports. It's not winning and losing and spectator interest that counts. He himself doesn't even like sports. Socio-economic value, that's what counts. I think he's full of it; I don't have the guts to say so. I stammer out a half-disagreement. He tears me apart like so many Ohio St. linemen. I'm as red as a beet. My god, he's a pain in the bleep, but so articulate. He cuts us all up in our arguments but his speech is worth hearing at any cost.

The conversation loosens up and we all realize that Howard is at least one step below God and we all learn a lot. A totally fascinating afternoon and he knew it. Howard, I disagree with you; I think you're completely rude (like the rest of America); and I also thank you for the chance to hear you, you're one of a kind.

VOL. 90, NO. 29 WILLIAMS COLLEGE JANUARY 25, 1977

Trustees talk tenure, tuition and future

Trustees Pamela Carlton '76, Martha R. Wallace, Alexander L. Fetter '58, and Robert J. Geniesse '51 met with the Record Friday night to discuss College issues including tenure, the future of the College, the role of the trustees, the financial position of the College and admissions.

Fetter, a professor of physics at Stanford, described the role of the trustees in the tenure process as "a legal charade." All four agreed that the faculty Committee on Appointments and Promotions is better qualified to judge the competence of an individual faculty member, and that the trustees should restrict themselves to determining general policy. Fetter noted the need for student input into the tenure process, but commented that "student opinions are one component" of the "many ideas which have to go into the decision."

Wallace, a director of the Henry Luce Foundation, predicted that future College problems would include the escalating costs of higher education which "freeze out middle income people from the best colleges." She also expected that the end of a period of expanding in the college age population would require adjustment by the College.

Geniesse, a partner in the law firm of Debevoise, Plimpton, Lyons and Gates, did not expect the character of Williams to change, however. He said that "everyone hopes that the small, congenial atmosphere and other affirmative characteristics would be maintained." Wallace added that "the highest priority for the future is that the present excellence of education at Williams be maintained."

She commented that the proper role of the trustees is the determination of general directions taken by the College, adding that, "in any major board, you cannot interfere with the day to day operations of your management," except to act when the administration takes a direction in policy unacceptable to the board.

Geniesse saw no real problems with distance between the trustees and students, though he added, "the more contact we have, the better." The presence of a recent graduate on the board is a valuable source of student opinion, he said. Carlton, a student at Yale Law School, was not sure how useful an undergraduate trustee would be, noting that most trustee problems are "very technical."

The financial status of the College is "healthy," said Geniesse. Fetter described recent College budgets as "sound but lean," with profits below one per cent. Both attributed the College's sound financial position to excellent management.

The Mount Hope and Cluett properties are being sold because of the high costs of maintaining them, he said, so that funds can be "budgeted for more educationally important things."

Chandler speaks with media

President John W. Chandler revealed the decisions of the trustees to representatives of the Record, WCFM and the News Office Saturday. Topics covered in the half-hour conference included tenure decisions, plans for Mount Hope Farm, fund-raising efforts, tuition and admissions. Chandler conducted a similar conference following the trustee's October meeting.

tuition

For the second consecutive year, the trustees sanctioned a $350 hike in tuition; the accompanying increases in room and board fees brought the comprehensive fee to $5,955 for 1977-1978. This figure exceeds this year's expenses by $425; the fee for 1976-1977 was $405 above the fee for 1975-1976.

Chandler disclosed these figures in a letter to students and parents mailed Monday. The charges cited were $4,100 for tuition, $975 for board, and $880 for room.

Revenues will be used to meet an $18.3 million budget for the upcoming year; this year's budget was approximately 17 million. "We project a balanced budget next year," the president maintained.

tenure

The seven assistant professors recommended for tenure by the CAP received promotions. Robert H. Bell, Lynda Bundtzen, Lee C. Drickamer, Gary J. Jacobsohn, Michael R. Katz and Mark C. Taylor will become associate professors July 1, 1978; Jay M. Pasachoff's promotion is effective July 1, 1977.

The trustees also approved a long list of appointments, reappointments, promotions and leaves of absence.

Frederick Hadleigh West, Director of Research in Prehistoric Archaeology and Lecturer in Anthropology, and Robert Brawley, Part-time Visiting Lecturer in Music, will join the faculty second semester.

Assistant Professor of Geology Richard B. Koepnick will resign at the end of the semester.

enrollment and admissions

The budget for the upcoming year calls for a reduction in enrollment by some ten students, reported Chandler. The long-run projected enrollment is 30 below this fall's figure of 1905 but this contraction will be spread over a few years, the president added.

A task force headed by chairman of the student-faculty admissions committee George E. Marcus will monitor the admissions department. "The committee will study the demography of the pool from which Williams draws to determine where the decline in applicants is going to be most sharp and where Williams should concentrate its recruiting efforts," Chandler said. Council undertakes auditing process of clubs' funds

The Finance Committee has already begun to monitor the expenditures of campus organizations receiving Student Activities Tax funds, according to College Council Treasurer Clarence Otis '77. He explained that this had been done more or less informally in the past by the treasurer himself but that this year, the council had decided to adopt a more formal reviewing procedure.

"When the various organizations came in this fall," said Otis, "we were finding that in the previous year, they had spent money on other, although valid things that had not been originally provided for in their budgets." This is a move to improve the general accountability of these groups to the council, he explained.

Each of the eight members of the Finance Committee will be given three or four groups to work with, said committee member Bob Fox '77. The monitoring will be conducted on a continuous basis. The frequency of the audits will depend on the groups themselves. For example, said Fox, "organizations such as the Record and WCFM will be monitored as often as once a month whereas the Gul's finances are such that it won't be necessary that often."

Fox said that he feels that this new system that the Finance Committee is instituting is a good one. Monitoring in the past had been very superficial, he noted. Also, he said that the new method provides a better way for the outgoing council members to give accurate information to the incoming ones.

WHEW seeks funding

Williams Health, Education, and Welfare (WHEW) will reorganize after having been disbanded during fall funding, according to Daniel Felizberto '78, former WHEW president. He will bring a proposal before the College Council tonight. Seeking funds to run activities; without money WHEW would merely coordinate individual house's efforts.

The council had disputed the purpose of WHEW, contending that the Housing Committee could perform its duties. Felizberto disagreed as he saw WHEW as coordinating activities between houses to prevent duplications. Spring Weekend and Winter Carnival will also be organized by WHEW. Felizberto, commenting on his aims, said, "I'd like to throw all-College parties—with all-house parties, house 'fraternities' are starting to develop."

The new group will go by the same name. The major difference between the old and new organizations is the membership—the group will consist of house social chairmen rather than house presidents. Freshmen will be represented by Cabby Tennis '80. Lee Jackson '79 will be the CC representative. Felizberto will remain president.

WHEW will resume after meetings with the Housing Committee and the Finance Committee to discuss funding. Felizberto is asking the College Council for $750, the Freshman Council for $250, and 50c from each social member of all houses.

Garfield renovation likely for 1978

Garfield House cannot continue in its present state, the trustees decided last weekend. Certain "structural and cosmetic" improvements need to be made while thinking about its long term use, according to Dean Cris T. Roosenraad.

The foundation is settling, and although the ground floor appears normal, the upper stories, and particularly the staircases, slant severely. On top of other renovation, the new construction will have to meet all current building codes.

The building currently houses 19 men. Preliminary plans indicate that through the various changes, such as making two adjacent large rooms into three adequate sized ones, making the unused kitchen and dining areas into student rooms, and "extensive 'Yacht Club' renovations" occupancy can be increased to 35 spaces.

Dr. Wayne Wilkins, chairman of the trustee Committee on Campus Life announced the cost would be $400,000. His committee and the trustee Buildings and Grounds Committee have approved the plan. The proposal goes to the whole Band of Trustees next April.

The architect guessed that renovation would take one semester, a Winter Study and a summer to complete. Optimally, Roosenraad said, work would progress over the spring semester when there would be more empty beds, making it easier to relocate the residents.

Gar-Wood House President Frank Carr realized the necessity of renovation, but expressed concern at the possibility of having the house members scattered across the campus. "Being together is the important thing," he said.

Dean Roosenraad agreed to the desirability of keeping the residents together, but questioned its feasibility. Though two new houses will open next fall, and putting the Garfield men in them "is a possibility" neither will accommodate all 19 people. Whatever happens, he said, the Housing Committee, and particularly the Garfield House residents will have to "have a big input" into the decision.

Pending trustee approval in April, the College will spend $400,000 for repairs on Garfield House. Tentative plans schedule construction to commence January 1978. (photo by Steinway)

Making It Work

With tuition costs rising at a near double-digit clip, it is clearly imperative that students have as much information as possible in deciding what courses they want to buy. One bad course or instructor will, in effect, be a waste of over $450 next year. A student-oriented and student-run course guide which is both frank and statistically solid would surely be useful to most students in making decisions on courses and instructors.

At present, the viability of the student course guide is in some doubt. While the threat of legal hassles from specific faculty members which plagued last year's guide has subsided, the biggest problem remains—student apathy. According to Course Guide Committee Chairperson Sarah Baldwin, less than half of the student body has returned the course guide questionnaire. Furthermore, the committee is in drastic need of student help in the form of departmental editors.

Some of the blame for the present state of the course guide can no doubt be laid in the hands of the Course Guide Committee itself. It has set no definitive deadline for having all the questionnaires in. This policy can only lead to student procrastination and delay. In addition, we suspect that its personalized system of collecting completed questionnaires has suffered some breakdowns. The committee assigned a specific person in each residential house to collect the completed forms. Unfortunately, some of these people have been gone for all or most of the Winter Study period.

In spite of any committee inefficiencies, failure to produce a good student course guide this year will reflect poorly on the entire student body. Students will have shown the college community that they either don't care much about the guide or that they don't have the technical expertise required to put one out.

We urge all students to complete the course guide questionnaire and get it back to the committee before the end of Winter Study. A comprehensive guide, with both valid statistical data and edited verbal comments, can help all students get the most for their tuition dollars.

NEWS BRIEFS

Registration procedures change

There will be several changes in the registration process for second semester, said Registrar George Howard. This week, students should make sure all their bills are paid at the Business Office. Those students cleared by the Business Office will receive a schedule of their courses, a classroom directory, a memorandum on course changes, and a blank class hour schedule in their mailboxes next Tuesday, said Howard. In order to change or drop a course, a student must obtain the signatures of both the instructor of the course to be dropped and the instructor of the course to be added. Howard said that section changes are discouraged in order to keep class sizes approximately even, but are possible if there are schedule conflicts.

Casino foes circulate petition

Opponents of the proposed Greylock Glen Casino are circulating a petition to present at an open meeting of the state legislature's joint Committee on Government Regulations this week in Boston. Frederick D. Moran, chairman of the Voices, not Vices for Adams group, said the petition is intended to counter the efforts of casino promoters last October who organized a petition in favor of legislation legalizing casino gambling in Massachusetts.

Aruba ticket sales end tomorrow

Tickets for the Prospect House Arbua trip raffle will be on sale until dinner tomorrow night. The costs of the trip and the Aruba night party require that the house sell 130 tickets. Although only 85 have been sold, project co-ordinator Tom Kondel '78 predicts the final total will reach nearly 200. The extra revenues will go into a better party and increased spending money for the winners, he said.

Letters: maintenance tax, affection

Maintenance tax

To the editor:

Before the College Council and Housing Committee make a final decision on the method of division of the House Maintenance Tax (Record, January 21), they should recognize that with the exception of the Cultural Fund this is the only money which is divided equally among the houses. Yet there are many expenses which are equal for every house.

Each house must pay for the monthly cable TV rental (approximately $70 per year), for maintenance of a television set and for purchase of a television set when necessary. Normal College party procedures require one security guard per house regardless of the size of the house. Fixed costs such as security, janitors and the band for big weekend, multi-house parties are usually divided equally among the houses. Expenses for sports equipment such as a volleyball net, ping pong paddles and a dart board should not vary with the size of the tax. Even the cost of liquors consumed by faculty associates is not associated with house size.

If the House Maintenance Tax were to be divided on a per person or per bed space basis, persons living in smaller houses would be paying more per person for their TV set and for parties than persons living in larger houses.

Thus, even if one accepts Randy Sturges' arguments regarding the distribution of maintenance and damage bills, one must still recognize that there are other costs which occur on a per house basis.

If the College is to distribute money so that all students benefit equally, a little bit more money per member must be given to smaller houses than to larger houses. The present system does that.

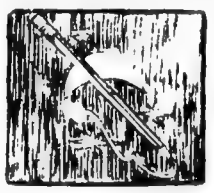
O.D.A.

To the editor:



As veteran roadtrippers, we would like to offer our criticism of the Williams campus parties. We noticed, after only a few beers, that there was something definitely missing. At first, we thought that this missing ingredient was possibly due to the fact that everyone else had had only a few beers themselves, but sadly this was not the whole story. Finally it dawned on us. Unlike Cornell, there are rarely any O.D.A.'s during your social functions. An O.D.A. is an Open Display of Affection; i.e., kissing on the dance floor, making out on the couch. We were looking for why this absence existed—was it due to super-sophistication on the Williams campus, prudish girls, inhibited boys? Obviously each of these reasons (as well as a developing social code at Williams) was responsible.

A few questions come to mind. First of all, has there ever been a Williams College O.D.A.? And if so, are the parties involved ostracized? As an experiment, we attempted an O.D.A., immediately following "That's The Way of the World." To our surprise, the two girls found it most enjoyable and were very co-operative.

Williams men, put down your beer and hitch up your pants! Let's face it—O.D.A.'s are fun! We feel that as long as you choose to abstain from O.D.A.'s, the school administration should place in effect a regulation similar to the one upheld at Oral Roberts University, which prevents O.D.A's of any kind on campus grounds. Without such a written code, the student suffers undue anguish, deciding whether "to" or "not to."

Fortunately, we are returning to Cornell this afternoon, where we will be welcomed with open—arms.

Sincerely,
Jim Rhodes, '78

The Anxious Afternoon of Anthony A.

Anthony A. stepping onto a bus to meet an important appointment with bureaucracy. Sits down next to a portly Italian. Eyes forward, the Italian farts once. As if to tell me something. I riposte. Twice. Message received. The Italian counters with three short pops. Other people on the bus getting suspicious. No one likes a foreign language spoken on their bus. Man on my other side interrupts the conversation with a nasty SBD. Deadly manners. My destination approaches, and I leave my seat warm with communication. Also leave the Italian and the SBD man to their own devices. Wanted: translator well-versed in the musical languages. Toot. Anthony A. trailing his goodbye behind him.

To toot or not to toot.

He walks leisurely from the bus stop. His private world had been interrupted by a letter from "the department."

Dear Sir:

We are surprised at your current driving record. Tsk tsk. You are expected to attend "Driver Rehabilitation School" if you expect to keep your license. Until then it is suspended and inoperable.

Sincerely,
The Department of Motor Vehicles

p.s. your motor vehicle is on our side.

Anthony A. wonders: is the Department of Motor Vehicles run by motor vehicles? ". . . Sincerely, a 1964 Rambler." Continued past the County Center towards Motor Vehicle. Accident observed at the corner. How sacrilegious. My driving record is a bit shocking. Speeding along some highway and a cop steps right out into the road, waving me over to the shoulder. Didn't even give me the benefit of a chase. Insulting. Six months later a perfectly normal looking car suddenly sprouts flashing red lights beneath its front grill and pulls me over. Frighteningly covert. And late one hot summer night in Larchmont, N.Y., a self-righteous young cop pulls me over.

"Officer, what did I do?"

"What did you do? Why, you made an illegal U-turn back there!!!"

So what?
All I wanted was to turn around.

Anthony A. on the line at the Information desk. Everyone around him is unattractive. Two young, unattractive children fight in front of him, banging into his leg. He manages to trip both of them, innocently. Finally it's his turn.

"Excuse me, what room do I go to for the Driver Rehabili . . ."

"Other room."

"Pardon me?"

"That's the other room."

"What other room?"

"Go to the information desk in the next room!"

"Madam, you are ugly and rude."

The line in front of the Information desk in the other room.

"Excuse me, what room do I go to for the Driver Rehabilitation Class?"

"Room 516G. Next . . ."

"Uh, wait. How do I get to 516G?"

"Down those stairs, left, right, left, down the hall, right, left, another left. Next . . ."

"Thank you madam."

"No need to thank me, just my job."

"No, I want to thank you and all of your fellow workers for your friendly and valuable service."

"Sir, there are people behind you . . ."

"And not only do I thank you, but I want to leave a little gratuity for your time and bother. Just let me get out my check book . . ."

"Sir . . . we cannot accept tips . . ."

"Is fifty dollars enough? It's such a thankless job, couldn't pay much . . . I'll make it out to 'Cash' . . ."

Anthony A. turns left, right, left. Certainly shook that matron up. Had to talk to her supervisor. Mr. 1964 Rambler. "You take the check, Mr. Rambler; use it to fix up that sagging bumper. Or maybe those glazed headlights."

Takes a seat in 516G. It's cold, lonely, unnecessary. And suddenly I'm filled with a warm feeling. The sound of an old friend. Toot. I turn around, and there he is. He smiles and says softly, "Got off at the next stop; a quick sandwich before class." For ammunition, presumably. We communicate as much as possible during the class, and manage to cut short the lesson. Poor atmospheric conditions.

our way into the broken wind.

Poetry reading

There will be a poetry reading by Lawrence Raab of the Department of English at 8:00, February 10, in 3 Griffin. Raab, a native of Pittsfield, is the author of two books of poems, Mysteries of the Horizon and The Collector of Cold Weather. His awards include a Book-of-the-Month Club Fellowship, a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts, and the Robert Frost Fellowship from the Bread Loaf Writers' Conference. For the three years before coming to Williams he held a fellowship from the University of Michigan Society of Fellows. The poet Donald Justice has said that Raab's style "is sure and unwavering, and his lines, in their flowing relaxations, suggest the music of good expansive talk."

Dennett and Pratt Houses convulsed in the agony of defeat as Armstrong athletes dominated the First Annual Mission Park Winter Olympic Games on Cole Field last weekend.

The Armstrong banner rose to the strains of the theme from Patton, the House's anthem, in ten awards ceremonies during the seventeen event, two day long competition. In the only concession to non-Olympic spirit, Pratt and Dennett trailed Armstrong's 86 point total with tallies of 68 and 34, respectively.

The rivalry between Pratt and Armstrong which would mark these Games crystallized in the first event, the Foot Slalom. Chris Lovell, Armstrong, outdistanced a field of fifteen in the race, and Allan Eusden and Tony Quay, both from Pratt, took the silver and the bronze medals.

Sue Tuttle and Cath Carpenter, Armstrong, were the prevailing contenders in the women's slalom event, taking first and third places. Mary Hakala, Dennett, slipped into the second position. Armstrong took firsts and seconds in both the men's and women's tray jumping events, and Pratt picked up the bronze.

Rumors that Pratt would protest the tray event on the grounds that Armstrong athletes had ingested large amounts of steroids before competition died when Pratt amateurs swept both the men's and women's speed skating races. Scott Harrington dominated the fourth event with his interpretation of a sixty yard dash on ice. Mary Hakala took the gold in the women's event.

Friday's festivities ended with two co-ed competitions, the Ice Bicycling race and team Broomball. The highlight of the day, however, had been the opening Ceremonies, conducted by honorary Olympic Chairman President Chandler.

Hoddy Peck, official flag-raiser and torch sculptor (Leroy Neiman, eat your heart out) unfurled the House banners as anthems accompanied the ceremony. After the Olympic flag, three interconnecting circles representing the spirit of goodwill among the houses, was flying, Mary Hakala bore the Olympic flame to Chairman Chandler. Chandler declared the Games open and lit the torch, fashioned in a patriotic red white and blue motif.

The zenith of the Saturday events was the Spink competition. Armstrong won both the men and women's games in close matches over Pratt. There was some question as to the integrity of the coaching and officiating in the Spink tourney, but none of the referees were of East German background so the charges were dropped.

The Games were purposely planned to be different from the annual Winter Carnival, a school wide event. "Although other housing groups like Greylock could organize an Olympics for themselves, a school-wide Games would be neither advisable or desirable," Hutwelker explained. "The double sense of unity and rivalry, coupled with convenience, is necessary to run a successful Olympics."

Morris' mirrors at Clark

by Christopher Noey

In cooperation with the Williams Artist-in-Residence program and the Clark Art Institute, contemporary artist Robert Morris last week marshalled the energies of ten students enrolled in studio art professor Tom Krens' Winter Study course entitled "Robert Morris" in order to erect the artist's largest and most recent mirror piece in the Clark courtyard. Morris made visits to Williamstown this past fall to select a site for his sculpture. He submitted a design for a sculpture in the Clark courtyard, the trustees of the museum approved having the sculpture there from January 21 until at least February 26, and the cost of erecting the work was funded by the Artist-in-Residence program and the artist himself.

Although the conception and layout of the as yet untilted sculptural work are Morris' alone, the students in Krens' winter study were intimately involved in the work's construction, which began on Monday, January 17, and continued almost until the opening for the sculpture piece held at 4:30 p.m. this past Friday. Students surveyed the space and helped Morris and workmen situate the six mirror units in the 50' by 50' courtyard. Furthermore, students helped design the units so that they could be more easily dissembled than in the artist's original plan, and one student, Dave Clapp, even redesigned the supports for the two free-standing center units when Morris' initial design proved unsafe.

According to Krens, who directs the Artist-in-Residence program, Morris will continue to "interact with students in working situations" throughout his month at Williams. Students in the winter study project will publish a short catalogue on the Clark sculpture, and Morris will also meet with students in next semester's Advanced Sculpture and Modern Methods classes. A show of his drawings is slated to open this week in Gallery Nine of the College Museum and Morris is presently working on a print in the Goodrich Hall print studio.

Students in the winter study project are also involved in the production of a video tape which documents the making of the courtyard sculpture. This video tape figures as an intrinsic element of the sculpture, since Morris, writing in Artforum magazine, has eschewed the limitation of artistic appreciation to merely the finished art object. By documenting the making process, he attempts to extend the viewer's aesthetic attention to include the process by which available resources are adapted to the site at hand.

My first impression of the sculpture was that it inhabited the courtyard with the kind of untouched-by-human-hands solemnity normally reserved for Stonehenge and Indian mounds in Ohio. Untouchable if only because of my social training as regards art objects and clean mirrors, the combination of white walls and gray stone floor with implacably smooth mirrors enhance the sculpture's coolly aloof, if elegant, aura. The mirror units are laid out with the symmetry of a French garden, and I find it the most ingenious array of mirrors this side of Versailles with the possible exception of Bloomingdale's. But at Bloomingdale's the mirrors, though large, allow only frontal views of oneself, and even the three-sided niches that show back views restrict one's movement such that one can only pose in front of them. What the Morris piece permits that those mirrors do not is movement, the incorporation of process into one's self-scrutiny. Wandering through the Morris work you literally see yourself as others see you. This is not always a pleasant experience.

Furthermore, the spatial effect of the piece is disconcertingly more complex than one initially supposes. Seen from outside its boundaries or from above as in a two-dimensional diagram, the site is sparsely simple verging on uninteresting. Drawn into the piece by my own playful narcissims, the previously empty space became charged with my personal physical psychology as I navigated the barriers and changing expanses created by the mirrors. One becomes acutely aware of the inadequacy of any temporarily static photograph or diagram to recall the sensations experienced in the piece, for Morris is investigating the tension between the process of visual perception and its conceptualization. Using a spatial vocabulary, the sculpture is art, that is, about the fact that art is about ways of seeing—which would not be saying very much had Morris not shrewdly appropriated the viewer's self-examination as the medium for this expression, recalling the deceit of Manet's "Chez le Pere Lathuille" in which a waiter catches the viewer spying on an amorous couple sitting in a restaurant. Like Manet, Morris explores the psychology of voyeurism, but Manet's figures are posed against a background producing a painted image frozen in time that factually, if not ideally, occupies a space that is an "other" to the viewer. The subject-object relationship is not so neatly resolved in the Morris sculpture which structures a backdrop for arbitrary events as the viewer moves through the real space of their own self-portrait in a concentrated metaphor for the unsteadiness of everyday space.

Trio tops jazz series

by Steve Robinson

David Sancious brought his trio into Chapin Hall last Thursday night to cap off this year's ACEC Jazz Festival. With Gerald Carboy, bass; and the tireless Ernest Carter, percussion, Sancious played very exciting music for some two hours. This concert did not seem to draw a large crowd, but was by far the most worthwhile of the series.

Many attempts at the fusion of jazz and rock have failed by not preserving the best elements of both musics. Sancious, however, has succeeded, producing music with the drive of rock and the creativity and spontaneity of jazz.

Sancious' work on keyboards was really fine, especially his acoustic piano improvisation. His guitar work was not equally impressive; it is clear that guitar is his second instrument.

Ernest Carter, drums, played a sparkling concert. He is a master of time and he really stole the show in Chapin. Although not as fast as some drummers (Cobham), Carter plays with more than enough creativity and drive to offset any technical deficiency. He made my ears sweat.

These musicians played with honest enthusiasm, something that neither of the two previous groups had in any abundance. It was obvious that the musicians enjoyed playing their music. They smiled and laughed and had a good time. In fact, everyone had a good time.

Spragins' studio 'Flower' has workshop feeling

by Thomas Herwitz

Luigi Pirandello's short work The Man With the Flower in His Mouth was graciously performed this past weekend in the Studio Theater of the AMT, and the production perhaps ushered in a new period of primarily workshop productions there. The piece had a workshop feel, at least when this reviewer saw it. An afternoon performance, lightly (though intensely) attended, it had the feel of a gathering rather than the stiffness of a formal presentation. Though the acting was solidly combed, the setting and theatrical mood created were none the less more casual.

The one act play itself is the birds-eye view of two strangers who meet in an all night cafe in Rome (which somehow sounded more like a pub in Oxfordshire—why not call it that?). Pirandello, no doubt, asked himself what kind of people would be in an all night cafe and came up with a rather bland and harmlessly drunk villager who missed the last train out and had to wait until the morning. The droll character, played by Peter Bergethon, is really no more than the fall guy (and James Spragins, the director, took that literally at one point) for the other, more interesting, night owl.

The flower in the man's mouth is the scar of a deadly disease and the man who possesses it is living in the no man's land between life and death. The play therefore is literally a thought-play vision of a dying man. Bob Gregory in his portrayal mirrors extraordinarily well the perceptiveness of the dying character (with particular grace in the sequence where he demonstrates the tying of a package in a store). His words echo the love and hunger for the life that is leaving him and the confusion he is feeling. The performance is terribly intense, somewhat violent and the man is often out of control. Though this burst of frustrated anger works well against the staid and highly controlled ending, as a whole the play lacked a true sense of modulation.

The play stands as a classic work not only for Pirandello, but also for modern theater. It is a verbal exultation of life and remained such in Spragins' studio production.

Pair teaches glass craft

The Northern Berkshire Council of the Arts will offer an eight week course in stained glass techniques. The course, taught by Nan and Jim Jay of Williamstown, will provide the students with the fundamentals of stained glass including glass cutting, design, leading and foiling techniques. The Jays are self taught stained glass craftsmen and have studio training from Franklin Art Glass Center in Columbus, Ohio. They have been working in stained glass for over six years and have done restoration and commission work as well as having participated in juried shows in Ohio. They have also given demonstration of their art on TV and in schools. They supply both galleries and stores with their work. There will be an emphasis on individual instruction according to the student's own rate of progress. The goal of the class is the completion of two or three projects. Students will be asked to give a deposit for materials at the beginning of the course. The class will meet on Thursdays from 7 to 9 p.m. at their studio in Williamstown beginning February 3, 1977. For further information please contact the Northern Berkshire Council of the Arts.

Winter Study projects end in concerts

Williams Brass Quintet and Studio Five

The Williams Brass Quintet will conclude a January tour of college campuses with a concert in Thompson Memorial Chapel at 8:30 p.m. tomorrow night. Sponsored by the department of music, the concert is free and open to the public.

As a special Music 99 project during Williams' Winter Study period, the members of the quintet, coached by Peter Knott, have worked intensively to prepare a program of Renaissance, Baroque, Romantic, and modern music for public performance. Members of the quintet are Gary Hoffman '78 and Jay Wallace '79, trumpet; Bob Staiger '79, trombone; Bob Oldshue '77, french horn; and Andy Goodell '77, tuba.

The group began its tour with a concert and clinic at Mt. Greylock Regional High School in Williamstown. In the week immediately preceding the Williams campus appearance, the quintet also performed at Mt. Holyoke, Hamilton, Middlebury, Vassar, and Skidmore Colleges.

STUDIO V

Studio V, a concert by Williams College student soloists, ensembles, and composers, will take place in Chapin Hall at 4:00 p.m. Thursday. The recital is free and open to the public. Many of the works to be presented are the result of a variety of music winter study courses and projects. Children are particularly invited to attend, since these recitals are rather informal in nature.

Krapp's Last Tape plays AMT in studio theater

Samuel Beckett's one act play "Krapp's" Last Tape will play in the AMT Studio Theater this Thursday and Friday at 8:30 p.m. The one man show is being directed and acted by Kevin O'Rourke as a Winter Study 99 in Theater under Jean-Bernard Bucky. The work is a look at an old man's reminiscences of his life through his collection of diary-tapes. Tickets are free, and are available starting one hour before the show.

vestigation will include a review of ethnic groups which are not represented in the student body.

renovation

The trustees approved three renovation projects, Chandler announced. Garfield, which houses 19 male affiliates of Gar-Wood House will be closed for renovation in January 1978 and will be ready for occupancy that fall. The proposed renovation will increase rooming capacity to 35, Chandler said.

Two small frame houses, formerly used for faculty housing, will be converted to student residences. Woodbridge, which is located behind the faculty club, and Keck, which faces Bascom on Stetson Court, will house 13 students each beginning next fall. Chandler predicted that Keck would become a satellite to Perry-Bascom House but was uncertain which row house would gain Woodbridge.

fund raising

The Development Office, seeking $50 million by 1984, has raised $27.7 million for the Capital Drive for the Seventies. Williams received $2.3 million in gifts and pledges since October. "A series of dinners and lunches was undertaken to stimulate this," Chandler said. "We're very pleased with it."

The fund, earmarked for endowment and physical facilities, started with $15 million in 1974. "We're on schedule as far as the decade is concerned, raising about $5 million a year," the president said. "As far as raising a major portion of it the first three years, we're not on schedule. Unfortunately, when the campaign was kicked off in 1974 the economy immediately collapsed . . . I think in part we're getting better results because the economy is coming back."

Chandler said he expects the Alumni Fund to come close to reaching its goal of $1.1 million. (Director of Alumni Relations R. Cragin Lewis estimated that over $900,000 was collected with 2 weeks remaining). Money collected during this drive will be used for college operations, salaries and scholarships.

Eph racketmen fall to Yale, crunch Franklin and Marshall

by Evan Bash

The varsity squash team got a look at opposite ends of the spectrum last week, crushing Franklin and Marshall 9-0 Sunday, after dropping a heartbreaking 5-4 match to Yale Friday. This week's split brings the season record of coach Dave Johnson's squad to 4-2.

Sunday is the day of rest, and the Ephs did just that in easing to victory over F&M. Williams surrendered only one game and were rarely tested in any of the others, as F&M could not handle the host's vast variety of shots.

Captain Marc Reinhardt led the way to victory with a quick 3-0 win, while Arnie Cogswell lost the only name of the day as he experimented with some new shots. No. 3 Chip Lindquist continues to show steady improvement as he won easily.

The bottom six Eph positions were jumbled considerably due to injuries and ladder changes. Martin Goldberg rolled at no. 4, Jim Little had little trouble at no. 5 and Tim Belk was never tested at the sixth spot. Pete Thayer had no problem adjusting to the no. 7 position, along with Charlie Haines (no. 8) and Jim Parsons (no. 9), as they all proved unbeatable.

Coach Johnson prepared his charges for a close match with Yale and could not have been more accurate as the outcome rested on the last match of the day. Williams was continually hurt by the very fast Yale courts as the Eph's delicate shots kept coming far off of the courts' walls.

Both Reinhardt and Cogswell had off days as each lost in four games. Lindquist lost his match by essentially 1 point, falling 18-17 in one game before dropping the match 3-2. Bruce Giammatei at no. 4 never got into his match as he lost 3 straight games, while Goldberg notched a fine 3-0 win to his credit.

As the match developed, it appeared Williams dominance of the bottom five positions would lead the way to victory. After Goldberg's win at no. 5, Belk provided an exciting 5 game win at no. 7. Thayer at no. 8 and Haines also scored easy triumphs to make the score 4-4. No. 6 Little won the first two games of his match, the day's last, and appeared to be ready to cap an Eph triumph. But his opponent suddenly turned invinceable, reeling off 17 straight points at one stretch, en route to a spectacular 3-2 comeback and a Yale victory.

National powers Penn and Princeton make the long trip north to face Williams Thursday and Friday.

Union slams grapplers, 42-12

Meeting up with an extremely tough Union squad, the Williams wrestling team, now 0-5, was defeated 42-12 Saturday in Schenectady.

Although lightweight Joe Carrese (118) picked up six points on a forfeit, sophomore Hal Zendle managed to score the only meet points for the Ephs. Zendle at 126, now in better form coming off his injury, quickly pinned his opponent.

The remainder of the match was a disaster for the squad as they were pinned in every weight class in which they had wrestlers. Once again, the team forfeited 134 and 150, although Hugo St. John returned to the line-up at 158, only to be defeated by Union's strong captain.

Scott Conant, wrestling at 167 was pinned as was Keith Passaretti at 177. Receiving an ankle injury during his match, Jeff May was unable to come back to defeat his opponent, while heavyweight Colin Hart was the last victim of Union's pinning spree.

The Ephs will next meet Wesleyan in another tough match Saturday in Middletown.

first tally, fifteen seconds later at 6:23, gave Weiss a two-goal bulge. Wade Smith assisted Egizi on the period's final goal and sent Williams into the locker room on top, 3-0.

Bessone (from Johnson), Johnson (from Jim Norton), and Chris Vogelsang (from Brian Norris and Ben Heintz) each registered goals in the second stanza, giving Williams a comfortable 6-0 edge.

Wesleyan notched a pair of goals in the first 1:22 of the final period to break Weiss' spell, but at 14:40 a four-goal Williams barrage turned the contest into a complete rout and ended any hopes of a Wesleyan comeback. Forwards Brian Norris and Johnson scored to make it 8-2 Williams, before power play tallies by Johnson and Egizi put Williams in double figures. The host Cards scored in the last minute to set the final score at 10-3.

Bill McCormick's Ephs return to Division II play tonight at Chapman Rink with a 7:30 P.M. contest against Massachusetts. The Minutemen recently tied powerful Merrimack, 2-2 and should provide a tough foe for the Ephs.

Kelly led all scorers with 19 points, while Tanner chipped in with 14 (7 for 14 from the floor). Rehnquist finished with 16, ten below his average. In the preliminary game, the Williams JV's stunned their Amherst counterparts 59-58 on John Straka's 30 foot heave at the buzzer.

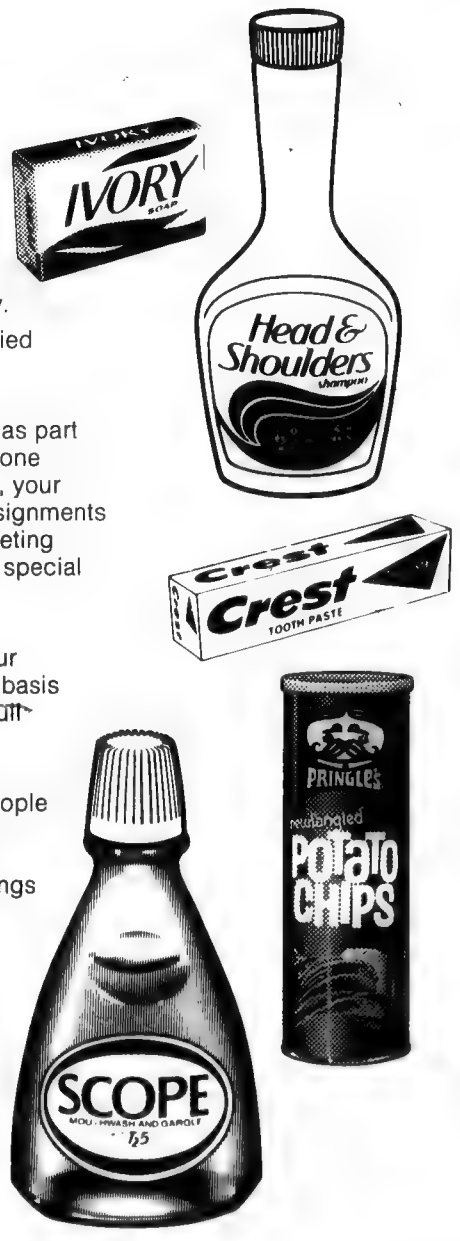
Ask Procter & Gamble what you can do with your BA degree!

You could become the advertising/marketing manager for one of these P&G products!

Although only 5 are shown here, Procter & Gamble makes more than 50 well-known, well-advertised consumer brands.

For each brand, there is a small management group, usually just 3 people, totally responsible for planning, creating and supervising everything that is done to increase consumer acceptance of their brand.

The group is headed by a Brand Manager, an important level of management in our company.



Right now, we're looking for a few highly qualified college seniors with the potential to become Brand Managers.

You would start at our Cincinnati headquarters as part of a brand group for a specific brand, perhaps one of those shown here. To help you learn quickly, your Brand Manager would give you challenging assignments of increasing responsibility in various key marketing areas such as TV advertising, package design, special promotions, budget planning and analysis, and market research.

The emphasis would be on you, your ideas, your ability to contribute. You'll be promoted on the basis of merit alone. It's not uncommon to become a full Brand Manager within 3-4 years.

Since you will begin to manage from the day you join us, we're looking for "take charge" people with outstanding records of leadership while in college. "Superior academic achievement", "innovative", "a record of being able to get things done", and "good oral and written communications skills" are some of the words we use to describe the people we want.

If this kind of work interests you and you think you qualify, please send me your resume.

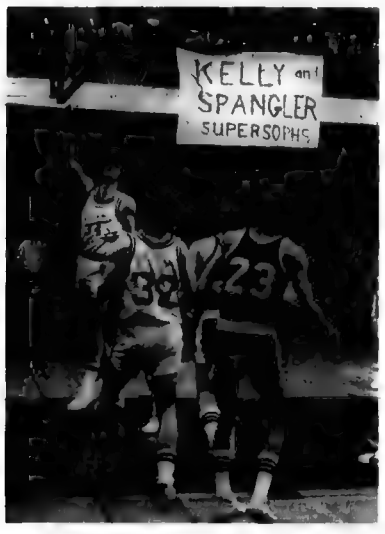
Purple defense superb



B-ballers maul Jeffs, 55-41

by Andy O'Donnell

Although it's just one down and three tough ones to go, the picture looks a good deal easier now. And with a little bit of luck, it could be in technicolor come March.

With an enthusiastic overflow crowd of 900 transforming Mr. Lasell's tiny matchbox of a gym into the friendliest snakepit in town, Coach Curt Tong's varsity basketball squad welcomed Amherst to a roundball nightmare Saturday night, running away from the Lord Jeffs with a surprisingly easy 55-41 victory in the first of four Little Three contests for Williams.

The triumph was a fitting conclusion to a remarkable week for the young Ephs. Beginning with the Yale stunner and continuing with a 73-68 come from behind victory over Clark last Thursday, Williams has now put together a three game win streak and along the way accomplished something that eluded last year's team—put itself over the .500 mark with a 5-4 ledger.

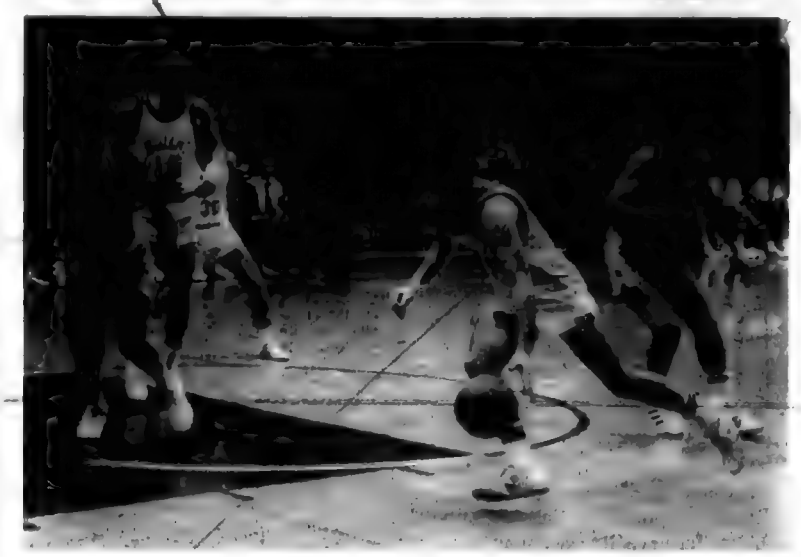
The key to success in each of those five wins has been the scrambling Williams defense, and Saturday's contest proved no exception. With Mike Tanner and Gerry Kelly igniting the switching Eph zones, Williams not only held Jim Rehnquist to just four second half points but so bewildered the Lord Jeffs on offense that at one point they tried playing with only four players.

"Our defense did a good job once again," Tong said after the game. "We utilized the quickness of Tanner and Kelly well, both on offense and defense. The crowd was a factor too. They came to scream and were very supportive."

Williams played the game without the services of starting guard Andy Straka, who was out with a virus. But his absence may help the team in the long run, for Bill Whelan got a full 40 minutes under his belt and turned in a solid performance, showing a lot of poise on offense and aggressiveness on defense.

Rehnquist was the story early in the game, hitting eight of the first ten Amherst points as the Lord Jeffs raced to a 17-12 lead.



Williams quickly adjusted, however, and with Kelly (15 first half points) and Tanner (10) leading the way on offense reeled off a 21-4 spurt that sent a totally befuddled Lord Jeff five into the locker room on the short end of a 35-23 halftime score.

Things became even worse for Amherst in the second half as Williams ho-hummed its way to a 49-28 lead behind an everyone-busts-his-butt defense that caused more forced shots and turnovers than Sarah Lee would care to make.

With Rehnquist almost completely sealed off in an airtight purple booth somewhere between here and Chi Psi, the Amherst offense was unable to uncover another scorer among its members and could only manage two points in the first 8:48 of the second half. The Jeffs finally matched Williams' first half output of 35 points with 3:29 left in the game.

"Once we were able to establish a little cushion we were able to force the tempo," Tong explained. "And Amherst had difficulty playing at our tempo."

Swimmers hammer Vermont, 70-43

by Dennis O'Shea

Carl Samuelson's varsity natators warmed up the Robert B. Muir Pool for a super pair of dual meets the next two weekends, thumping the University of Vermont this Saturday afternoon. After suffering two losses in three road outings since the home opener against Amherst in December, the varsity splashers settled back into their Spring Street sardine can Saturday afternoon with a 70-43 hammering of the doughty northerners.

The homestand continues with Charlie Butt's Bowdoin powerhouse over Winter Break and the Springfield Chiefs and their legendary mentor Red Silvia the following Saturday. Both New England archrivals pummeled the Ephmen in dual meet action last year, but the Purple came back to post a third to Springfield's second in the league championships and to blow out the Polar Bears there and at the NCAA Division III Nationals.

The Ephs allowed Vermont but four first places, three of them after the win had been sealed by Dave Amlicke and Don Cameron's 1-3 finish all the way back in the 200-yard backstroke, four events before the final relay. Amlicke and his fellow Freshman justified the Admissions Office's faith in them and put together some of the day's most impressive performances, together accounting for four firsts and a pair of seconds.

Backstroker Amlicke also turned upside down for a come from behind touchout 200 freestyle win over Vermont ace Ron Kirkwood. Kirkwood blew out the field on the way out, and had better than a body length's lead after the first 100. Amlicke closed the gap length by length until they turned together at 175. Neither broke it open on the last lap, but Amlicke snuck in a quicker touch and was awarded the win.

Bill Beckett look-alike Tom Beckett won the 50 freestyle at 22.5, with his brother half a chlorine molecule back in second. Another frosh, Todd Piper, led a second 1-2 sweep, finishing over three seconds ahead of the nearest Vermonter with Peter Howd close behind.

Piper, a butterflyer and individual medleyist, tried his hand at the 200 breaststroke and came up one-tenth of a second short of another first place.

Upperclassmen got their licks in too, particularly in the 200 butterfly where Guy Hoelzer and Duff Anderson's 1-2 sweep leaves them fourth and 13th in the New England rankings. Distancemen Stuart Deans and Jordan Lewis shared victories in the 1000 and 500.
